This, Mr. Chairman, is the reason, involving moral issues, fraught with physical consequences, impairing the future manhood of this country, why I opposed in the Committee on Military Affairs drafting of boys under 21 into foreign military service. Against the enactment of this legislation I enter my solemn protest in the names of the fathers and mothers of this country. But Members will say it is no wise certain that the Commander in Chief of the Army, having conscripted these boys, will order them into foreign service. Or Members may say that the service itself is not so corrupting as I have painted. As to the first contention, there is in my mind no question whatever. If the boys are drafted, they will be sent, and they will go, and they will fight with the same valor and heroism with which the American boy has always distinguished himself. That is what we are raising this army for, to augment the wasted ranks of our new allies.

Let no Member deceive himself and say that the mere appropriation of billions of money and the arming and training of more than a million of men will be our only part in this awful conflict, that the war itself will end by the surrender of Germany to our vast mobilization of men and money. We do not know whether our entering will shorten this war or not. Even if our allies had otherwise been willing to yield rather than to fight through another winter, does anyone within the sound of my voice expect that such counsel would prevail when more than a million of fighting men in the very prime of vigorous manhood, armed with the most deadly weapons in the greatest profusion stood ready in the spring of 1918 to rush to their aid? Let us use our common sense, reversing the position. Would this country lay down its arms under such circumstances? No; it would hold out to the last ditch and the last man in the ditch.

Therefore if you conscript these 2,000,000 boys under the age of 21, those who are drawn, in a year from now will be either in the trenches of France, Belgium, on the Rhine, or in Germany itself.

But a Member says that you exaggerate the moral detriment of war to the magnificent, well-bred youth of America. They will resist the contagion. They will escape the contaminations. They will come back to us as they did after the Civil War and after our War with Spain—those who do come back—with renewed souls, with greater inspirations to serve their country in the peaceful walks of life. Ah, Mr. Chairman, those who lay this flattering unction to their souls forget that this is a war unlike any conflict which has preceded it since the door of Janus was opened wide.

Battles are not fought to-day over wide spaces by infantry and cavalry, by charge and countercharge, in open and spectacular combat. They are fought by cavemen in caves, the most deadly foe is not the opposing soldier, but his disemboweling mortar and hand grenade. Hardly less fatal, as I have said, are the trench diseases, where the soldier fights rats and other vermin, which breed the diseases I have enumerated.

An American writer, Robert Herrick, in an article written for the New York Times, recently admitted substantially, with respect to the French soldier, all the perils with which I have environed the youth of America if you send them into the same death zones. In substance Herrick claims that not even the most refined and most educated, the flower of the French youth, has been able to resist these unprecedented temptations. He enumerated tuberculosis and innumerable diseases as the great enemies against which the French soldier is daily fighting a losing battle.

I was honored to-day by a visit to my office of the distinguished American, Archbishop John Ireland, of St. Paul, a man who stands in the forefront among men whose judgment is sought on all matters pertaining to the welfare of state, and whose loyalty and patriotism to this country was proven by long service during the Civil War. He urged that all true, patriotic Americans should stand unitedly in support of the President in this crisis. He stated that he favors the selective draft as the most just and equitable plan for raising an army. He said his experiences in the Civil War, in which he served as chaplain of Volunteers, had convinced him that if the draft had been resorted to in the very beginning the war would have been of shorter duration. He also said:

Under no circumstances should we draft the boys under the age of 21. They are not yet fully developed physically, morally, or mentally. They are not able to withstand the hardships incident to an army life.

He then told of many instances where he would be going down the lines and see some young boy staggering along under a load too heavy for his shoulders. How he would get off his horse, place the lad thereon, and himself fall into the ranks. In concluding his conversation he stated that he could tell many reasons why he favored the plan of the selective draft, but the simple instance showed more clearly than many words why no boy should ever be in the ranks of an army so long as there are men capable of taking up arms and bearing them.

Mr. Chairman, since the beginning of this controversy over the question of the conscription of our boys I have received several hundred letters. Many of these communications were from men of prominence in our schools and colleges, others were from men who stand high in the ranks of our business world, still more were from mothers and fathers, but they all evidenced the keenest interest in the future manhood of America, and at the same time were characterized by the greatest concern for the welfare of our country. I would like to read a few of these letters at this time.

The first is from a noted educator in my home town, Pittsburgh:

PITTSBURGH, PA., April 16, 1917.

Hon. JOHN M. MORIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MORIN: As president of the Pittsburgh Principals' Club, I have been making a canvass of the principals of the several high schools of our city and of a number of the leading principals of the elementary schools, and find the sentiment quite general in favor of standing by the President in his plans for raising an army, but we are of the opinion that 19 is too young to enlist our boys. Better have it 21 or 22. We would be willing to have them go at 19 were it necessary, but as that is not the case, why not give them two or three years more to complete their education, develop their full strength, and fix their habits before exposing them to the allurements of the Army camp or the possible hardships of the battle field?

We all feel like falling in line with the President's recommendations; we don't wish to create dissensions, but we do wish to make an earnest appeal to have the age limit for conscription raised if it is not incompatible with the public good.

Yours, very truly, A. C. GORDON.

The following two letters are from men connected with large business corporations:

PITTSBURGH, PA., April 10, 1917.

Hon. JOHN M. MORIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I hope you will use your influence and vote to prevent the forcing of boys under 21 years of age into the Army by conscription or otherwise or allowing boys under 21 years of age to volunteer without full consent of their parents or guardians.

I do not think that it is right that the Government should take boys under 21 out of high schools and their freshmen and sophomore years in college, when they are just planning their life's work under good influences, and force them into the Army to mix with all kinds of men for a long period, even if they never do any actual fighting. It will mean the ruining of thousands of boys. Boys at that age are patriotic, and are carried with college spirit and enthusiasm, but that is no reason why they should be shoved out to do the fighting for the men. Let the voting population of the United States bear the burden, not the children. Their time will come soon enough.

Yours, very truly, H. C. MCKEE.

SWISSVALE, PA., April 11, 1917.

Hon. JOHN MORIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to raising an army let me suggest that college students and apprentices learning trades should be exempt until they have graduated or finished their trade. If a young man is taken out of school before he graduates, the chances are he will never finish his education, for he would not care to return to college when he came back from the Army at the age he would be then, consequently his life's ambition would be ruined. The apprentice in the shop would not wish to go back at small wages again after he had become a full-grown man, and a good mechanic would then be spoiled. These are questions to which we hope Congress will give careful consideration while drafting the Army bill. Patriotism and preparedness is all right, but we should not let these things run away with our good judgment. I have talked to a good many men on this subject, and they all concur with me.

Yours, respectfully,

J. K. THORNBURG.

The last is from a father whose heart goes out not only for his own son but for all boys as well:

BROWNSVILLE, PA., April 16, 1917.

Hon. JOHN M. MORIN,
House Committee on Military Affairs,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you because I read an interview you gave to the Washington correspondent of the Pittsburgh Telegraph, making a very clear statement of why you are opposed to certain features embodied in the compulsory military bill that is being advocated by the President and Secretary of War.

Your statement is not at hand at this moment, but I know the main points you gave, and they were given with such clearness and were so directly to the vital points of the bill that anyone reading the interview would be convinced that the measure is wrong in so far as the age limit is concerned.

It is not strange that there are defects in such a bill, for the natural tendency at a time like this, when excitement is high, is for many men to go to extremes in such matters.

The writer is in favor of a compulsory military training law and believes the future safety of the country depends on it, even if it is coming too late to be of great benefit in the present war.

If such a law, containing a sensible age limit, is passed, it will act as insurance for the future peace for the country.

But the present bill is all wrong as to the age of the boys to be first called for training and service, and your statement shows you have a clear view of its vital defects. The proper age limit should be 25 years to 40 years of age; but in no case should a bill be passed to compel boys younger than 21 years of age to leave school to enter the Army. Boys under that age, or at 19 years, the minimum age given by the bill, are still growing and are not fit in a physical way to stand the strain if called for actual service. A man of 25 years, or even at 21 years, has reached a development that makes him almost twice as fit to stand such a strain as a boy of 19 years.

Besides, as you stated, it would take a large percentage of boys away from school and college at the most important period of their lives, and very few of them would again have the opportunity or inclination to finish their education.

The writer knows that you are right in standing firm to have the bill changed so that the minimum age shall not be below 21 years, and you can feel sure that 9 men out of every 10 hold that same opinion.

The advocates of the lower minimum make much of the point that the greater part of the armies in the Civil War was made up of young men.

This may be true, but just as all the machinery and munitions of war have changed in the last 50 years, so have the conditions and surroundings in which boys are raised changed in that time.

A 19-year-old boy at that time was on a very different plane from one of the same age now. The educational requirements of to-day are very different.

Please do all you can to have the changes made in the bill that you advocated in your statement, and you will not only do what is right and for the best interests of the country but your action will be gratefully remembered by thousands of people throughout the country.

Yours, truly,

H. B. JOHNSTON.

Before concluding my remarks I would like to call attention to three points:

1. By exempting boys under 21 the country would not lose their services nor would these boys be deprived of an opportunity to serve. All of them naturally desiring to do their part would come in under the second and third drafts, when they become of age. This would allow them to finish their education, attain a state of greater maturity, and would merely postpone the time for their service.

2. Our laws do not recognize boys under 21 years as being of mature judgment. They have guardians in all legal affairs; they can not vote or hold elective office; therefore it does not seem to me to be fair and just that the law should say to these minors that they are not competent to take any part in the Government of the country but at the same time send them out to fight its battles, while 20,000,000 men between the ages of 21 and 40, under the provisions of the bill as suggested, would be compelled to remain at home.

3. But this last point, to my mind, is one of the most convincing of all. We are trying to profit by the mistakes of both our allies and our foes. In studying the various military systems of the different countries, I compiled some data which shows the forms of service and also the age at which active service begins. For the information of the Members I will read this table:

Norway, universal, compulsory active service begins at	23
Brazil, compulsory service begins at	21
Greece, universal, compulsory active service begins at	21
Chile, universal, compulsory active service begins at	21
Austria, compulsory active service begins at	21
Hungary, compulsory active service begins at	21
Roumania, universal, compulsory active service begins at	21
Serbia, universal, compulsory active service begins at	21
Sweden, universal and volunteer, active service begins at	21
Denmark, universal	21
Germany, universal, compulsory active service begins at	20
Turkey, compulsory service begins at	20
Bulgaria, universal, compulsory active service begins at	20
France, compulsory active service begins at	20
Russia, universal, compulsory active service begins at	20
Italy, universal, compulsory active service begins at	20
Japan, universal, compulsory active service begins at	20
Portugal, compulsory active service begins at	20
Switzerland, universal, compulsory active service begins at	20
Argentina, compulsory active service begins at	20
England, volunteer	20
Belgium, volunteer, compulsory 49 per cent	no definite age.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of all this, can we as a matter of principle, as we go forth to destroy the despotic Prussian military system of Europe in order that we may preserve the democracy of the world, surrender our own democracy and go a year beyond the age limit of those autocratic powers and draft our boys of 19 to do our fighting? To this question each Member of this House will answer, "No; this is a man's war, and we men should do the fighting." There is not a red-blooded man in this whole country who would not far rather go himself than to force boys under 21, immature and undeveloped, to take their place in the front ranks and fight their battles for them.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, we are in the great world war. It is unnecessary for me at this time to review my attitude and votes on various questions affecting our foreign relations before the opening of the present session of Congress. When the present Congress convened a state of war actually existed, and Congress by overwhelming vote recognized the existence of that fact. I had hoped and fervently prayed that war could be avoided, but the time to look backward is past. My eyes are on the future. Every man, woman, and child must do their full duty to the country we all love and to which we owe everything of life and property.

We are in immediate need of a large military force. How that military force is to be used is not for me to say. That, under the Constitution, is to be left to the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy—the President of the United States. If I had my way about it, there would not be a single American soldier sent to the trenches of Europe. In my humble opinion, there are other and more effective ways of bringing the war to a speedy and successful conclusion than to send our boys across the ocean to the trenches.

I have given this bill and the majority and minority reports filed therewith very careful study. There is very little difference between the two reports. The public mind is very much misinformed on the propositions now before Congress. The metropolitan press of the country has endeavored to create the impression in the minds of the public that a certain group in Congress is advocating and supporting the volunteer system exclusively, and that another group is in favor of conscription exclusively. Nothing could be further from the truth, so far as the real purpose of this bill is concerned. Both groups are for the volunteer system and both groups are likewise for conscription. Let us analyze the bill in an effort to ascertain wherein these two groups agree and wherein they differ.

1. The first paragraph of the bill provides for raising the Regular Army to war strength. That means that about 140,000 men will have to be recruited. Under the provisions of this bill and of existing law this number will be raised by the volunteer system, but if that number of volunteers do not come forth, then the President has the authority to conscript the required number of men for that service. This paragraph has no opposition in Congress at all, and it has the approval of the War Department as well.

2. The second paragraph of the bill provides for raising the National Guard to war strength. That means that between six and seven hundred thousand men will have to be recruited. Under the provisions of this bill and of existing law this number will be raised by the volunteer system, but if that number of volunteers do not come forth the President has the power and authority to use conscription in order that the required number of men may be secured for that service. This paragraph has no opposition in Congress and also has the approval of the War Department.

3. The third paragraph is where differences appear in the reports of the majority and minority. The War Department recommended that authority be given the President to conscript 1,000,000 men between the ages of 19 and 25 years; 500,000 after enrollment was made, or the military census was taken, and 500,000 later. Up to this time the age limits recommended by the War Department has received absolutely no support in the House. The Military Affairs Committee unanimously fixed the age limits at 21 to 40 years. A majority of the committee favor a provision in this paragraph to the effect that pending the taking of the military census, which it is conceded will take from four to six months, men should be given an opportunity to volunteer in the new organization of 500,000. The War Department and the minority on the committee oppose this provision and will move to strike it from the bill. The conscript provision of this paragraph of both the majority and minority are in identically the same words. The majority says in substance, pending the taking of the military census, give the President authority to call for volunteers, and leave it to his discretion whether he will call for volunteers at all and when he shall commence conscription. The minority says in substance wait until the military census is taken and then conscript the entire number. And that is the difference over which there has been so much of calumny in the press and misunderstanding among the people.

On the first and second paragraphs of the bill there are no differences, and on the third paragraph the differences are just as I have indicated. Either way the bill shall pass the House it carries conscription in all three paragraphs. If there are any differences on any other portion of the bill, it has not yet developed. A great majority of the people who have been writing and wiring their Congressmen think this bill provides for universal military training and education. This bill has absolutely nothing whatever to do with that subject. This is emergency legislation to meet the immediate and pressing needs of the country. The bill is entitled "A bill to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States." In this world mix up we may need before the war is over every man provided for in this bill to defend our own shores against hostile invasion, and I am not only willing but anxious that the President shall have them just as quickly as they can be enlisted and equipped. To my mind the accomplishment of this purpose is far more important than the means by which it shall be attained.

A number of patriotic men in this country have offered to raise regiments and divisions, and even army corps, for service in Europe. Among them is Col. Roosevelt. Col. Roosevelt's offer is to enlist men who are over 25 years of age. Men in whose judgment I have the greatest confidence inform me that Col. Roosevelt could in a very short time raise an army of 250,000 men, most of whom are ready now, and that, together with other eminent men who have tendered their services, would soon swell the number to 500,000, an army composed of real fighters who are not only willing but keen to plant the Stars and Stripes on the Hindenburg line. Mind you, these are men, not boys, who want to go—men who want to go together, which they can not do by enlisting in the Regular Army or the National Guard. Why we should refuse to accept the services of these men and proceed at once to conscript the boys of 19 and 20 years of age is beyond my comprehension.

Much misinformation has been spread broadcast about the words "selective conscription." Farmers are told it will exempt them; miners are told they will be exempt; and so, too, the workers in manufacturing industries, clerks in stores and banks, and so forth. As a sample of this propaganda, I quote from a Member of Congress on the floor of this House. He said:

> It gives the President the right to say to the man on the farm, in the mine, in the cotton mill, "You are liable to service, but the country needs you more to stay where you are, to produce food and fuel and clothes, than in the army; and I choose you to serve at home."

That will probably exempt 98 per cent of his district. Is not that a bugle blast of patriotism! Everybody goes to the Army but my own constituents! This is an example of the fallacious arguments of the press and of persons in and out of Congress to administer anæsthetics to the public mind, and especially to the farmers and other producers of the country.

I shall not undertake to deceive my constituents and the country. This bill provides for nearly 2,000,000 men—nearly a million for the Regular Army and the National Guard and a million in addition thereto. There are 435 Representatives. When the Regular Army and National Guard are raised to war strength that will mean over 2,000 volunteers from the sixth congressional district of Iowa, the district which I have the honor to represent. When the additional million is raised, that will mean between 2,000 and 3,000 more men from this district, enlisted, most likely, by the so-called "selective conscription." Are you going to exempt the farmers, the miners, the factory employees, the clerks, and others engaged in useful employment and conscript only the loafers, the bums, and other undesirable citizens? If you do, you can not get the required quota in my district.

Do not be deceived in your own minds. If the people are misinformed now, they will soon be informed. The haze that now enshrouds the words "selective conscription" will have entirely vanished and they will understand their full purport. They will know that not a word or a line of this bill provides in any way for universal military training and service. They will know that a distinct line is not drawn between the volunteer system and conscription, and that it is not a question of having no other alternative but to support one plan or the other. One thing is certain, and history so records, that very few wars have been started by farmers and laborers, but every war in history has been fought by the farmers and laborers, and this war is no exception to the general rule. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a military spirit pervading this country. There seems to be a disposition on the part of many that the civil should be replaced with the military spirit. There seems to be a sentiment gathering in this country that the military should predominate and that we must look to them for advice as to how this country must be run. It is a sad commentary on our system of government to believe that our laws, our actions, the raising of our boys—yes, that our very lives—must be subordinated to the advice and teachings of the military.

Many of our present citizens came to this country to escape a military despotism; to a land which they had every reason to believe would always be governed by the civil and not by the military authorities or by the advice of the military arm of government. Now we are told that we must have conscription, and why? Primarily because the military advise that we should resort to this method.

It is time for men to think and to think seriously. We have been taught to look upon Germany as a military country. It is a military country. Would they be in war, in a death struggle to-day, if militarism had not dominated the civil, if they had not been taught that militarism must come first and be superior to everything, even life itself?

Oh, my country! Are we to follow in the footsteps of Germany, become a military nation, and finally end our existence in a death struggle with the other nations of the world, because we elected to subordinate our rights to the advice and dictation of the military arm of the Government? God forbid! I have that faith in the patriotism of the people of this country to believe that they will, after thinking seriously over this question, never make up their minds to become predominated and controlled by the military.

We have gone into this war, and we have gone in to win, and we will win; but conscription is another matter.

There are men enough who are willing to enter this war, men qualified, efficient, brave, and ready to fight, who can arrange their business to permit their absence, who will make the best soldiers and a better and more efficient Army than if Tom, Dick, and Harry are selected, 1 to 7 or 1 to 10, promiscuously, without regard to their suitability for the making of an efficient soldier. The country is committed to war, but it is not yet committed to conscription—a disaster, in my opinion, as terrible as invasion. Gov. Sleeper of my State writes Senator TOWNSEND, under date of April 13, that—

It would almost be a crime to take the young people from the farms and put them into field duty. We need their help in raising foodstuff more than we do in fighting. We have had a great many people come in here offering their services in all kinds of ways, many hundreds of them in the past week, representing many thousands of people, and in each case everyone was willing to do his whole duty, and willing to shed every drop of his blood in defense of his country, but I can say without exception they did not approve of conscription, nor did they approve of sending our soldiers across the water.

I believe this represents the attitude of the laboring men of this country. And I have been a laboring man myself—in my early days. I am one of the many who believe they have a right to be reckoned with when it comes to this matter of conscription, and I hope to be found battling for the rights of labor at all times when I know that they are in the right. Take the laborer from the farm, from the factory, from the railroads, from every walk of life, by conscription, even though it be but 1 in 7 or 10, and who is there to fill their places in the industrial world?

Foreign ideas seem to have a place in this conscription business; then we should give some consideration to the ideas of the laborer of those foreign countries, so I will quote a few words from Mr. Snowden, a labor leader in the House of Commons, Great Britain, during the military-service debate on conscription in January, 1916. He said:

The minister of munitions is finding the very greatest difficulty in getting the 80,000 additional skilled workmen for whom he has asked. If you therefore are going to take the men out of the factories and put them into the fighting line, you are going to have again, probably in more aggravated form, the difficulty experienced in the early part of the war; that is, more men than munitions. * * * If we want to win this war, we ought to concentrate all our available resources upon getting an enormous superiority in munitions, and if we are going to follow the policy proposed in this bill that is going to be an impossible thing to do.

The same argument could be applied to foodstuffs, to railroad operations, and other operations necessary to carrying on of the war to a successful conclusion. We are told that, though our conscription bill does not mention or include all exemptions, the administration will be authorized to consider that feature and make exemptions; but if such is the fact, why was all this not included in the bill? The English conscription bill makes the following provision for exemptions:

Those entitled to exemption will include men engaged in necessary national work, single men who are the stay and support of their relatives, those suffering from ill health or infirmity, and conscientious objectors to the undertaking of combatant service. Government departments will also grant exemption certificates, after consultation with the army council, to men or classes of men employed on work of national importance.

Theory and promises are one thing, fact is another. Here is how the labor organizations looked upon the conscription measure, as reported in the Manchester Guardian of January 6, 1916:

The National Union of Railwaymen resolved to oppose any form of conscription, and the votes of the delegates at the labor congress to-day will be cast against the Government's bill.

In another item in the same paper, same date, we read:

A largely attended delegate meeting of the Manchester and Salford Labor Party in Holyoke House last night, by a vote in the proportion of 3 against 1, adopted the following resolutions: "That this meeting of the Manchester and Salford Labor Party views with alarm the approaching menace of conscription and pledges itself to resist it to the uttermost."

Mr. Snowden, in the House of Commons, referred to this resolution in these words:

Can the prime minister or can the House of Commons for one single moment maintain that there is anything approaching general consent with regard to this bill? * * * We had last week the most representative conference of labor which has ever been held in this country. I have in my time attended a great many labor conferences, but I have never attended one where the rank and file was expressed in such a clear and unfettered way as at that conference. * * * You can not get away from the fact that that conference of workingmen, nearly all voters, declared by 3 to 1 their opposition to this bill. * * * Why is this bill proposed? The reason is perfectly obvious. It is a surrender to the conscriptionist cabinet. We knew for months that this conspiracy has been going on.

Mr. Snowden goes on to say:

What is Prussianism? Militarism is not a system; it is a spirit. I think the difference between German militarism and British militarism is this: That in Germany Prussian militarism is on top, and in this country the democracy is on top of militarism, and the party opposite want to reverse the positions in this country. What was the great exciting question in this country on the eve of the outbreak of war? It was whether this house or the army should rule. So far as the conscriptionist members of the Government are concerned, I declare it as my firm conviction that their main reason for the support of this bill is not on account of military necessity but because it is going to put into their hands a strong weapon for enforcing the chain on the democracy.

But we Americans do not have to go over to England to get our ideas as to what the laborer thinks of conscription. Our laborers are the peers of any in the world, whether it be in efficiency or in intelligence, and I will back their judgment with any class of men on earth, whether it be in legislative halls, on the farms, or in the factories, and I am ready to tip my hat to the laboring men of this country wherever their vocations may lead—whether it be farm or factory, railroad or foundry, or wherever it may be found.

Now, I want you to listen to a statement made by Mr. Grant Hamilton, representing the American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C., at the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs on April 14. Listen:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the American Federation of Labor has over 2,000,000 affiliates and the organized labor movement as a whole constitutes approximately 3,000,000 members. Upon this particular subject—that of conscription—I think the federation represents the sentiment of all organized labor, and in representing the affiliates themselves we represent directly the lives of approximately 18,000,000 people. The American labor movement has always been against compulsion, and especially against militarism in all its forms. We have not changed; we stand exactly in the same position that we have always stood. We are not unmindful of the present situation. We understand that this Nation is at war, and we realize that the resources of wealth and man power must be provided to protect the interests of this country; but for 140 years we have glorified our democratic institutions; we have claimed to be a free people, and we have avoided to a very large extent any legislation of a compulsory character. The War of 1776 was, of course, fought by volunteers and won; the War of 1812 was fought by Volunteers and won. In the Civil War on the first call for volunteers over 1,000,000 men volunteered. As a matter of fact, Secretary Stanton sent out a notice that the enlistment was oversubscribed. Later on, however, in 1863, a draft law was passed by Congress, and those who have read history realize the condition which obtained at that time and that even Lincoln himself was entirely opposed to a draft law, but under the desperate situation which then obtained, of course, he accepted it.

The labor movement is exceedingly concerned with the matter of a general conscription law. We hold that as we have maintained our faith in democratic institutions, we ought to put that faith to the first test and that an opportunity should be afforded to raise a volunteer army, and there are many things also that are not explained to us nor to the public

It is true we can not always take the statements of the newspapers, but there seems to be a general consensus of opinion that there is to be raised an army of 1,000,000 men. The public nor the labor movement has not yet been told for what purpose these million men are to be raised. We ask this: Are they to be raised to protect our own country or are these men to be raised for the purpose of sending an army across the water? I think under our plan of government the public ought to know whether or not this army to be raised, if it be 1,000,000 or 500,000 men, is to remain within the borders of the United States or whether it is contemplated that an army be sent across the water.

The representatives of American labor met in this city March 12, held a meeting, and an expression was promulgated, under authority of the American Federation of Labor, in which were included the members of the railroad brotherhoods, and that meeting constituted therefore the entire labor movement; and our position, succinctly stated, is that the same voluntary institutions that organized industrial, commercial, and transportation workers in times of peace will best take care of the same problems in time of war.

Mr. Gompers, whom it has been reported is for conscription and wrongfully reported, has given me this statement to present to this committee:

"The organized labor movement has always been fundamentally opposed to compulsion. It has maintained that institutions and relations of a free people can and should be based upon the voluntary principle. It now maintains that what has been the directing basic principle in industrial organization and service must be the initial basic principle in the military. The declaration unanimously adopted by the representatives of the entire organized labor movement of the United States is based upon this adherence to the voluntary principle.

"It has been the hope of the men and women who labor that if this Republic should inevitably be drawn into active participation in the present world conflict that the Republic of the United States might demonstrate to the world that free institutions and ideals are effective and sufficient in war as well as in peace.

"It is the hope of organized labor to demonstrate that under voluntary conditions and institutions the Republic of the United States can mobilize its greatest strength, resources, and efficiency. We know that only under voluntary institutions can the Nation mobilize good will. Good will is essential to enthusiastic and effective united action.

"The labor movement stands firmly by the voluntary principle. We declare that at no time have voluntary institutions been given a real effective and conclusive test. Until such a test has been given there is no good reason for abandoning the principle which was born of the spirit of 1776, and which has enabled us to establish the ideals and the traditions that has given this Republic meaning as a country, free, efficient, and capable of meeting any condition or emergency.

"SAMUEL GOMPERS."

Five million men volunteered in England before they resorted to conscription. If we are permitted to allow our men to volunteer, can you say that in this glorious land of ours, with 100,000,000 people, that you honestly believe we can not raise a volunteer army of 1,000,000 without resorting to the hellish method of conscription? Not only that, but by our vote are we willing to take the boys of this country between the ages of 19 and 25, while we exempt every Congressman, every Senator, and every man above the age of 25?

Why did England resort to conscription? The men were volunteering faster than they were able to take care of them. We are told that they came too fast. Great God! Can soldiers come too fast in time of war? There must be a screw loose in the army organization somewhere. I am compelled to believe that it is the army system, army advisers, that are in need of reorganization instead of the volunteer system. If our Army heads are efficient, if we have an efficient Army system, will you tell the people of this country that they could not provide for the training and taking care of the volunteers within a reasonable time of their arrival? My conception is that in time of war we want men; we want them quick; and we want men who will fight, and we want to be in position to give them efficient training and be able to take care of them.

Give Roosevelt a chance to enroll his division. Give Gov. Sulzer a chance to enroll his division. Give them a chance to fight. They are qualified; they are efficient, and they are now ready to fight. They are not boys between the ages of 19 and 25, nor between the ages of 18 and 21, as recommended by the Army experts. It is men we need, not young boys. Give those and other brave fellows a chance to fight, even though they might cover themselves with glory that would lead them into the White House.

Now, while we are going abroad for ideas and advice and the advisability of sending the boys of from 19 to 25, as provided in the Senate bill, and which we will vote upon before we are through, I do not believe that it would be out of order for me to call the attention of this House to a report to the British Parliament in 1904 on the reorganization of the British Army, as published in the Parliamentary Reports, C. D., No. 1907. These are interesting facts. Listen:

ON THE CAUSES OF REJECTION OF RECRUITS IN CLASSES IN RATIOS OF 1,000.

The whole number of those inspected being 87,609, there were rejected for defective vision 39.23 per cent; impediment of speech, 17.33 per cent; decaying teeth, nearly 50 per cent; underweight, 15.59 per cent; underchest measurement, 56.72 per cent; underweight, 21.72 per cent. Including those rejected for these and other causes at the time of enlistment and three months afterwards, the number finally rejected was 26,913. Of the total number enlisted in 1902 there were 2,152 boys under 17 years, 1,229 were from 17 to 18 years, 2,402 were from 18 to 19 years, 10,826 were from 19 to 20 years, and 6,463 from 20 to 21. So that of the total number enlisted—59,099—44,692 were boys from 17 to 21 years of age. Of these boys only 3,336 are described in the report as being well educated. Laborers, servants, and those employed on the farms numbered 58,595 out of the whole number enlisted, before any rejections, and 10,274 were described as manufacturing artisans, cloth workers, weavers, and lace makers. Of mechanics employed in occupations favorable to physical development, such as smiths, carpenters, and masons, there were 10,240, and of shop men and clerks 5,210. Professional occupations and students in these numbered, out of 87,609 enlisted, only 791. Note that 1902 was the final year of the Boer War. The average strength of the British Army was 254,357 in that year; that it was an army of young boys, and that it was an army of young boys from the farms, shops, and factories of Great Britain. * * * There were admitted to British hospitals that year 191,250 men out of the 254,357. Of this number 2,152 died in hospitals. Of the causes of sickness venereal diseases in all its forms numbered 17,036, of whom 1,403 were constantly ill. The ratio of these diseases to all others increased from 1901 to 1902. * * * The chief medical officer gave the reason for this increase in the following words: "An increased number of young soldiers, who are less able to take care of themselves than older men."

Further comment upon the age limit of the recruits under the Senate bill—19 to 25—is unnecessary.

We are told that we must take the advice of men who have made a study of war. We are asked to rely on the judgment of Army officials—on military experts.

My colleagues, we have been relying on the judgment of military experts for several years. Were we not relying on the judgment of Army experts during the Cuban War? Were we not relying on the advice of Army experts when we sent our Navy to Vera Cruz? Were we not relying on Army experts when we tried to make old man Huerta salute the American flag? And he had not saluted up to the time of his death. Were we not relying on the advice of Army experts when we chased Villa over the alkali plains and into the mountain recesses of Mexico, when the experts showed us how to take Villa, dead or alive? I am told that he refuses to admit that he is dead, and I have no expert records of his having been taken alive.

Were we not relying on expert Army advice and the efficiency of Army experts while these war conditions were going on?

Here is something that has been published and distributed over this country, which has not been denied, to my knowledge:

Take as a sample the United States military post at Fort Bliss, where about 50,000 men have recently been congregated. Saloons were across the street from camp. Two miles away, at El Paso, there were about 400 more. As if this were insufficient, there were long brick buildings (called cribs) divided into single rooms, in each of which there was an immoral woman. Out on the porches in front of these rooms those women openly plied their trade and with such success that many of the boys were laid up in hospitals. Some died in El Paso, some have gone home and will never be able to come back, and others will transmit their disease to posterity.

Can you, my colleagues, vote to send your boys and the boys of your home district and the boys of this great country between the ages of 19 and 25 to war, when you will not vote to send yourselves or the fathers of these young boys to such hells on earth, existing under the administration which says that these boys shall go because it is the advice of efficient Army experts?

I can not and I will not vote to send your boys or the boys of my constituents nor the boys of this Nation between the ages of 19 and 25, which I understand will be insisted on by the Senate, to live under such conditions and surroundings and to go across the ocean to face the deadly shrapnel, the poisonous and deadly gases, to live and die in trenches, when by our votes we would exempt our very selves. I will not vote for your boys nor my boys to stand up and be shot down because they are in line for conscription, while we would exempt ourselves and our neighbors above the age of 25 on the expert advice we are urged to consider.

On the advice of societies in New York thousands of telegrams have been sent to Congressmen by their constituents—they take their advice from New York—and we are told we must take the advice of the military experts and vote for conscription. I received 30 or 40 such telegrams from one town in my district, and each telegram was the same, word for word. How many of these parties sending these telegrams ever read the bill we are to vote upon? How many of these men are anxious to have their sons between the age of 18 and 21, as recommended by the experts, go across the water and be shot down or return sightless, armless, legless, dying of disease, or their health wrecked for life, while they themselves are exempt from going, but permitted to wine and dine at their clubs, gambling on the green in a back room, or on the golf links, hurrahing at the ball games, riding the country in their automobiles, while their boys might be dying in the trenches away from home, in a foreign land, because they have influenced their Congressmen to vote for a bill on the request of strangers in New York and in the East to send their boys and the boys of their neighbors to a living hell?

I did not come to Congress to make a reputation. I did not come to Congress to become a rubber stamp. I did not come to Congress to send the boys of my district or the boys of this Nation between the ages of 18 and 21 or of 19 and 25 to be shot down while I and my colleagues stayed at home. I did not come to Congress to obey the dictates of eastern subsidized societies, subsidized newspapers, nor the munitions makers.

I came to Congress to represent the people, the whole people, not a coterie of eastern sycophants and hypocrites. I can not conscientiously follow the advice of men who would deny their Representative the right to vote his conscientious convictions when he is satisfied that in so voting he has taken into consideration the welfare and best interests of the people not only of his district but the welfare of this Nation. My constituents may put me out of Congress as soon as they like, but as long as I remain here I shall vote my honest convictions, as I believe for the best interests of all, without fear or favor. If they do not want such a man as their Representative they should never again permit me to enter the Halls of Congress.

Not one of the numerous telegrams I received came from a boy between the ages of 18 and 21. Not one of these telegrams came from a mother. Not one of these telegrams came from a laboring man. But they came from men of mature age, men who under the conscription law recommended by the administration experts can lay back and smoke their pipe in peace, while they send their boys to war.

Daniel Webster, in the Halls of Congress in a speech on December 9, 1814, asked:

Where is it written in the Constitution * * * that you may take children from their parents * * * and compel them to fight the battles of any war which the wickedness of Government may engage in?

But the Constitution does not question the right of the ingrate to send his boy of from 18 to 21—if we take the advice of the experts who have made a study of the subject, and, of course, some of our constituents advise us to do this—while he himself remains at home. If conscription is such a good thing, why does not England send her conscripts across the channel to do some of the fighting, instead of allowing the 5,000,000 volunteers to do it all? But, you say, the conscripts must be trained. Is that not equally true of the volunteers?

No conscript was ever sent abroad to fight a country's battles except the Hessians to fight George Washington. Germany sends no conscripts to fight in foreign lands beyond the seas. Are we to out-Germanize Germany in our craze for conscription and in our zeal to follow expert advice?

Canada, with but 7,000,000 population, sends across the ocean 400,000 volunteers, and they have never resorted to conscription. Australia, with a population less than Illinois, raised a volunteer army of 264,000 men to go 12,000 miles across the water to help England, and the question of conscription was referred to a referendum and voted down by a large majority. Each and every one of England's possessions sent volunteers, but no conscripts. It is left to the United States not only to Prussianize but to over-Prussianize its people.

The London Nation of March 18, 1916, says:

In accepting compulsion we (England) sacrificed one of the deeply rooted principles of our political tradition. We hoped to reap a Prussian reward, but to give up one's strong points is no talisman for acquiring one's enemy.

It then goes on to quote Mr. Runciman as follows:

Conscription of necessary labor has put hundreds of thousands of acres out of use and will cause a further serious diminution of home supplies next year.

Premier Borden, on August 4, 1915, said:

In Canada, and I believe the same is true in all over-seas Dominions, the difficulty has been with armament and equipment—all that is necessary for the organization of a great modern army—and not with the provision of men, for the men came faster than we were able to organize the armor to equip them.

The Manchester (England) Guardian, commenting on the Australian referendum, says:

Australia's rejection of conscription for foreign service offers a substantial ground for hope for the humanity that will emerge from the war.

The victory of liberty is in the main the act of the party which governs Australian politics. Australia stands for the boldest and most successful experiment in social democracy that the world has ever seen. Its Federal Government and the majority of its State governments are in the hands of labor and trade-unions, and labor declined to follow Mr. Hughes. It fought him in his cabinet and outside it, and it has won the battle that British labor lost.

The women's vote, once claimed as conscriptionist, is now declared to have been largely for free service. But the triumph of freedom was largely the work of trade-unionism, and it will soon be seen to possess a more than local significance.

Canada has plainly intimated its dissent from conscription and with the Irish example before us we may conclude that the advantage of force in the domain of military service has been definitely stayed within the British Empire. "Those are good tidings," says the Nation. "So long as our armies consist in the main of volunteers they retain rights of citizenship which the conscript has been forced to yield. We have no fear that when they return to civil life they will vote for placing on their own and their children's necks a burden which they cheerfully lifted when the appeal was made to them in an hour of special emergency and trial."

Gen. Grant, a volunteer himself, though a graduate of West Point, thought pretty well of volunteers. In his memoirs he says:

The Government ought to disband the Regular Army, with the exception of the Staff Corps, and notify the disbanded officers that they would receive no compensation while the war lasted except as volunteers. The register should be kept up, but the names of all the officers who were not in the volunteer service at the close should be stricken from it.

In the Civil War the North was handicapped till the volunteers came to the front. You have merely to compare the Army of the Potomac with the Volunteer Army after our volunteers got busy.

Young men who volunteer desire to be assigned to a company where they may be with volunteers from their own State and neighborhood, comrades who are congenial. When they get sick they want to know that they have friends in camp who will consider their welfare and let the folks back home know how they are getting along. They want to be organized in State units. If they are from my State, they want to know that they belong to a Michigan regiment. But under this conscriptive law they may be assigned wherever the authorities think they should be sent, and no two boys from the same neighborhood can expect with any certainty to be assigned to same company or regiment.

You talk about a universal selective conscription law! Now, get your dictionaries and see what the word "universal" means. We have a population of more than 100,000,000 people. Would it come within the meaning of "universal" to pick out boys between the ages of 19 and 25 and say this is our idea of the meaning of universal; that this is a universal and just selection from our population of over 100,000,000 people? Great God! how the meaning of words have changed since we have turned our consciences over to be governed by the advice of war experts. But there is one word which you use that still retains its full significance, and that is the word "selective." We do not have to go to the dictionary to find out that from a population of over 100,000,000 we must select the boys between the ages of 19 and 25 to do our fighting while we, if we are to take the advice of our experts of the elect class, stay at home and shout with the man who let his wife fight the burglars: "My, ain't this a fine fight, and ain't we skinning them to the queen's taste?"

Then when the war is over, in the distant future, if you shall have taken the advice of our experts, you will take your grandchildren on your knee and tell them how we won the war and saved this grand old country from autocracy. But you will not tell those grandchildren that grandpa did not go to war himself but voted in Congress to send his boys between the ages of 19 and 25, to that war; and that thousands and thousands of fine American boys never came back to their homes—to their mothers—and thousands who did return were maimed for life and ended their days as worthy pensioners of our Government. No; you will not tell them that you, as Congressmen on our experts' advice, were willing to let the boys of this country between the ages of 19 and 25 fight the battles of our country while by your vote you were exempt from service in the Army.

My countrymen, when we send our armies over the ocean and all the countries shall have sent their armies, and with the millions who are now over there to fight, where will they be able to find ground enough to fight on? There will not be any room to fight.

Now, in conclusion, let us consider the best interests of our country, both present and future. Let us not be carried away by a diarrhea of words, as incorporated in the many telegrams and letters sent us, "to stand by the President," when the bill itself does not stand by the President; nor by the advice of war experts, who are not at all times consistent, and who would have us exempt ourselves but send our boys to battle. Let us vote without fear or favor for what we honestly believe is best for the whole country. Let us vote our honest and conscientious convictions as God has given us the light to form our judgments. Then let us throw the broad mantle of charity over all, and if any have erred may God forgive and may the eternal record show that "When the accusing spirit flew up to Heaven's chancery, he blushed when he gave it in; and the recording angel when he wrote it down dropped a tear upon the words and blotted them out forever."

EARLY FRENCH CONSCRIPTION.

I take the following bit of conscription history from the Political Economy of War, by F. W. Hirst, editor of the Economist, London:

Against the armies of absolutism in 1792 the French Revolutionary Government defended itself by voluntary levies. (There was no demand for conscription then.) Finally, becoming more and more aggressive, France had recourse to compulsory drafts and to the requisition, which Burke called a sweeping law of unprecedented despotism.

As the war went on, the organization took shape, * * * and the law of conscription was introduced in 1797. That law is attributed to Carnot, who pretended to have derived his inspiration from the Roman Republic. By this law all Frenchmen were pronounced to be soldiers and held liable to serve whenever the country was declared by the Government to be in danger. The number of conscripts was to be determined annually by the Government, the contingent from each department being proportioned to its population, and was divided among the districts, cantons, and municipalities. All men from 20 to 25 were made liable to conscription, and it was the duty of the civil officers to prepare a list, a sort of national register, on which were inscribed the names and descriptions of all men liable to serve. These lists were consigned to the minister of war. But eight days were allowed for preparation of these lists. The conscripts were then assembled and examined. Those who pleaded infirmity or inability to attend were visited at their homes by military inspectors. Revised lists were made of the physically fit, and tickets, numbered in accordance with the names on the list, were placed in an urn, from which the conscripts or their friends drew the lots. The lot fell upon those who drew the numbers below the quota, those above being summoned later, in case death or disablement should befall the others. Absentees who failed to present themselves were declared refractory, proclaimed through the Empire, and pursued as deserters. Those were the conscripts of the active service. An equal number forming the reserve were organized and drilled within their own district, to march out of it only in case of emergency. A third body, numbering a fourth of the whole, were called supplemental conscripts, to fill vacancies caused by death, desertion, or other causes. When this supplement proved insufficient, the reserve was called upon. No Frenchman under 30 was permitted to travel or to serve in any public office unless he could produce a certificate showing that he had discharged his duty under the conscription law. To prevent organized opposition the helpless conscripts were marched under an escort of gendarmerie in bodies of a hundred to various depots throughout the Empire, and there supplied with arms and clothing. Curable diseases only obtained a temporary discharge. Incurables had to pay an indemnity to the Government. At first no exemptions were allowed, but finally the eldest brother in an orphan family and the only son of a widow, might be transferred to the reserve, and the same was allowed subdeacons in seminaries. Another dispensation exempted workmen engaged in manufacturing war material, and another exempted soldiers who had survived five campaigns. * * * One of the chief advantages to the state of the conscript system is that it saves pay. * * * The conscript soldier received from a halfpenny to a penny a day.

This military enslavement of the Nation was fortified by a penal code of searching rigor. Any official who gave a false certificate of infirmity suffered five years' imprisonment in irons. Conscripts who mutilated themselves or shammed infirmity were placed at the disposition of the Government for five years to labor as prisoners. Absentees or refractories underwent corporal punishment and paid a fine of 1,500 francs, which together with the expenses of pursuit, was levied on their own property or on that of the father or mother. * * * In 1807 a man who used a false document to save his son from conscription was condemned by the criminal court to eight years labor in irons, to be branded with a hot iron on the left shoulder, to an exposure of six hours, besides paying the cost of prosecution and for 400 copies of the decree. Refractory conscripts were imprisoned in the citadels of garrison towns, where they had to work under the most severe discipline in the arsenals or on the roads in prison garb with their heads closely shaved. When they gave tokens of docility and reformation they were drafted into the army. A conscript who absented himself for 24 hours was punished as a deserter, either by death or by punishment of the ball or by hard labor. Death was the punishment for desertion to the enemy, or who, fleeing from the punishment of the ball, carried off arms with them. Punishment by the ball consisted of: An iron ball weighing 8 pounds was fastened by an iron chain 7 feet long to the deserter's legs. After hearing on his knees the sentence read, the deserter was condemned to hard labor for 10 hours daily, and to be chained for the remainder of the day in solitary confinement. This punishment lasted 10 years, but was prolonged with an additional ball fettered to his knee in cases of contumacy or serious disobedience.

Such is a very brief outline of a law which has been so much admired by military writers in all countries. The praises of Napoleon, who perfected it with such assiduous and loving care that France bled almost to death, have been sung not only by the great Prussian generals, but by liberal imperialists in France and in Great Britain. The sacred duty of obedience was inculcated by the ecclesiastical parasites of the Napoleonic regime, and the modern European state has borrowed this fundamental institution from the First Empire. It is the pride of the German professor and the glory of writers and rulers who mistake patriotism for the subjection of the individual to the state. * * * An English writer, who surveyed the system in 1809, observed: "The grand characteristic of France is relentless inflexibility. A host of informers secure the fidelity of the executive officers. Cases of the most signal and barbarous rigor crowd daily all the gazettes of the empire and even the journals of Paris, into which they are compulsively and awkwardly thrust, in order that the quickening impulse of fear may be propagated through the entire mass of servitude."

One of the advantages attributed to conscription, as to other forms of slavery, is its cheapness. This fallacy needs no refutation. Slavery is the least prosperous form of industrial organization. Unpaid labor is notoriously dear. Nations burdened by conscription are forced to accumulate debts even in times of peace. In France it is enormously costly, but the estates of the great landowners were confiscated so the poor peasants, who constituted the vast majority of the French Nation, receiving land for blood, endured it patiently for a time. Those who had money were allowed to pay for a substitute if they could find one. An English writer, describing the conscription scenes in France, dwells upon the distressing scenes, the piercing shrieks of suffering women at the booths when the fatal tickets were being drawn from the urn. And again he describes a group of 30 miserable beings, called refractory conscripts, whom he saw on the high road guarded by gendarmes and tied together with a rope attached to a horse's tail as a badge of disgrace.

(What kind of soldiers, think you, could be made out of men thus degraded and humiliated?)

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, it would be worse than criminal folly for us to delude ourselves as to the character or the extent of the task which has been forced upon this Nation by the German Government. I voted for the declaration of war because every observant man in the Nation knew that war already existed by the barbarous edicts and conduct of the Imperial German Government. I voted for that resolution, because every art of diplomacy, every power of persuasion, every appeal to international law, and to the humane instincts of the heart in our dealings with the German Government seemed to have failed. I voted for it because there was no other honorable course left for this Nation to pursue, except to give official recognition to a state of war already existing, and buckle on our armor for our defense and for the defense of the things for which this Nation stands.

In that resolution we pledge the resources of this Nation to the successful and speedy conclusion of the conflict. We did not by that resolution indicate that we would declare war and then quit. We did not say we would enter a conflict which for nearly three years we had tried to avoid and then refuse to do our part in waging a righteous war for human rights. After submitting to the murder of our citizens, to the violation of our neutrality, to the destruction of our property on land and sea, to the filling of our friendly land with alien spies, to seeing the German Embassy and consulates converted into rendezvous for every form of vicious intrigue, to the attempt to drive us and all neutral nations from the high seas, to the conniving at the loyalty of our own citizens, and the dismemberment of our Republic, any other course except the drawing of the sword would have been equal to a proclamation to the world that we had hauled down the flag, and that our championship of the sacred rights of free peoples for a century and a half had been a hollow pretense.

Having taken that step with full knowledge of its consequences, what is our duty now to do?

There can be no doubt in the mind of any patriotic man what it is our duty to do. We have arrayed against us the cruelest and most autocratic military power on this earth. If that power be not checked or subdued, an intolerable servitude for the democratic nations of the earth will be the result. This is a fight between militarism and free government. It is a contest between the theory of reason and the theory of force, as exemplified by the policy of the present rulers of Germany. Should the theory of force prevail, there can be no safety for the free democratic peoples of the world in the future. Therefore, we must forget for the time being every interest except the interest of our common country, and, above all, we must divorce from our minds every consideration of personal or political fortune.

Germany has now under arms between nine and ten millions of well-trained and seasoned soldiers. They are in the field. Besides these, there are other millions from Austria-Hungary, Turkey, Bulgaria, and elsewhere. We have seen the fate of Belgium; we have seen Serbia crushed; we have seen northern France devastated; and while the destiny of our own beloved Republic quivers in the balance, while we hear the cry of down-trodden and oppressed people who are giving their lives that the cherished principles of free government may not perish from the earth, we are invited to play a coward's part beneath the Stars and Stripes. I will play no such ignoble part. I will not consent that my country shall play such a part; and those who have set themselves against the just recommendation of the President and his advisers unconsciously appeal to what they believe is the cowardice of those whom they attempt to represent. I am happy to believe that they are mistaken in their estimate of the people. There are millions of brave men who are willing to serve their country in any capacity; millions who are ready to give their lives for their country when the hour of need arises; but they do not wish to sacrifice themselves needlessly before that hour is reached. They do not know when they are needed; they can not know. They may not be the first to volunteer, for reasons that do not reflect upon their courage or devotion; and thus, not knowing when they are needed, and lest their courage and devotion be brought into question, they go, perhaps, before the need is reached, because under the old volunteer system each individual is compelled to be the judge as to when he is needed by his country.

While I was at my home and in my district during a few days in March, a district which in every war of the past has given luster to the traditions of the Nation by the imperishable glory of its soldiers, hundreds of brave men told me they were willing to go to the front when their services were needed. Who shall tell them when that need has come? Shall they be compelled to decide themselves, or shall the Government itself decide that question as it alone is qualified to decide it? And who shall say they are cowards? Who shall say they are not willing to give all that they are and all that they have to perpetuate and make more glorious the eternal principles of human liberty and freedom for which their forefathers died?

What is this system which has been proposed by the President and those upon whom must rest the responsibility of conducting this war? We have heard the War Department and the officers of the Army denounced because they do not wish to see a needless waste and sacrifice of human life. Why expend the people's money in maintaining a War Department and our Military and Naval Academies if their advice, their knowledge, and their experience are worthless? I am not a soldier, though I am ready to wear the uniform of my country when the need shall come. I am not experienced in the art of warfare. I do not pretend to be a great military expert who plans battles and wins wars, like some others who have been fighting atmospheric battles all this week; but I know enough about the science of warfare to know that every soldier must follow his commander in chief who carries the flag before the advancing armies, and that is where I prefer to take my stand in this trying hour. [Applause.]

Under the plan proposed and urged by President Wilson there shall be an enrollment of those who are between certain ages who are able to bear arms for their country. They will not all be chosen as soldiers. They will not all be needed as such. After the enrollment there will be what is known as a selective system put in operation, by which those will be selected for military service who can best be spared from the farms and industries of the Nation.

We can not blind our eyes to the fact that all our resources must be mobilized and conserved if we shall be successful in this conflict. We can not interfere with our agriculture; we can not seriously cripple other industries upon which we must depend to supply the Army and the people. Under the system proposed by the President the Government can choose among all those liable to military service those whose withdrawal from civil life will bring the least disorganization to the industrial forces of the Nation, thus building up a strong and efficient Army while preserving the integrity of our productive energy on the farm and in the factory. Such a system is fair and just. It is democratic, because it distributes the burden among all the people. It will place the son of the millionaire beside the poor man's boy. It will place the banker's son shoulder to shoulder with the son of the blacksmith and the farmer. However rich a man may be, he can not purchase his release from service. We must admit that all men owe a duty to their country, and I am unwilling to believe that any patriotic man wishes to escape his share. But men must serve in different capacities. Some in the Army, some in the factory, some on the farm, some in the shop, some in the railroad engine's cab, and the only competent authority to judge intelligently where each can best serve his country is the Government itself, at whose call every citizen is obliged to respond.

We are told that to adopt the selective draft is to depart from the traditional policy of the Nation and embark on a new policy. And yet during the Revolution Massachusetts and Virginia adopted that policy, and we can not forget how bitterly Washington complained because of the indifference of other States and sections toward training and supplying the soldiers; and while in the War of 1812 and the Mexican War we relied upon the volunteer soldiers, who added new fame to American arms, in the great Civil War both sides adopted the system which President Wilson is now advocating.

On April 16, 1862, less than two months after the meeting of the first regular Confederate Congress, the Confederate States adopted a system similar to that now proposed by this administration. That law was supported by Jefferson Davis and signed by him as President; it was approved by Lee and Jackson, and under its operation the Confederacy grew in military strength and power and postponed the day of its defeat. It is a striking coincidence that every member of this House who is an old Confederate soldier is going to vote for the President's selective plan. [Applause.]

The Union side in that great controversy did not adopt the system until 1863, a year later than its adoption by the South. But the significant fact is that both sides adopted it in the early stages of the war, and both sides realized that it would have been better if they had adopted it at the beginning.

This plan was strongly urged and approved by Washington, the Father of his Country. It was indorsed over and over by Thomas Jefferson, the greatest Democrat of all time. It was approved and indorsed by Abraham Lincoln and by Jefferson Davis, and it is approved by President Wilson, in every respect a worthy successor of these historic figures. It has also the indorsement of the military branch of our Government, upon whom we must principally depend for the success of this war. I am unwilling to ignore the advice and the warning of all these great men, living and dead, in this, the greatest crisis, perhaps, in our national history.

All the nations now engaged in the war into which we have been dragged have long since adopted the system which President Wilson now asks Congress to indorse. And if there is needed proof that soldiers chosen under such a plan are brave, turn to the battle lines of northern France and view the gallant defenders of Paris as they were led by that hero who is now the honored guest of this Nation, Gen. Joseph Joffre.

Mr. Chairman, I have confidence in our President. He is a peace-loving and just man. He must bear the brunt of conducting this war. If mistakes are made, he will be blamed. If the war shall terminate in a glorious and successful issue, bringing a proud sense of duty well performed to our hearts, and making the world safe for democracy, it will be due to his leadership in such a conflict. I am unwilling to cripple our cause before we start. I am unwilling to repudiate him now, just as the battle begins. I have followed him for four years and more. Wherever I have seen the flag fluttering in the sunlight and knew that it was borne by him, I have followed. I am unwilling to desert him now. And God pity me now if I should at such a time seek to consult my political fortunes at the expense of my country. I know that every man whom it is my honor to represent upon this floor wants to serve his country wherever he can serve it best; and believing, as I do, in the courage and the devotion of the people to the ideals for which we have been compelled to draw the sword, I await, with them, the call to duty, either in civilian garb or soldier's uniform, as the Commander shall decide, hoping that when the clouds of war have scattered and we behold again the sunshine of peace in its healing force and beauty, we may look upon a world wherein all nations may be self-governing and free; free from the terror of military despotism; free from the constant fear of alien domination; free from the blight of selfish and unscrupulous monarchs; free, finally, to pursue the ideals of a Christian civilization which shall make impossible of endurance a remorseless tyranny like that against which we now contend. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill and the amendments that will be offered have been more thoroughly and more ably discussed than any question ever presented to this House during my service as a Member. I do not hope to add anything of importance to this discussion nor of interest to the membership of this body. My only desire is to express my own reasons for voting as I do.

War between the United States and Germany is no longer a mere possibility, it is now a stern reality. It must be fought and won. Our actions to-day should not be influenced by sentimental emotions nor by personal considerations, but the question should be: What is best for our country and the quickest way to win the war with the least sacrifice of human life? I shall speak and vote with no other motive.

Left to my own judgment and my own choice in the beginning of the discussion of this question, I would have favored the volunteer plan, but I have been convinced against my will that to procure the most efficient army, and to conduct the war to the speediest and most successful conclusion there is no question but that the proposed plan of conscription will be the best.

I love the name of volunteer and know something of the heroism of the volunteers who have fought our country's battles in the past. I was taught during the Civil War and since to dislike the name of conscript, but I am not voting to-day for a name, I am voting for a system that nearly all military authorities agree is the best upon which to rely in time of war. No odium should attach to the name of conscript which is now used to designate those to be selected to defend our country in the hour of its peril; such selection with a ready response to our country's call should be, and and will be, an honorable distinction.

I honor the boy to-day whose brave heart and whose deep and unfailing patriotism leads him to offer as a volunteer in his country's cause. This bill will not take away from him the right to volunteer in the Regular Army or in the Navy.

It was the association of the names of volunteer with conscript during the Civil War that made the latter name repulsive, and the thought that produced it was this: The first or the volunteer freely answered his country's call, while the other was forced to go. The bill presented by the majority of the committee would, in my opinion, keep alive that distinction. It provides first for volunteers, and when that plan fails to raise a sufficient army, as it did in the Civil War, and would now, then the balance of the necessary army may be raised by conscription, thus creating two classes and tending tc discredit the so-called conscript. Volunteers as now provided for in the Regular Army will be continued by this bill and enlistments and service limited to the duration of the war, but under the special army provided for in this bill, if the conscription plan is agreed to, no volunteers in the special army to be raised will be called for, and no soldier will be criticized or held up to scorn for not offering his services as a volunteer, but when designated upon a plan of selection by reason of his fitness, his service will be honorable, and he will win the unanimous admiration and plaudits of his countrymen.

Many of my constituents seem to fear that under this law all boys of 18 years and over will be forced to enlist, but this is a mistake. This bill provides that the age of enlistment shall be from 21 to 40 years, and no boy under 21 years of age will be selected under this proposed law, and only a small per cent of them will be selected. The bill provides for an army of 1,000,000 men by two increments of 500,000 each. It is estimated by the best authority that there will be about 20,000,000 citizens of the United States between the ages of 21 and 40, hence, there will be required to enlist only about 1 in 20. Some insist that the great majority will be taken between 21 and 25 years of age, and possibly on account of the older men having families and more important duties to perform in civil life, this may be true, and if so and even if the entire army should be selected from those between the ages of 21 and 25, only about 1 out of 7 would be selected, as we are advised by the authorities that there are about 7,000,000 men between those ages.

Under the volunteer plan I have no doubt that a great number of brave boys would go who are needed at home to support wives and children or dependent mothers and sisters, and many who are engaged in important industrial and productive pursuits in which they can render more useful service for their country than they could in the ranks. Upon the other hand, many others with possibly less patriotism, who are not burdened with responsibilities at home and who are not engaged in the production of the necessaries of life, should be ready and willing to be selected, but who would probably not do so under the volunteer system.

One of the means of winning the war will be the production of a large supply of foodstuffs to feed our soldiers and to sustain our own people at home and, if possible, to furnish from our surplus products food for the soldiers of European countries who are fighting the common enemy; hence there is a most important work for our farmers to do, and for that reason the boys upon the farms who are cultivating corn, wheat, and other farm products should not, and in my opinion will not, be selected under this bill.

I desire to do what is best for my country in this crisis, and have given this question very careful and very serious consideration. I have become thoroughly convinced that the proposed plan of selective draft is not only best for the conducting of the war but will bring it to a speedier and to a more successful termination. I also believe that it is fairer to the boys of this country to divide equitably the responsibility of fighting the war among all the citizens of military age of all the country and in all the States, rather than to have its burdens rest upon those who might be first to enlist under the volunteer plan when in many cases others for many reasons should bear or help to bear the burdens.

In this war as in all others it seems reasonable to me that we should seek advice from those to whom we look to conduct it. The President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and all of the authorities in the military branch of the Government who must conduct this war to its ultimate conclusion, and to whom we look as our leaders to win a victory, favor the conscription plan of raising the necessary army. In finally reaching the opinion that I now have as to the proper course that I should take, I have yielded much to them and to their opinions.

Some of my constituents have advised me that the vote that I now intend to cast upon this measure is and will be unpoplar and end my political career. These suggestions have no weight with me and have not entered into my consideration of this question. [Applause.] I am perfectly willing to retire from Congress, but I am not willing to tie the hands or embarrass those to whom we look to successfully conduct the war and speedily lead us to victory. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the minority report of the committee. I have listened very attentively for many hours to the debate on the great question now before this body, and it seems to me that there is only one issue before this House in the consideration of the majority and minority report of the Committee on Military Affairs, and that is, Which one of these reports shall we adopt in order to do the best and the right thing in the interest of the American people and in bringing this war to a successful and speedy end? I have come to the conclusion that it is my duty as a Representative of the people to vote for the minority report, which provides for the selective-draft system. A large majority of the Members of this body voted for the war resolution. Now, I am one who believes that when we passed the war resolution we placed the burden of prosecuting and carrying on the war upon the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, the President of the United States, and as far as I am concerned I stand ready to give him all the help and support that lies in my power while we are at war with the most powerful military nation in the world. [Applause.] I listened very attentively to the address of Mr. CHANDLER of New York. He criticized the selective-draft system, but he did not state that he was going to vote against that policy; but he did say that he might vote "Present." Now, I believe Brother CHANDLER will be more consistent if he will vote against the draft system instead of voting present when the roll is called. I shall vote for the draft system, because I believe it is the best and most efficient way to raise our Army, and the only fair way to distribute the burdens of this conflict upon our people.

Everyone who heard the splendid, eloquent speech of our beloved Speaker yesterday was moved by his closing words, and when he said his son was going to offer his services to his country I could not help but think of one who is very near and dear to me. I well remember how I was overcome with emotion on the day last summer when I stood on Pennsylvania Avenue and watched our boys marching away to the Mexican border. How I eagerly scanned the faces as they marched by, and when my eldest son marched by in the uniform my heart came up into my throat and a tear stole down my cheek, but I felt proud of that boy. That boy is ready to serve his country again, and I want him to be big enough, noble and patriotic enough, to stand ready to be drafted into the service and used in whatever capacity his country wants him. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE].

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman, "As long as honest men counsel together" there must be differences of opinion, and while I shall differ from the majority of our Military Committee in the bill here proposed, I do so with the greatest deference and appreciation of the honest effort and conscientious service it has rendered this House.

I accord to each member and the distinguished chairman absolute sincerity and loyalty of purpose in the decisions rendered and recommendations made. I also accord to the minority members of this committee the same patriotic loyalty and devotion.

These differences are those of honest men desiring the same end, differing only in the means for their accomplishment.

I have not agreed with our President in many of his foreign policies, and have not hesitated to record my objections. I have not hesitated to disagree and criticize many of his acts in time of peace, but since our Constitution makes him Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in times of war, and as such, with this great responsibility resting upon him, I urge that the least he can expect is that no effort which this Nation can make should be left undone. Yet while the leader bears the greater burden we each may and do have an equal share in loyal service, and my share has been shown to me. By careful thought and the most thorough research at hand I have decided that my duty lies in loyal support of the President.

We may fight among ourselves, but when we face a foreign foe we should present a solid phalanx.

We have no quarrel with our German foes as individuals, and have only love and respect for our Teutonic citizens, and I have full faith in their loyalty to this country.

In this connection I desire to quote from a German-born citizen of my district, pastor of a German Lutheran church, he says:

I am for America all the time in this war with Germany. I have a son in the United States Army. I will fight myself for this country, if need be.

Primarily it is the God-given right of the freedom of the seas, for which America stalwartly stands to-day, and, as we all know, it was the taking of life and the destruction of our commerce upon the seas that led to the first break. Now the breach has widened and our obligations have broadened until the democracy of the world is at stake.

And as a nation we find ourselves—unwillingly to be sure, but nevertheless honorably—a part of the great powers of the earth which constitute the bulwarks of the defense of this democracy, and at this juncture it would be no less cowardly to decline to do our part than were the enemy at our very doors or actually invading our borders.

New occasions teach new duties. Time makes ancient good uncouth.

And now, as we stand confronted by these new and unusual conditions, some of us have felt that we have reached the parting of the ways; we have come to the point where we must part with an idol, lay down a fetish in our preference for and devotion to the volunteer system as inadequate to meet the demands of the present crisis.

It is not alone its inadequacy, however, to which we object, but we are convinced that the principle that in a democracy each citizen, by reason of the privileges and benefits he enjoys, is thereby charged with liability to service, and this can only be equitably secured by some proper system of selection.

We assume that every one owes this duty of service to his Government, and by the Government prescribing the kind of service he shall render a greater degree of efficiency is secured.

If, therefore, we adopt that system which will by Executive order enroll into the service every able-bodied man between the ages of 21 and 40 years from which he can be chosen at any time by an equitable and thoroughly protected system of selection, those required for any service, appears to me to offer the fairest and surest method of securing that service. [Applause.]

Under the plan of volunteer service many of our industries are deprived of that labor, which is as essential as an army at the front.

As instanced, the report from the governor of Colorado to the ways and means committee of stock production in that State, where he says:

It has developed that of the men who have so far enlisted in Colorado 80 per cent are from the farm, and this committee naturally feels that when the enlistments represent such a large proportion of farmers the result can not but be disastrous to the campaign to raise a big food supply.

They say conscription or selection is unfair to the mothers; it is of the mothers I am thinking. A truly patriotic mother rears patriotic sons, who would be the first to volunteer. [Applause.] Why should she give all, sometimes three or four noble boys, while none of her neighbors' sons may enlist.

While, therefore, we oppose the volunteer system for the reasons given, we also oppose it because we do not believe that we will be able to obtain in this way an army of sufficient size for our present needs, assigning my reasons therefor the following:

In the last half century of nonresistance and almost continuous material prosperity, we have grown careless and unappreciative of the blessings of liberty. The patriotic fiber of our national life has grown flabby; the keen appreciation of personal liberty growing out of, and made possible only by national freedom, has been dulled. We should awaken to the realization "That we deserve only the rights we stand ready to defend." [Applause.]

Therefore, after due deliberation, I have decided to support the measure reported by the minority of this committee, as more nearly representing the views of the administration as to the provisions best calculated to bring success to our colossal undertaking, having in view only the speedy and successful termination of the war upon which we, by our votes, have entered, and I trust in so doing I represent the conscience of the people of my district.

In matters of local interest a Representative may and should reflect the consensus of opinion of the people he represents, but in interests of national scope he should stand for the conscience of these same people, and he only is a fearless representative who stands true to his own convictions and conscience. [Applause.]

I believe I do not mistake the temper of the West when I say that its people would have only contumely and contempt for a mere puppet and reflector of public opinion. "Only deference can come from honest difference."

What does the political fate of any Member of this body matter when weighed in the balance of the fate of a nation? When a principle is at stake, what does personal preference mean to any man of integrity of purpose?

Whether I ever stand again on this floor in another Congress as the mouthpiece of the honest and liberty-loving people of the second district of my glorious State matters little to me, but whether I stand now at this critical period on the side of right and by the democratic principle of "the greatest good to the greatest number," and "justice to all and favoritism to none," does matter much to present and future generations. [Applause.]

On questions of divided public opinion we must each "dare to be a Daniel" and go through the crucible of the fire of criticism if need be. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK].

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, I shall not tax the time of the House, but I may, as a new Member, be permitted to say that I have been no less struck by the conviction and earnestness shown on both sides than I have been bewildered by the dissolution of party lines. The most appealing argument and effective opposition to administration measures has come from the Democratic side. Those who have found it their duty to criticize the course of American diplomacy during the two or three years just passed; those who have consistently opposed the administration's policy of deliberate unpreparedness are among the Members of the House who now unite their voices and their energies to those of the President to secure adequate military measures and an effective prosecution of the war.

The figures of straw men have been set up and bowled over before us to support the contention of those who have brought into the House a substitute for the Army bill submitted by the Secretary of War.

Those who would impose the volunteer system upon the country rest their case upon precedent.

They argue that volunteer armies have won battles; that volunteer armies conquered the heroic hosts of the Confederacy; that, therefore, such armies are best fitted for the present exigency. But mark you this: Among the hosts which marched with Lee and dauntlessly followed Pickett up the slippery slopes were thousands who would have been drawn by the draft had they not volunteered. It might as well be said that great captains won battles, great armies overran the known world, ignorant of powder, unacquainted with machine guns, and thus might do so again.

It has been charged here that the principle of universal service—of conscription—is unrepublican and undemocratic. Mr. Chairman, the armies of republican France, no less than those of Imperial Germany are conscript armies if by that you mean that every son of France be required to serve in her brigades if France so decide. Where to-day would be the liberties of Europe, of what value would be the efforts which we ourselves are about to put forth if France had not so marshaled her moral and material forces? If the obligation to military service be universal in oligarchic Prussia, it is no less in democratic Norway. There is not one of the little countries within the ring of fire which does not adhere to the principle of universal service—Sweden and Switzerland, Norway, Holland, and Denmark.

We are singularly forgetful of the origin of the democratic system of universal compulsory service which was devised by the lofty courage of those patriots who, when Prussia was prostrate under a supine Hohenzollern King, determined to throw off the yoke of Napoleon. Reference and inaccurate reference has been made to the parts played by Lord Kitchener and the present prime minister. It was Lord Kitchener, the oriental proconsul, the colonial administrator, the military organizer, the field marshal, the man of iron, who summoned the volunteer armies to the colors. But it was David Lloyd George, the tribune of the people, who has risen from a shoemaker's shop to the chiefest place in all Europe; it was Lloyd George who, by his energy and his genius, carried into law the principle that in war every man must serve his country as his country would have him serve it.

To-day among the great powers the United States shares with China the distinction of not requiring of all citizens the obligation to serve in the armies of the State.

The divergence between the bill submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs by the Secretary of War and that reported to the House by the committe is simple. The one has the support of those who cling to tradition; the other is supported by those who in the past and who to-day have profited by experience.

Washington and Grant as soldiers, Jefferson and Lincoln as civilians, who commanded the Armies of the Republic, spoke for the principle of the draft. So to-day speak the living ex-Presidents and the present Commander in Chief of the American Armies; so speaks Mr. Hughes, the President's recent opponent. It matters not that when he thought to escape war Mr. Wilson closed his eyes to the lessons of war, past and contemporary. Now that we are at war he has, through the Secretary of War, submitted to Congress a bill drawn upon his own initiative, the principle of which he indorses in specific terms. It is not legitimate argument against the administration bill to enumerate the administration's inconsistencies. History will do that implacably.

I would not belittle the quality of troops enlisted under the volunteer system when they have had ample opportunity for training and for discipline, when they are led by trained officers. Regular troops are enlisted under the volunteer system. I saw something of such troops in the last days of the Philippine insurrection. There, too, I heard of the quality of regiments from the Nebraska prairies and the Tennessee mountains. They were not unworthy to compare with the soldiers of any armies marshaled through the centuries between the shields of Thebes and the trenches of Flanders. But to-day it is not a matter of enlisting and of training a few such regiments. The bill reported by the majority calls for the enrollment of vast numbers of volunteers; their company officers to be selected from men among them, however untrained. It is upon the company officers that the responsibility must rest for training the units. If the bill of the committee were to become law, the Department of War would have to abandon all the plans which it has made for officers' camps, where it is purposed, by drastic and intensive training, to school and to select the most fitted for officers. Upon these young men will devolve the all-important duty of training the new troops, of safeguarding their health and their welfare. Upon the effectiveness of these new officers so trained will depend the very lives of the men committed to their charge as well as the success of our generals in the field.

The War Department bill has this supreme merit over the committee's bill: That the War Department bill, with its scheme of officers' training camps, is a plan to conserve lives; a plan not only to husband the economic strength of the country and to win victories, but, by the schooling of the new officers, to hold down the losses in our armies.

Arguments have been pressed upon us by speeches on the floor of this House, by mail, by wire to affect our decision upon this question. We are here to discharge as heavy an obligation as ever will fall upon any of us. Who has not heard the echo of whispers that the vote of one or another of us upon this bill or another may determine his political existence? Of what consequence is the existence of any of us when the lives of soldiers, the present security of the Republic and its future peace may hang upon our vote? By the overwhelming decision of Congress we have joined in a great struggle, and so joined, we can have but one purpose—to carry it through. There will come before us measures which may determine the issue of the war, but which were not before the country when we were elected. We must be guided by our best judgment, by conscience and courage. Across the waters there is not a country in which princes or prime ministers or generals have not been tried and dismissed. The tests of war are not the tests of peace. Orators and masters of political compromise have joined unsuccessful generals to give way to compellers of victory. So here political and personal prejudice must yield, that we may contribute to that end.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MCARTHUR].

Mr. MCARTHUR. Mr. Chairman, Congress is again face to face with the great problem of military legislation, and, before any action is taken, we who are intrusted with the lawmaking machinery of the Government ought to ponder seriously over the lessons of experience and profit by them. A study of our military history leads us to the inevitable conclusion that the volunteer system has proved inadequate to the country's needs. This system has regularly broken down under each successive test. At the opening of the American Revolution the Colonies depended upon volunteers, but by the end of the year 1777 Massachusetts and Virginia were forced to resort to the draft. In 1812 the volunteer system broke down again, and during the Civil War both the North and the South finally adopted the draft or conscription method. Even in our brief war with Spain the full quota of volunteers called for by the President was never obtained. The recent failure of the volunteer system under the test of the Mexican border mobilization is too fresh in our minds to need elaboration at this time.

I am not saying anything in criticism of the volunteer, for he has proven his patriotism in every emergency; but I do say, without fear of successful contradiction, that the volunteer system is a failure, for the simple reason that it has never furnished the desired number of men; and if the past is any criterion for the future, it never will furnish them.

Mr. Chairman, in a democracy like ours, where government rests upon the people's will and where the day laborer and the capitalist are political equals, there is but one military system that will meet the requirements of the times and give us that security from invasion and that respect to which we are entitled among the nations of the earth, and that is the system of compulsory universal military training. This system is based upon the theory that every man owes a duty to his country which he should pay in part by personal service in time of need, and it is only fair to him that his country should so train him that if ever an emergency arises and he is called upon to serve he may do it with the greatest possible efficiency.

The absolute civil and political equality which the men of America enjoy is the corner stone of our democracy. Every civil and political right, however, carries with it a corresponding obligation, and unless these obligations are equally distributed among all the people there can be no real democracy. The volunteer army system is undemocratic because it imposes obligations upon a comparatively few who are willing to serve and who come forward in time of need. To be really democratic our military burdens must fall equally upon all classes and conditions of people. [Applause.]

Opponents of universal military training are wont to say that it is undemocratic, but they fail to furnish us with the proofs of their assertions. The system has been tried out in France, Switzerland, and Australia, and has not only caused an evolution and growth of democratic principles but has made for a stronger national unity.

Opponents of universal military training tell us that it will eventually build up a top-heavy military system, and that we will be prone to go to war on the slightest pretext. They evidently forget that the proposed term of service is brief, and that the country's Army will be in a constant state of development, with recruits coming in and trained men going back to take their places in civil life and to act merely as reserves. They overlook the fact that the growth of the universal military training movement has witnessed a gradual reduction of the size and strength of standing armies or "regulars." Under the proposed system the "regular" will have his proper place, but he will be outnumbered manyfold by the young man who comes from civil life and who at the end of his training period goes back to that life with his mind on peace and the pursuits of peace. The American people are not a warlike people. They stand for peace, but not the peace of cowardice or surrender, and they will fight when their national honor has been violated or when some great principle of government or humanity is in the balance, but it is idle to say that a simple system of military training for the youth of the land will lead us into the throes of militarism.

Universal military training causes increased devotion to the Government and its institutions and makes every man feel that he is an integral part of the plan of national unity. It brings the citizen into closer relationship with his Government, increases his respect for law and order and for his flag, and develops patriotism to the highest degree. In other words, it make a man feel that he himself is a part and parcel of the scheme of national existence. There is no disputing the fact that throughout the country men, young and old, have fallen into the habit—particularly during our recent years of rapid commercial and industrial development—of regarding themselves as apart from the Government, and have paid too little attention to public affairs. Many of them have felt that the price of their emancipation is a tax receipt, a carelessly marked ballot deposited in an election booth, or occasional jury service. Equality of military service will, however, increase the pride in citizenship and bring home to every man an enlightened sense of having to play a part in our scheme of national existence.

Universal military training can not help but impress the American immigrant with the idea that he owes something to his adopted Government and that this country is really something more than an asylum of refuge or a place of sordid commercialism. The immigrant will soon learn that America will tolerate no such thing as divided allegiance, and, once taught to love our flag and respect our institutions, the immigrant will become the citizen and will know no other allegiance.

Universal military training will discipline the mind and train the body of our young manhood and will teach the lessons of self-restraint and self-control—all tending to sturdiness of character and greater individual and national efficiency.

Universal military training contemplates a better understanding between capital and labor, for it provides that the men in the service and in the reserve are to be used only in the event of war and not in the settlement of industrial disputes. Members of labor organizations and their sons who have heretofore refused to join the National Guard because of the fear of being called upon to quell strikes and labor troubles can not have the same objection to serving in an army that is to be used only for national defense or actual warfare.

Last but by no means least, universal military training will do more than anything else to preserve the great heritage for which our fathers fought and which they have handed down to us. It means that we will have an army capable of meeting any emergency and that those priceless treasures of free government for which Washington fought and upon whose altar Lincoln shed his life's blood will be preserved to us and to our children and our children's children. [Applause.]

The Chamberlain universal military training bill contemplates a service of six months in a training camp or on a naval vessel for every able-bodied American youth who has reached his nineteenth birthday and has no one dependent upon him for support. Is it an unreasonable requirement, when we stop to consider that it is our country's safest form of insurance against war, and when we think of the length of service and the untold sufferings of the men of Brandywine, Saratoga, and Valley Forge?

Mr. Chairman, many gentlemen tell us that they are in favor of universal military training but are opposed to the selective-draft law which has been recommended by the administration. Their position is illogical and inconsistent. The selective-draft, or conscription, method is the practical application of the system of universal military training. The last Congress failed to enact a universal military training law, and consequently we must begin at the beginning, and at a time when our country is actually at war. We have no time to apply universal military training as a peace measure, but must adopt it as a war measure, or, in other words, must adopt the selective-draft system. The arguments advanced pro and con on universal military training apply with equal force and effect to the selective draft.

Gentlemen tell us that we should give the volunteer system one more trial. They are merely temporizing, for the lamp of experience is still burning brightly, and the longer we cling to the antiquated and unsatisfactory system the longer we postpone the creation of an effective Military Establishment. Without reflecting on the patriotism of those who still advocate the volunteer plan, but seriously questioning the soundness of their views, I can not help but feel that they are unwittingly playing into the hands of our enemy.

It is proposed to authorize the President to call for volunteers and if this means of raising an army should prove ineffectual then to enforce the selective draft. I, for one, can not countenance this plan. If we are to cling to the volunteer plan, let us say so; if we are to adopt the selective draft, let Congress assume the responsibility. There should be no shifting or dodging of this question, for the welfare—in fact, the very life—of the country may hinge on our action. Delay may prove costly. If England collapses under the stranglehold of the German submarine, her armies are lost and France is lost and the common enemy will be on our shores, with a combined fleet outnumbering ours two to one and with a seasoned army of millions of veteran soldiers. Can any sane man doubt what we must face if Germany chokes England into submission? This is no time for experiments or for consideration of our own political fortunes. We must act, and act quickly, intelligently, and patriotically, and, above all, we must not dodge our responsibility as lawmakers. [Applause.]

The President is Commander in Chief of the Army, and after due consultation with trained officials of the War Department he has indicated his belief that Congress should speedily authorize the selective draft. He wants no halfway measure. He may be willing to accept the responsibility of choosing between the volunteer plan and the selective draft, but I am not in favor of imposing upon him a responsibility that properly belongs to Congress. I shall stand unflinchingly for the selective-draft system: First, because the President and the War Department have recommended it; second, because I believe it to be sound. I am not afraid to assume my share of the responsibility to the American people on this question. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, protests have been made against the free exercise by our friends in the press gallery of their selective conscripted privilege of printing funny stories about us, with or without foundation.

They do this largely because their readers are entertained by it.

About the funniest creation they have seen fit to honor me with was to publish broadcast the assertion that I came here pledged to compel Congress to meet each morning at 8 o'clock, and they declared that if I ever started a move for Congress to meet earlier than high noon the staid and sedate older Members were organized to give me the "once over," and I would never again try any ginger moves.

This story is especially amusing in the light of the fact that the first time I gained recognition on the floor to speak on April 5 it was at 3 o'clock a. m., and on this occasion I have begun my speech at 1 a. m. If on the first occasion you delightful colleagues of mine were giving me the "once over," then I am constrained to believe that on this occasion I am now receiving the "twice over."

Mr. Chairman, it would be one of the happiest moments of my life were I able to speak on the time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] rather than upon the time of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], for while my conscience compels me to support the minority report, approved by the President, my judgment and heart are upon the other side of this question.

The platform upon which I was elected to Congress embraced the following principle of Democracy:

> That public office is a public trust and the holder is a mere servant of the people charged with executing their will, however ascertained or expressed, and that the repudiation of the known will of the people is a betrayal of public trust and confidence, which can not be too highly censured.

During my race with the distinguished gentleman who for 14 years was a Member of this body I was handicapped by his broadcast use of a telegram from the President extolling him for his unswerving support to the administration and indorsing him for reelection. I was further handicapped by a telegram from the ex-Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, telling the people that it would be a calamity to the administration not to return their Congressman to Washington. I was further handicapped by that memorable address to "Baby Congressmen" of our beloved and matchless Speaker, 50,000 copies of which just prior to the primary election were so untimely franked to that number of voters in my district, advising them "not to swap horses in the middle of the stream," for to replace their old, true, and tried beasts of burden with modern untried pacers and fox trotters would prove an irreparable mistake.

In such a great exigency, having implicit confidence in the judgment and never-failing statesmanship of our great Executive, I gave my pledge to the people that if they would elect me I would support the President in all of his plans and policies. Exercising their God-given right of selection, under the belief that they were sufficiently qualified and acquainted to make their own choice between Democratic neighbors, my people selected me as their Representative to express in my vote not my will but theirs. And, Mr. Chairman, as long as it means the sacrifice of sentiment only and it does not require the abandonment of some sacred principle, I intend, so help me God, to keep my pledge and to stand by the President, even if in doing so it disrupts and dismembers sentiments and ideals which are a part and parcel of my very being and which have been cherished since the cradle.

When I made this pledge little then did I believe that so soon I would be tested with a trial by steel and by fire. I had been raised under environments which taught the southern young manhood of our country that a conscript was a name to be held in reserve and applied only when the use of all other appellations failed to provoke a difficulty or to express the real idea sought to be conveyed. In reaching my decision has meant no easy struggle.

Considering that only once in its history has America in its desperation used conscription, and it then proved a failure both to North and South, for the Confederacy conscripted a total of less than 70,000 men, and authentic reports prove that in 1865 there were 100,000 deserters, two-thirds of whom were conscripts; that democratic Australia refused it by a majority of 68,000; that out of a total mobilization of six and one-half millions of soldiers by England, five millions were volunteers, and that England resorted to conscription only for the purpose of keeping a pledge which the premier had made to the husband volunteers in the army; that my native State stands ready to furnish upon call at least one-tenth of the 500,000 men first to be demanded. Considering further that there are 22,000,000 American citizens in the United States able to do military service, and over 1,700,000 white aliens and 68,000 other aliens in the United States who could be selected, if necessary, at least to do industrial or agricultural service for the country which furnishes to them shelter, food, clothing, amusement, and protection, and because of the above, it is indeed hard to understand the necessity for robbing the homes of immature boys 19 and 20 to bear the awful responsibilities of this war. I first tried to believe that surely the President has been overly persuaded by military experts, upon whom in a large measure he is forced to rely, and that the people of my district would be willing for me to support the majority report, which seeks to give to the President exactly what he wants, but by a slight change in his program; and hoping against hope, knowing that conscription was repugnant and abhorrent to many, I sent telegrams to the various portions of my district, putting the naked proposition before them for decision: "Should I support the President if he demanded conscription?" and the voice of a great majority came back: "Stand by the President! Give him what he wants!"

Mr. Chairman, I am no embezzler of power. I do not promise on the hustings that which I will not fulfill when the roll is called. When it comes to pass that the will of the people can not be executed, there is but one alternative, and that is for the Representative to hand back his commission. But, Mr. Chairman, we people of west Texas are not quitters. My people did not send me here to desert my post of duty under fire and vacate their office when the time for action came simply because my judgment conflicted with their will. With all my heart I thank God that the President has approved of the action taken by the minority in raising the minimum age limit to 21, for with the lights before me I could not vote to force a 19-year-old boy, who has no vote or voice in this Government, to give up his precious life unnecessarily when several million of able-bodied, physically and mentally fit patriots over the age of 25 are ready and willing to shoulder the responsibilities of this war and save the immature American boys of our country. And I want to go on record now, if the Senate tries to force down our throats their proposed conscription of 19-year-old boys—a proposition not insisted upon by the President and not one of necessity, but merely a cold-blooded economic business plan of military experts—that, in my judgment, just as the Military Committee voted it down by the almost unanimous vote of 20 to 1, I believe that this House will plant its uncompromising stamp of disapproval upon it by even a greater majority.

Oh, but repeatedly it has been said on the floor of this House that the people who are clamoring "Stand by the President" do not understand the situation and do not know what the President has demanded.

If you have lulled yourself into repose by imagining such a thing you were never more mistaken in your whole life. I will stake my political existence upon the fact that when the Sixty-fifth Congress adjourns the farmers of my district will know the fundamental essentials of more bills voted upon in this House than any Member of it, excepting, of course, the Speaker, who is where he could not escape the acquisition of this intelligence even if he so desired. While the daily press at times has criticized us unjustly, and occasionally to empty seats we have gotten even by roasting them unmercifully, yet we must give the devil his due and admit that through the great press of our Nation, which daily is delivered to the rural doors of our country, it is impossible for us to keep secret that which we do here, and the farmer and laborer has become better posted on current happenings than the ordinary business man of the city, who does not take the time to read so intensely.

There is remaining to me, Mr. Chairman, one great consolation, that this selective bill, even after passage—and it will pass—can never make conscripts of my people, for in the largest district in this Nation, that runs 550 miles east and west and nearly 400 miles north and south, with 58 big counties in it, embracing about 400,000 people, the spirit of its citizenship has already volunteered and tendered its services to the Government, and like a solid phalanx they stand behind their President.

From El Paso, 2,250 miles from this Capitol, and during the past two years at times these border citizens imagined they were twice that far away when necessity forced them voluntarily to repel Mexican invasions, comes the unanimous battle cry, "We are with the President." From the Davis Mountains to Fort Stockton the command is the same. In the Concho country of San Angelo the electric wires flash the intelligence "Give the President what he wants." In the plains country on the north they say, "We personally prefer volunteering, and do not like conscription, but if demanded by our President give him what he wants." From Mineral Wells on the east, which for years by its health-restoring waters has put hope in the faces of disease-stricken people scattered over these United States, comes a like expression. From my own home town, Abilene, which harbors none but patriots, comes:

Be it resolved, By 10,000 citizens assembled in the city of Abilene beneath the Stars and Stripes for the purpose of symbolizing our patriotism for our Government, in a grand parade which has just taken place, that we heartily indorse the plans of President Wilson for recruiting the Army by selective conscription, to the end that an army sufficient to win victory may be organized, trained, and armed at the earliest moment possible.

From the stanch west Texans of Brownwood comes this enlistment:

At patriotic mass meeting, following parade mile long, people voted follow Chieftain's orders as volunteers or by conscription. Four thousand present. Brown County could raise four or five companies on urgent call in 10 days.

If any of you gentlemen do not believe that the people of your district are behind the President, then one of two things is certainly true, either your people are fundamentally different from mine or you have not had your ear as close to the ground as I have had mine.

Mr. Chairman, I am supporting my President because I am keeping my campaign pledges and representing the sentiment of my people. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee: I find myself in a very unique position at this time. I was a Member of the Fifty-fifth Congress. I had traveled extensively in Cuba and knew of the terrible conditions that prevailed at that time on that island, and when Congress convened I was a strong advocate of American intervention and took an active part in the declaration of war against Spain for the liberation of Cuba. I had been a member of the National Guard of Pennsylvania for 10 years and had enlisted as a private and served three years in the ranks. When the guard was called into the service of the United States I promptly left my seat in Congress and tendered my services as a volunteer. At the training camp at Chickamauga, Ga., I was in a brigade composed of three regiments—the Fifth Pennsylvania, the Twelfth Minnesota, and the First South Carolina. It would be impossible to state which one of these regiments showed the greatest patriotism, enthusiasm, and willingness to undergo the hardships of that encampment. Subsequently I saw service on the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, serving throughout the entire war. And now I find myself returned as a Member of the Sixty-fifth Congress from the twenty-second district of Pennsylvania, and the first duty that confronted me when this Congress was called in extraordinary session was to take part in a declaration of war against Germany, so that back in my district, composed of the counties of Westmoreland and Butler, I have been called "the War Congressman," which, of course, is furthest from the fact, because each of these wars are waged on behalf of human liberty, free democracy, and for the purpose of establishing a permanent peace.

On the 5th of April we passed a bill declaring that a state of war existed between the United States and the Imperial German Government, brought on by the ruthless attacks of German submarines on American commerce on the high seas and the murder of American citizens, and on the 23d of April we finally passed, concurring in the Senate amendments, a bill appropriating $7,000,000,000 toward prosecuting this war to a successful conclusion. There now remains two principal steps to be taken before the operations of this war can be actually begun.

First. The raising of an army of soldiers; and Second. The raising of money by taxation to support that army and repay the great war debt we are about to incur under the bond issue authorized.

The bill we have under consideration known as H. R. 3545 is entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase 'temporarily' the Military Establishment of the United States."

This bill has come from the Committee on Military Affairs, as shown by the report of that committee, with a divided recommendation. The majority of the committee standing for adopting the volunteer method of raising this army, and the minority of the committee recommending, as the President has styled it in his message, "Universal liability to service." In other words the committee is divided as to which of the only two recognized methods of raising an army—to wit: "by volunteer" or "by selection"—should be adopted by the Congress.

I am, myself, a Spanish-American War veteran, and entered that service as a volunteer. My prejudices and my training alike are in favor of the volunteer system. The great State of Pennsylvania, from which I come, has furnished volunteers for every war in which this country has been engaged.

During the War of the Rebellion Pennsylvania's quota was 385,369. She furnished by volunteer 337,936 men and only 28,171 by paid commutation.

As further evidence of Pennsylvania's patriotism I beg to call the attention of this House to the fact that when President Lincoln issued his first call for 75,000 volunteers on April 15, 1861, while Pennsylvania's quota was 12,500, this State actually sent 20,175. The next State to her in number was New York, that sent 13,906.

With this splendid record of the volunteer soldier of my native State in the great rebellion, it would be with great hesitancy that I should abandon the volunteer system and support the principle of compulsory service.

The sentiment in Pennsylvania on this is now indicated by a resolution passed unanimously by the house of representatives of that great Commonwealth on the 29th day of March, 1917, which is as follows:

Concurrent resolution 11.

Whereas the subject of universal military training has been and will be presented to the Congress of the United States; and
Whereas there should be enacted into law a universal military training bill: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (if the senate concurs), That we earnestly indorse the principle of universal military training, and urge upon the Members of Congress from the State of Pennsylvania to aid in the enactment of such a universal military training law as will now and hereafter provide for the common defense, promote and maintain the general welfare, safety, and happiness of all the people, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, together with the action thereon, be sent to each Member in the Congress of the United States from the State of Pennsylvania.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution passed in the house of representatives on April 2, 1917, and concurred in by the senate April 3, 1917.

THOMAS H. GARVIN,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

This therefore indicates that the sentiment in my State is now in favor of "universal military training." It, however, must be borne in mind that there is a great distinction between "universal military training" and "universal compulsory military service." Universal military training along the lines known as the Swiss system should be adopted in this country, and every young man between the age of 18 and 24 should be drilled, disciplined, and prepared in some branch of the military service, but this should be done without taking these young men from their homes or withdrawing them entirely from the industrial pursuits in which they are engaged, or interfering permanently with their education or their acquisition of trades, or their preparation for the serious business of life.

We have in Pennsylvania a National Guard of approximately 12,000 men. They have 48 large, commodious, and completely equipped armories and are adding to this number rapidly each year, so that in a few years there will be an armory in every community in which there is a company of the guard. These armories are now used on an average of but one night a week, leaving open five nights that could be used under a system of compulsory military training during the winter by five times the number of men now in our National Guard; then approximately 60,000 men in the winter season could be drilled in manual of arms, guard duty, setting-up exercises, the duty of sentinel, squad, and battalion movements, company formations, and so forth. In the summer these men could be concentrated on the State camp grounds and perfected in marksmanship, regimental, brigade, and division maneuvers. This system would afford practical military training for men of the Commonwealth and prepare them for actual warfare, and this system could be adopted in all the States.

War is now the most complicated, highly specialized, scientific, cruel, and barbarous pursuit. My brief military experience in 1898 was with an army that did not know of the aeroplane as its most effective scout, and with a navy that did not fear the submarine as its most dreaded enemy, nor the deadly gas. The automobiles and the armor tanks are developments largely of the present war; hence the importance of preparing the men who are to meet these new and terrible means of destruction before they are called to the trenches, which seems now largely to be the battle field of modern warfare. The universal testimony is that it requires months to prepare an army for service. The testimony of an expert recently returned from the battle fields of Europe is as follows:

Men can not be trained for service in the trenches or on the firing line of the European battle fields in less than 10 months or a year, according to Capt. A. T. Robertson, of Kirklands, Melrose, Scotland, a British officer who was engaged for many months in training the sons of Scotland for the war now in progress.

"You can get men ready for lines of communication in six months," said Capt. Robertson. "There is no reason I can see that here in America you should not have an army fit for such service in that time; but it would not be possible, in my judgment, to train men for trench warfare inside of 10 months. That was our experience in England."

And in this opinion the experts generally agree. We are, therefore, confronted with what is the best method of raising and preparing an army to meet the responsibility of this terrible conflict.

In my opinion the question of whether the opportunity to volunteer is given in the first instance before the draft is exercised, or whether the entire Nation is to be enrolled and a selective draft made of those available for military service, is a most important step. If we are to enroll the entire Nation, and then select by lot those that are to perform military service, and take only those that are not in the excepted classes provided for in the third section of this bill, we will have departed from the universal practice hitherto followed in this Republic, and there must be some very good reason for such departure before the country will indorse it.

It is estimated that the military strength of the United States is probably between fifteen and twenty millions of men, who, after deducting the exempted classes, and at this time when labor is scarce, when it is said that it requires five persons at home to maintain one man in the trenches, and when it is proposed to excuse all those who have persons dependent upon them for support, certainly the amount of men left available for military service would not exceed 5,000,000 in number available for the first call. From such a small proportion of our population it would not be possible to secure by volunteers a sufficient army to fight this great conflict. Then, upon the principle that each man owes to the country the duty of protecting and defending it, it would seem that liability to military service in the present conflict should be rendered obligatory. It must not be overlooked that this bill only provides for "a temporary increase" of the Military Establishment.

I would not vote to create a great permanent standing army, with a great corps of officers and an immense budget to bear the annual expense of its support. This would indeed be setting up a military despotism, which is the very system that we combat in our war with Germany, for it is well understood that if the Kaiser had not been backed by a great and thoroughly trained and efficient German Army he would not have swaggered through Europe for the last 10 years, a menace to the peace of the world.

But the bill proposed by the minority suggests compulsory service of the boys between the ages of 18 and 25. With such provision I am not in accord. There is no reason why a man of 26 or 36 or 40 should not be as liable to military service in the defense of his country, if he is otherwise available, as a man of 21, and it is unfair and unjust for those of us who are past the military age to vote that boys who are under 21, who have no voice in the affairs of the Government, who are learning their trades and acquiring their education, and in that period of life when their character is formative, should be ruthlessly taken from their homes, forced into the Army, or driven to the trenches of Europe. This bill should operate on all men available for military service between the ages of 21 and 40 and should be administered in such a way that each State, each county, and each election division should be called upon to furnish its just quota in proportion to the available men therein, and credit should be given to each congressional district for the soldiers already furnished, whether in the National Guard or otherwise in the service of the United States.

While it is true it has been suggested during this debate that the men available for military service in the United States are probably between 15,000,000 and 20,000,000, yet this bill excepts all the following men from the operation of the draft:

And nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing whose creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations, but no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be noncombatant; regular ministers of any religious denomination; and the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only, persons of the following classes: Customhouse clerks, persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mails; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the other service of the United States as the President may designate; pilots, mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces during the emergency; those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable; and those found to be physically and morally deficient. No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists.

Hence, when this sifting process is completed, and all those excepted classes taken out, we will have, in fact, taken stock in the Nation. All men that are needed in the industrial pursuits, farms, factories, and mines will be relieved. My district is especially short at this time of skilled and general labor; for the workshops and mines and manufactories and farmers the men to keep these sources of supplies going will be under special Government supervision, and the products of this labor so greatly needed for the most effective uses in this great crisis, will be provided.

In other words, this selective draft applies not only to the military service but to our industrial conditions as well. This war may be won by "bullets of bread." It is necessary to keep the "hoe behind the flag." It is essential that the great munition plants are efficiently operated to their full extent and that our farms be tilled and planted.

In other words, we are in a contest against the most efficient military and industrial organization on earth and we must meet it with like efficiency and determination. Therefore, taking a broad view of the difficulties that confront the American people in this world war, endeavoring to profit by the blunders and shortcomings of England and France at the beginning of the war, let us seek the system that seems most likely to lead us to avoid their mistakes. That system, of course, is a system of universal liability to military service of all men between the ages of 21 and 40 years, and from this number, by applying the system of the selective draft, should be chosen the Army of the Republic. This army in the field, by the same principle of selection, will be backed and supported by an army five times as great, working in the industries, upon the farms, and in general business under national control. With such an efficient organization a nation of freemen numbering 100,000,000 can not meet defeat.

Mr. Chairman, we now have in the trenches of France and in various arms of the French military service, according to the latest available information, 40,000 Americans. These should be organized at once into an American army and marshaled to fight under the Stars and Stripes. There certainly ought to be extended to them national recognition and the benefits of our pension laws and our greater pay of military service than that which they receive from France. Moreover, it would be a great encouragement to our allies, indeed, to see the Star and Stripes borne at the head of American troops in this war for human rights and free democracy.

We have a Regular Army also, which numbers, when recruited to a war footing, 287,000 men. At least 200,000 of these are now seasoned, drilled, and equipped troops and can be spared and sent forward at once to the trenches.

The next step is the recruiting of the National Guard up to war footing, and this can be done very quickly if the word is once given out from the War Department.

The adjutant general of Pennsylvania informed me by letter under date of April 21, as follows:

The National Guard has not been recruited to its full war strength for the reason that the recruitment has not been authorized by the War Department. The organizations of the National Guard have been directed to recruit to the regular peace strength of the Regular Army, and that is being done very satisfactorily.

This would give us an army of 625,000 National Guardsmen, which added to the regular Military Establishment of 287,000 would be about 1,000,000 men armed, equipped, and ready for service.

The opportunity to volunteer in the National Guard and in the Regular Army would seem to furnish ample opportunity for those who wish to volunteer in the military service of the United States, and when these organizations are recruited up to a war footing we will have a Regular Army of 287,000 men and National Guard furnished by the various States containing 625,000 National Guardsmen, or a total army of almost 1,000,000 men armed and equipped. It is true that only so much of this army as is composed of regular soldiers would be ready for immediate service beyond the limits of the United States.

It would require several months to drill and equip the National Guard and prepare it for the foreign service. In the meantime such census could be taken as a necessary preliminary step to applying the principle of selective military service. By this process all of the troops raised outside of the Regular Army would be taken in under the principle of obligatory military service without placing any under the stigma of having been drafted. It is highly important that all of these troops preserve their State organizations and designation, which has been shown to be so essential to military efficiency, bravery, and service.

Mr. Chairman, it has never been considered an honorable thing throughout the North to have been drafted into the War of the Rebellion. It is always a great and joyous occasion among our people when there is a regimental or company reunion of the veterans of the Grand Army of the Republic, but I have never heard of any of the drafted men holding a reunion since the Civil War; hence we want to avoid this and place this military service upon another principle, to wit, that of "universal liability to service," an obligation that all acknowledge and freely submit to.

By the inauguration of the universal military service policy every citizen will have discharged his duty when he has registered. It would then be the function of the governmental authorities to determine whether he is qualified to serve and whether he is needed. The entire defenses of the country could then be organized upon a scientific basis and in a manner that would least disturb economic conditions.

The allusion has been made in this debate to mistakes and blunders made during the Spanish-American War. These mistakes were chiefly in the Medical, Quartermaster, and Commissary Departments. The scenes depicted by the gentleman from New York in the hospitals of Chickamauga are very familiar to me. I assisted on one occasion in removing from the general hospital there the bodies of 16 young men who died of fever during the previous 24 hours. All of these should have recovered under the proper medical treatment, but they received little or no attention and died of neglect. On the Government docks at San Diego, in Cuba, I have seen piled up hundreds of cases of baking powder, on one side (an article little used in the Army) and on the other, hundreds of cases of mess pork. The hot sun had fried the grease out of the pork until it ran down the street out into the bay. Tons of it were simply permitted to spoil, while the men on the front were in need of supplies. Inefficiency was also too noticeable at every turn. A law should be passed to punish all who cheat the Government with life imprisonment.

These costly blunders can only be avoided by a complete and efficient organization of our Military Establishment from the top to the bottom, backed by a complete organization of our industrial establishments at home. And believing that this bill makes for this, I am willing to depart from the traditional practices of this Nation in the first instance and stand by that which the President asks for, on the advice of his military experts, to wit, the principle of selective draft.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that with prompt action on this bill authorizing the President to take stock in our Nation in military resources as well as of our industries, and to establish and enforce at once the principle of a selective draft, to send forward the troops that we now have available, to operate in connection with our Navy, that we will be defending ourselves against the attack made upon us and rendering prompt and effective aid to our allies, and will be meeting this emergency by intelligent and effective action.

There is no justice in placing the whole duty of bearing arms for the country on the free and willing. The duty of bearing arms when called upon in defense of the Government and laws, the national life, and the integrity of the national territory, whether against a foreign or a domestic enemy, is obligatory alike upon all able-bodied citizens not for wise public reasons exempted. There is gross wrong in devolving the whole burden of bearing arms for the country on those whose patriotism and sense of public duty lead them to volunteer, while we leave the unpatriotic, the indifferent, the ill-disposed, the sluggish at home to fatten on their blood and suffering, to plot mischief against the State, or to join in conspiracies for defrauding the Government. These are as much bound to expose their lives in defense of the country as the brave, and have as great a stake in its defense. Justice demands that these men who say to others, "go," but go not themselves, should be compelled to take their turn and bear their share. By this process military service will be placed on the same basis as payment of taxes.

Much of the opposition to the idea of compulsory military service grows out of the misunderstanding of what is really meant. It is characterized as "conscription," "draft," and "compulsion," which words are, of course, unpopular in the free government. It does not mean this; it simply means to impose the burden of defending the Nation in arms impartially upon all citizens, rich and poor alike. It means that for a few of their vigorous years all the young men of the country who are physically fit, or who are not for a good reason excused, would be compelled to spend a few months each year in interesting military exercise and improving studies. They would be compelled to live under more favorable physical and moral conditions than usually expected in civil life. They would be compelled to obey and learn from a singularly efficient and honorable class of their fellow citizens, the officers of the Regular Army. They would be compelled for a few months of their youth to lead regular lives, to spend their strength intelligently, to know their own bodies, and to command their own minds. Those who shudder at the word "compulsion" in the discharge of such duties to their country fail to appreciate not only the privileges but the burdens of true citizenship in a free Republic. The example of the free democracy of Switzerland and Australia has proven this. Switzerland, although surrounded by the greatest military powers of the world, has maintained her freedom, and Australia, where military service is obligatory, has shown the fiber of her soldiers upon the battle fields of Europe. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, the Constitution places upon us the duty of declaring war and providing men and money with which to prosecute it. This same Constitution places upon the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the supreme obligation of carrying on this war. He, and those who are associated with him in the military establishment of the Government, have asked the enactment of the bill recommended by the report of the minority members of the Military Committee of this House. The President has information that we do not have. His advisers are better able to judge the necessities of this great war than we are. I hesitate to assume the responsibility of placing any obstruction in the way of the President by my vote that might interfere with his successful prosecution of this war. I shall stand by the President in this great national crisis and support him. The military plans of the President have the unqualified indorsement of the military experts of the War Department, of ex-President Roosevelt, of ex-President Taft, and, I believe, of the country generally; and, supported by this strong indorsement and sentiment, I shall cast my vote in favor of the minority report and to sustain the President. And when this war is over, as it will be sometime, and the victorious American Army is returning, I will have at least the consolation of knowing that I voted so that it should be a real American Army, including within its ranks not only the great but the humble, not only the poor but the rich; in fact, all classes of our American citizenship; and, flushed with victory as they come, this will be the sentiment that I think will be sounded by their patriotic lips:

Oh, it is home again, home again, America for me!
I want a ship that westward sails, across the rolling sea
To the blessed land that is wide enough, beyond the ocean bars,
Where the air is full of sunshine, and the flag is full of stars.

[Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY].

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, frequent reference has been made in the course of this debate to the history and achievements of our volunteer service. I yield to no one in respect and admiration for the valor and patriotism of the American volunteer soldier. My earliest recollections are inseparably associated with supreme reverence for the immortal record of his glorious deeds in the Civil War. But that record is not in issue here. In its last analysis the issue under debate is bottomed on the question whether in the authorization of a great Federal Army to prosecute war on behalf of all the American people the Congress shall apply the principle of universal obligation to military duty, or whether it shall ignore that principle until such time as the individual volition of courageous patriots may have failed to meet the military requirements of the country. If the latter course should be adopted, the majority of those subject to military duty would not respond to such a program. History demonstrates it, and no amount of argument, however exhaustive and specious, can avoid the force of that incontestible fact. Such a result would be unfair. A system which would make it possible would be unjust and therefore indefensible.

The bill as reported by the majority of the committee provides for a demand for compulsory service in a given contingency, clearly recognizing the right as one to be exercised as a last resort and providing it as a reserve power likely to be required as a matter of military necessity. If those who would be shielded by the proposed volunteer plan are to be subject to selective call as an incident to military necessity, there is no sound reason why such liability to compulsory service should not be given immediate and unconditional effect. The only reason logically deducible from the face of the bill for the dual arrangement it provides is to protect those who may be unwilling to enlist at least until the volunteer system fails. A system under which all respond at once, however few may be chosen, is far more equitable and is consistent with the relation existing between the citizen and the Republic. When a citizen registers and submits himself to the military authority of his country it should remain for the Government to determine when, where, and in what way he may best serve its interests. Whether he be sent to the front in battle or to the field or the factory for military purposes or be not called at all, he discharges the duty of service or proffer of service common to all, and the country which dictates his course will justly record him a patriot. Whatever be his lot, no finger of reproach can ever humiliate him, no idle tongue slander his good name nor challenge his honorable record.

I am unable to understand the course of reasoning by which those who oppose applying the principle of universal liability to service in the first instance on the ground that it is fundamentally wrong readily sanction its application on the ground of military necessity when the volunteer method fails. If selective conscription is inherently wrong in one case, it is equally so in the other; and if it is essentially wrong in any case, no necessity, however grave and impelling, can make it a righteous expedient. On the contrary, if it is right at any stage of the military program—and the bill recognizes that it is—it is right at all stages, and as a matter of common justice it should be applied from the beginning to the end.

So far as possible equality of burden in a Republic should always be applied as a basic principle. We do not apply the voluntary principle in our schools because the public welfare requires a degree of universal elementary education which would not be voluntarily acquired. We do not apply it in taxation because the burden which should be justly imposed would not thereby be uniformly assumed. We do not apply it in the selection of jurors, nor in any other sphere of action where the public is peculiarly interested in the result of the service of the individual. To trust to its application where life and death are directly involved would be as repugnant to reason as it is to common prudence. We can not afford to adopt a policy the operation of which is uncertain. Time alone can reveal the results of the volunteer plan.

Under it, while time runs its course, we can only wait and wonder, however much the cause to which we are committed may suffer. Old conditions have passed away. Preparation for war must be made with reference to those which now exist. Under present world conditions and modern methods of warfare industrial and military efficiency must be concurrently maintained. To weaken one is but to destroy the other. The selective plan affords adequate means for the equal support of both. The volunteer method will either fail to produce the men, and compel resort to conscription, or, producing the men, it will strike a blow at the industries essential to the support of our people and our armies.

In the present emergency no action on the part of this Government can exert a more far-reaching or salutary effect than the adoption of a military policy which will assure the world that the American people stand as an indivisible unit behind and in support of the military plans and purposes of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Our country is at war. That we must provide for a large Army and that it must be raised in the most expeditious manner all agree. Expert advice calls for selective conscription, and it calls for it now. The Department of War recommends it and the President urges it. It is contrary to sound policy for laymen to ignore the advice of qualified experts.

I deem it my duty to have regard to the judgment of those best qualified to advise with respect to military affairs. This is no time for division. Unity and cooperation are vital. It is the constitutional prerogative and duty of the President to conduct the war. It is inconsistent and unsafe to charge so grave a responsibility and at the same time limit the exercise of the executive function by denying him the means which he asks to give it effect.

The costly mistakes of Great Britain abound with suggestion. Her experience ought to be our heritage.

The successful prosecution of the war to the earliest possible termination, and the ultimate victory of our national arms with the least possible loss of American lives, are the prime considerations which should determine the action to be taken on this bill. With these ends in view I indorse and intend to vote for the policy advocated by the minority of the committee. The world waits while we deliberate. Civilization seems to hang in the balance. When our country moves forward, as it is about to do, into the great arena of war with all of its tragedies and horrors, I want to see it move with all its strength and might and power, with all of its pledged resources organized and coordinated into the most effective, self-sustaining, and invincible fighting force on all this earth, in behalf of the just rights of America and the bulwarks of human liberty. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SWIFT].

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, the legislation which will be enacted as the result of this debate will be of far more importance to the vital interests of every home in our land than the formal declaration of war, and yet, despite its fateful character, I believe it will receive the sanction of the people determined to uphold the President in the prosecution of his epochal policy in defense of the Republic and the common cause of mankind.

The Congressman who stated, yesterday, it is very likely the people are behind the President but so far behind they do not know what he is calling upon them to fight for, impugns the intelligence of the people, and if he maintains his attitude will find that the people are moving closer to the President and that he will be so far behind the people that his separation will be extremely painful.

In the progress of this debate the honorable motives of the press have been assailed by a few Members whose attacks, on their own admissions, originate in rumors and are developed by hearsay and intangible evidence.

I deprecate the public expression of such sentiments, as I believe that the press since the commencement of the European conflict has been consistent in its devotion to the Government and steadfast purpose to unify public opinion in support of the President's great policies.

The editors of the country are diligent students of history, possess a broad conception of the political philosophy of our institutions, and quickly respond to the pulse and aspiration of the Nation. The attitude of the press in the present crisis is distinguished by its lofty and patriotic quality and is representative of the noble ideals of a free people.

The paramount issue presented to Congress in the consideration of the controversial reports of the committee is whether the military policy of the Republic in the precipitate creation of armies composed of volunteers inaugurated in the colonial period, and the pursuit of which our national experience has shown is often involved in disaster and the reprehensible loss of life and treasure, shall be continued or supplanted by the adoption of the comprehensive and effective system of selective draft founded upon the knowledge and judgment of military counselors.

While the advocates of a volunteer army to cope with the present emergency remind us of the successful issue of our former wars, they ignore the record of humiliating defeats, the prolongation of conflicts, and the shameful wastage of human life occasioned by the atrocious violation of the fundamental principles of war.

The valor and devotion of both volunteer and conscript is not disputed, but glorified by imperishable deeds of heroism and emulation, and any controversy concerning the relative standards of elective and involuntary service should be deprecated.

A notable distinction, however, exists between the two great methods available for the creation and organization of national forces.

An army of volunteers musters in random fashion, regardless of age, domestic obligations, industrial depletion, or agricultural exhaustion. Moreover, in protracted wars of great magnitude, the inevitable human wastage must be replenished. If the indispensable increments of fresh troops do not readily respond, then conscription must be invoked, and its enforcement after the collapse of the volunteer plan creates discontent and occasional resistance to governmental authority. The incitement of this unhappy consequence is obvious.

At the inception of hostilities, multitudes, inspired by patriotism and influenced by the anticipation of a short war, supply the quota of troops solicited by proclamation, but as the duration of the conflict lengthens, successive appeals for additional recruits gradually exhaust the class of citizens swayed by sentiment until enlistments become negligible, and when thereupon to insure complements in existing forces or such increase as may be required in the numerical strength of the military establishment, conscription is ordained, it primarily affects the individual reluctant to perform any military service and personal protests may occur.

The volunteer plan is accommodated to the theory that the performance of military duty should be submitted to the individual for determination, and in numerous instances the burden of the decision reposes upon frail or aged kindred and not upon the Government where it rightly belongs.

The selective draft, however, is founded on the well-established principle of universal military service, and in its application affirms that the inclination of the individual is subordinate to the interests of the State.

The policy of conscription proposed in the pending measure is a scientific modification of the common military liability recognized by all nations, and even the notion of voluntary service heretofore practiced in our own land springs from this traditional belief.

Although the Civil and Spanish-American Wars were waged by volunteers, yet the statutes under which they were called enunciated the principle of universal military liability. The declaratory clause in the act of 1863 provides that all able-bodied male citizens of the United States between the ages of 20 and 45 years constitute the national forces, and shall be liable to perform military duty in the service of the United States when called out by the President for that purpose, and the statute of 1898 similarly prescribes that all able-bodied male citizens between the ages of 18 and 45 years shall constitute the national forces, and, with such exceptions and under such conditions as may be prescribed by law, shall be liable to perform military duty in the service of the United States. The conclusions of two distinguished authorities, Bvt. Maj. Gen. Emory Upton and Gen. James B. Fry, counsel the rejection of the volunteer plan.

Among the lessons of the Revolution narrated by Gen. Upton the following possess great significance:

That neither voluntary enlistments based on patriotism nor on bounty can be relied upon to supply men for the Army during a prolonged war.

That the draft, connected or not connected with voluntary enlistments and bounties, is the only sure reliance of a Government in time of war.

That when a nation at war relies upon a system of regulars and volunteers or regulars and militia, the men, in the absence of compulsion or very strong inducements, will invariably enlist in the organizations most lax in discipline.

He stated his observations upon the results of the War of 1812 in the following terse language:

The lessons of the war are so obvious that they need not be stated. Nearly all the blunders committed were repetitions in an aggravated form of the same blunders in the Revolution and, like them, had their origin either in the mistakes or omissions in military legislation.

Gen. Fry, who as provost marshal general administered the enrollment act during the Civil War, compiled an invaluable report on the urgency, operation, and result of this progressive legislation, important extracts from which report I now submit:

NECESSITY OF THE DRAFT.

During the latter part of 1862 the necessity for a radical change in the method of raising troops in order to prosecute the war to a successful issue became more and more apparent. The demand for reinforments from the various armies in the field steadily and largely exceeded the current supply of men. The old agencies for filling the ranks proved more and more ineffective. It was evident that the efforts of the Government for the suppression of the rebellion would fail without resort to the unpopular, but nevertheless truly republican, measure of conscription. The national authorities, no less than the purest and wisest minds in Congress and intelligent and patriotic citizens throughout the country, perceived that, besides a more reliable, regular, and abundant supply of men, other substantial benefits would be derived from the adoption and enforcement of the principle that every citizen not incapacitated by physical or mental disability owes military service to the country in the hour of extremity. It would effectually do away with the unjust and burdensome disproportion in the number of men furnished by different States and localities.

But it was not easy to convince the public mind at once of the justice and wisdom of conscription. It was a novelty, contrary to the traditional military policy of the Nation. The people had become more accustomed to the enjoyment of privileges than to the fulfillment of duties under the General Government, and hence beheld the prospect of compulsory service in the Army with an unreasonable dread. Among the laboring classes especially it produced great uneasiness. Fortunately, the loyal political leaders and press early realized the urgency of conscription, and by judicious agitation gradually reconciled the public to it. When the enrollment act was introduced in Congress in the following winter the patriotic people of the North were willing to see it become a law.

After a protracted, searching, and animated discussion, extending through nearly the whole of the short session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, the enrollment act was passed and became a law on the 3d of March, 1863. It was the first law enacted by Congress by which the Government of the United States appealed directly to the Nation to create large armies without the intervention of the authorities of the several States.

The main objects of the law were in general terms: First, to enroll and hold liable to military duty all citizens capable of bearing arms not exempted therefrom by its provisions; second, to call forth the national forces by draft when required; third, to arrest deserters and return them to their proper commands.

The public safety would have been risked by longer delay in the enactment of this law.

PRINCIPLES OF THE DRAFT.

The true principles are embodied in the enrollment acts, namely, that the country must look to its citizens for its safety and honor; that when engaged in war, military service may be rightfully required of every male citizen of proper age and suitable physical and mental condition; that the number of the men to be taken at any one time from a community, whether they go voluntarily or by draft, shall be in proportion to the number of men liable to military duty in that community and not to the number of its residents, including men, women, and children.

THE RESULT OF THE DRAFT.

This draft, though not directly fruitful in producing men, served the essential purpose of substituting the reality for the semblance of conscription, and of establishing the power and determination of the Government to proceed in the reinforcement of its armies. When it was resorted to volunteering had stopped and would not have been again started without the spur of the draft.

The successful operation of the volunteer plan under the present favorable industrial aspect is dubious. Its advocates ignoring the scarcity of labor and the attractive inducements prevailing in all avenues of employment, assume that the prompt enlistment of the first contingent of 500,000 men is an assured achievement. If each volunteer were qualified, the assumption might be justified, but experience indicates that as disabilities and exemptions exclude a substantial majority of applicants, the examination of 500,000 volunteers yields about 150,000 recruits. It is therefore apparent that 2,000,000 men of unwarlike temperament must voluntarily subject themselves to the hazard of acceptance if 500,000 effectives are marshaled for military service. It is unlikely that such an event is anticipated by the most ardent advocates of the volunteer plan, certainly not by discerning and reasonable men familiar with current commercial conditions. Nevertheless, the enlistment of 5,000,000 volunteers in Britain is advanced as one of the most potent reasons for the continuation of methods pronounced unsound and inefficient by the War College and all profound students of our military history. The testimony produced before the committee disclosed the fact that England's army comprised 2,000,000 pure volunteers and 3,000,000 additional recruits obtained by public humiliation or social conscription. Such devices would not be tolerated in America.

Modern warfare requires the scientific mobilization of all the resources of the Nation, and therefore sentiment must be superseded by sensible and logical business methods. The enlistment age of the recruit is a matter of grave concern, and I believe that the recommendation of the War Department restricting the application of compulsory military service to young men between the ages of 18 and 25 years should be adopted. Vigorous protests against the enactment of such legislation has developed on the plea that it is unjust that our fighting forces should be entirely composed of the young men of the country. All great wars, however, have been waged by young men. The record of the ages of Union army recruits in the Civil War, compiled by the sanitary commission, shows that the mean age of all soldiers in that conflict was 25 years and that when classed by ages the greatest number of volunteers were 18 years of age.

Mr. Chairman, the pending military proposal is one of the results of the recent remarkable address delivered by the President to Congress in joint session—an address, Mr. Chairman, that will be accorded high rank as a great historic document and which seems to fulfill the prophetic words of Gervinus, the famous professor of history at Heidelberg, proclaimed in 1853, in his classic introduction to his projected history of the nineteenth century, that the vocation of the nineteenth century would be the establishment of political freedom in the continental nations of Europe. This great mission has been transmitted to this generation for its noble and lofty consummation. The President has pointed the way by which our honorable purpose will be achieved, and in this great cause we consecrate our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, my duty, as I see it, is to support the President's plan for conscription. I would not blot one page of history which records the glory of the volunteer soldier. I love to turn those pages and read of his valor. I stand here to-day in the Congress of the United States with an uncovered head in the presence of his memory. I am sure no one on either side of this Chamber desires or intends to rob one act of his of its brilliancy, nor take from one exploit of his its daring and its glory. He was the man of the hour in '61; he was the man of history in '65; he was again the man of the hour in '98. We all love to look upon the picture still hanging in our homes of the young man of '61 in his little coat of blue with his musket by his side. He was our kinsman. God bless the valor, the heroism, the memory of the little volunteer. No thoughtful person will ever speak of him in other than words of praise—almost reverence. It has pained me therefore to hear in the course of this four days' debate the insinuation on the part of some that we who candidly and honestly believe in the merits of selective conscription at this time are depreciating the services of the volunteer in the war of 1861 and in the Spanish War. I am sure no Member intended it as such, for no Member would intentionally be so unfair.

The life and history of the volunteer soldier, especially of 1861, overflows with honor and renown. Let us leave him where honor and glory have placed him and then let us turn the pages of a half century and more of history and a half century and more of daily human progress of a busy world.

We must not overlook the fact that the world has turned around a good many times since 1861, and the human mind has been at work. In different ages we find different conditions. Wars in different ages are fought through different agencies. It throws no light on the present to state what the Greek and Roman did. Their military establishment is no more of a guide to us to-day than would their civil establishment be a guide to us in the present hour. The organization, discipline, and strategy of their armies has no more relation to our condition to-day than have the weapons with which they fought. We find ourselves in a different condition; the human understanding has progressed, and our plans must be laid accordingly. Military strategy approved even a half century ago could not be followed out to-day without inviting almost certain disaster and defeat. New ideas, new thoughts, new principles, call for new remedies, new and different solutions. A system which was feasible and practical years ago is no criterion of its feasibility to-day.

The first thing that we must do is to divorce ourselves from the dash and daring in the wars of half a century ago. The romance of war has gone. It is now the slow, cold process of killing and starving by systems worked out with infinite pains and patience. The military systems of 50 years ago bear no more relation to the systems to-day than did the trenches at Gettysburg bear relation to the trenches on the fighting zone in France to-day. The volunteer is outgrown. We all regret his passing. The cold, solid facts of the development of the modern system forces us to this admission; the horse-drawn supply train was good in its day, but it is outgrown now. The human temperament has changed, too. We are far more analytical to-day than we were 50 years ago. Our sense of natural justice between man and man is more keen, and the relation between the citizen and his Government is infinitely closer. This is the spirit of the age. There never was a period in our history when legislation so affected the individual citizen as within the last 30 years. All of this forces us to recognize the fact that inequalities which have heretofore existed will not be tolerated now. The constant tendency of 30 years of legislation has been to equalize and to distribute responsibilities, benefits, and duties. Our whole system of public-welfare laws is founded upon this modern principle. This is the tendency of the times. Privileges long enjoyed by some are no longer permitted; they are unthinkable to us to-day.

There is no better evidence of this modern tendency than the laws enacted by this body. We are becoming infinitely more discriminating. All of this has had its effect upon the national temperament, or perhaps the change in the national temperament is reflected in the legislation. The truth is, the American people have changed temperamentally in many particulars. This modern trend has caused us to look more closely into personal injustices, and thus we come to the institution known as the volunteer soldiery of the Republic. Our natural conception of right and wrong, between man and man, compels us to recognize the injustice of a system which allows the willing hands to do all the work and the unwilling ones to do nothing. Our sense of justice compels us to object to a system when applied to the citizen and his Government which permits the willing ones to fight the Nation's battles while the unwilling ones seek places of ease and safety. It is unjust that willing hands should carry all the hazard and risk of War; it is wrong that unwilling ones should carry none. This is the case of the great, big-hearted, patriotic volunteer soldier. No young man should be permitted to sacrifice himself because he is full of good, red American blood, while the young man across the street rests in safety because his blood is yellow. If God made this fellow deficient, let us see if we can not help him out a little. It is wrong, fundamentally wrong, to reward the scamp and coward with personal security from danger in time of war. Bring the young fellow out of the poolroom, away from the bright street lights of the night, jerk him away from his cigarettes and let us make a man of him of some use to his country—let us compel him to be a man.

The law of equal distribution of duty, the strong arm of the Federal Government will transform him, and he will soon yield to the patriotic duty and feel the inspiration of his country's call. Let us get after the slacker, the fellow with the yellow streak; the patriot will take care of himself any place. All the Government has to do with him is to hold him back. The darkest blot upon our military institutions of the Civil War period was the injustice heaped upon the volunteer soldier. Thousands and tens of thousands who survived that awful period to their dying day were and will be victims of that injustice. We all admire their self-sacrifice and devotion. We love to pay them the honor which is their due, but that does not help them in meeting the competition and demands of life as they find it in their declining years. No wonder some of them, conscious of the injustice their patriotism brought upon them, are crying out against the order of things which permitted it. Four men stayed at home in 1861 where one went to the front as a volunteer. Four men taking advantage of the prosperous times in business, which war always brings, reaped the financial benefits which should have been distributed among the five. Our volunteer received no benefit of the country's commercial activity, and when he returned, even though sound in body, he found himself outclassed in the competition of civil life. We can trace many a great fortune in these days to the money-making proclivities of the slacker of 1861. No wonder the feeble old veteran in the Soldiers' Home is still crying out against this order of things.

I have in my district one of these homes, superb in appointment, splendidly managed, with every comfort, but still there is not a veteran there who would not far rather be sitting at his own fireside free from poverty and secure from want. As the result of the system he found at his return in 1865 that the slacker had outdistanced him in every walk of life. These old, tottering veterans are thinking of it now. They have been thinking of it for over 50 years, and I ask in the name of God will mankind learn nothing from the teachings of experience?

If those good old heroes had not been so impulsive, not so full of good, red American blood, and if the law had carefully distributed and apportioned the burden of war amongst them all—if each had borne his part—there would not be the bitterness of disappointment which follows these grand old men to their graves.

This system, or lack of system, whichever it is, appeals to us as wrong according to our modern conception of right between man and man—between the citizen and his Government.

There is another phase of the matter. Much of the argument against a selected army is based upon the romance of the volunteer. God bless the volunteer. I can not mention the word without a thanksgiving in my heart that we had such men.

One would think from this debate that it was all smiles and joy and song and dance when the volunteer marched off to war. No picture is drawn here of that tear-stained, weeping mother, left perhaps alone and without support, standing in the roadway and following with her dimmed eyes as far as she could the form of her little volunteer as he marched over the hill to the place of muster. All the mournful scenes on the floor of this House are from the weeping mothers of the departing conscript. There are two pictures, my colleagues, and both are sad; I know not which is the sadder. Do not forget that the mother, however self-sacrificing, however heroic, shed the same tears of anguish in the past and will shed them in the future over her volunteer son, as any mother will ever shed over her conscripted or selected son. No wife, no mother, wants her husband or her son sacrificed, whether he be volunteer or conscript. And it is unjust that the willing ones should be first.

I can see in the future thousands and thousands and tens of thousands of American mothers thanking this Congress—thanking the God who guided it—that it saved her from sending her son as a duty-devoted volunteer. Do not you think, my colleagues, that many a mother will thank us for saving unto her her boy who would have volunteered? In tens of thousands of American homes there will ascend the thanks of patriotic mothers that a just and equitable law of equal distribution of war's burdens has saved unto her her patriotic son. She will now say to herself, "He is ready," and the son will say to himself, "I am ready when my country calls me." I can see thousands and thousands of homes made happy by realizing, by knowing that the call will only come to it as it comes to every other American home—all made possible by the laws' equality.

I know of homes in distress to-day because it is therein known that the son is awaiting the call for volunteers. I know of other homes tranquil and happy because the son there is resting in the full belief that volunteers will be called for and he knows he does not have to go, and he knows that he will not. There are thousands of fathers devoid of patriotism, there are thousands of doting mothers equally so waiting for this call for volunteers, for they know their sons will never respond. These same people are hoping and praying against conscription, for they know full well that if a legally selected army is formed their sons will take their chances equally with the boys who feel it their duty to go but can not.

Every Member of this House has received letters—"appeals"—from parents to save their boys from enforced military duty in this time of war. I have several of these in mind, and it spurs me on with renewed energy to see that this class especially shall not wholly escape. It doubles my zeal in behalf of a principle born of justice that they shall bear their share of the burdens inseparable from war. We all know that war has its horrors. We all know that destruction of life is its very purpose, that success is rated accordingly as the death rate multiplies against the other. These letters, these "appeals," emphasize the necessity for a just and equitable method of selection. My motto is, "By all means get the slacker first."

The day is past, I hope gone forever, when the red blood of America shall bear all of the hazards of war, and the white or the yellow blood shall bear none. Shame on the American who will not do his part! Shame on any American, on any man or woman, boy or girl, who enjoys the blessings of American liberty and freedom and will not defend it! Shame on anyone who hears the call of God's humanity for help, and he turns aside and walks away!

I have heard it advanced in this debate as an argument against the selective system that the Government will have difficulty in enforcing it. I shall never admit such a weakness of our institutions; I shall not for one instant admit that American manhood and womanhood are of such blood and bone. I can not believe that any American will fail or refuse to perform his duty when he knows he is only being called upon to do his just and proper share. If there is such, we all know we have caught a slacker in the net. There will be no opposition from the patriotic, from those who would otherwise volunteer. No protest will come from the willing ones, they will be ready and anxious to go and perform their duty in good and rounded measure. But if there is opposition, we know the slacker—the man or boy with the yellow in his make-up—is complaining, because he can not shirk, because the law will not permit another to do that which he ought to do himself. But, thank God, the true American is in overwhelming majority, and leave it to him what becomes of the slacker, the coward, and the shirk. He will have a way of his own to deal with them.

The American people are in earnest in this war; the Government of the United States is in dead earnest. There is little time, nor is there the mood to deal with the physical and moral coward. But there is time, an abundance of it, to listen to the good, true American boy who answers his country's call, but who ought not, either in justice to his country or himself, be permitted to go.

This is a war for the preservation of our civilization, a war for humanity itself. This is a war to determine whether our civilization, founded upon peace and sustained by peaceful pursuits, shall govern the world or whether a civilization founded upon a military autocracy shall be the destiny of the race. It is a war, therefore, to which every man and every woman should pledge his life until our cause shall be won and victory shall be ours. In other wars the mothers of the land gave freely of their sons to sustain the glory of our Republic. I can not and will not believe our womanhood has decayed. I shall not believe it. On the contrary, I believe American motherhood to-day, as ever before and ever in the years to come, will not only rally to the support of our land and our institutions, but will rally to the defense of God's humanity when an assault is made by a nation whose mission is to destroy it.

I believe it is the duty of Congress to stand by the President and his policy when he and his policy are right. The romance of the past must fall before the cold, stern facts of the present and the duty which those facts reveal. We must not look backward only. We must look forward into the future. We can not live forever amid principles and systems of yesterday. We must construct; we must advance in harmony with human thought. We are living in a tense age, a practical age, the most intensely practical since history has been written of the doings of men. We are living in an age of constructive thought. The idea that the principles and systems of half a century ago can not be improved upon, as seems to be entertained by some, is wholly at variance with the progress of the human understanding.

I shall vote for a fair and just selection law for military duty in this war, and face the future with the consciousness of knowing I have best performed my duty as I see it before me to-day. There is no other course for me to follow. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKELL].

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Chairman, in the last Congress, and in this one, I have consistently favored all measures for military preparedness.

Undue anxiety to be kept out of the war has had the opposite effect and we are at war.

The compulsory military training bill should be immediately passed and action all along the line should be substituted for oral and written language.

Theodore Roosevelt backs up his Americanism by offering to fight, and innumerable men from various paths of life criticized as favoring war, but not enlisting, will be found on the firing line, making the same sacrifices as other American citizens.

While there are some misguided, and many who are hypocrites, that is no reason why the faithful should abandon the performance of patriotic duty.

MENTAL FOG OR TWILIGHT STATE.

Twilight states are usually temporary, but they may last for varying lengths of time; they may last for weeks or months. The cessation of the state is, as a rule, sudden, the patient waking as though from sleep.

I can only express the hope that the awakening from the "twilight sleep," relative to the war situation, which is bound to come, if not already here, be speedily accelerated.

The progress made in Russia alone compensates for the sacrifices made in the present war. The consummation of a similar result in Germany by the removal of a parasitic emperor and a military caste, with the substitution of a republic in its place, will doubly pay the price exacted.

Gen. Horatio C. King, a beloved Brooklynite, veteran of the Civil War, accomplished in literature, music, and the law, besides being blessed with a goodly share of the milk of human kindness, generous and congenial to all, venerated by a host of friends throughout this broad land, under whom I studied law, and afterwards with whom and for several years I had the honor of being associated in the practice of the law, makes the following statement:

I do not know that Congress cares to take advice from the soldiers who saw war in the sixties. We know the weakness and the folly of the volunteer system.

The Government started wrong by relying upon volunteers. When the early excitement was abated it was evident that the Nation could not be saved other than by conscription. But the war had been going on for two years before drafting was enforced. This was the summer of 1863, and the frightful draft riots ensued. I do not forget that late one evening I superintended the shipment of a battery of light artillery from Washington to New York. It reached there early next morning, and it was that battery that opened on the mob very early and that ended the riot.

At a meeting of the Society of the Army of the Potomac in Portland, Me., in 1890, Gen. Sherman was presented after Gen. Walker's oration. He was in a very happy mood and talked much upon volunteering, and in one sentence he said, "I do believe, as I believe in Him who rules over us all, that this country spent one thousand million dollars and 100,000 precious lives to teach you the art of war."

Some in Congress want to repeat this folly. Some, too, desire to renew the farce of a joint congressional committee on war. I recall the infinite jealousies and complications which that committee caused. Let Congress vote to provide the necessary support for the war and leave it to the Government to look after the fighting. Let them take the hint from Lincoln, who put Gen. Grant in the command of the whole Army and told Stanton and Hallock to keep hands off and that Grant had supreme control.

In conclusion permit me to say that I deem it is a patriotic duty to follow the only logical course open to be pursued in the present crisis, that of supporting the President of the United States, and I shall freely lend my support for compulsory military training and all other measures relative to the war situation toward presenting a united front in this time of our country's trials, with full confidence that in the end those who have conscientiously opposed some of the war measures will be converted and realize that no mistake was made by extending unequivocal support to the President and Government of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the average listener to this debate must at times have wondered whether we are at war with Germany or with the War Department. [Laughter.] The President of the United States has sought to avoid in this war many of the mistakes that were made in our past wars.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. PLATT. No; I can not yield to a gentleman who will not allow me to finish a sentence. I have but 10 minutes and regret that I can not yield. The President, as I was saying, has sought in beginning this war to avoid the mistakes in policy of our former wars, but has found that first he has to fight the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs and then has to fight the orators of this House, the heights of whose flights of oratory are only exceeded by the depths of their ignorance of some essential facts in the history of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the ink had scarcely been dry on the Declaration of Independence nine months before Congress passed a draft act—April 14, 1777. A second draft act, February 26, 1778, assigning quotas to the States and appointing places of rendezvous for the men. Under this act the New England levies were to assemble at Fishkill, in my district, a beautiful and ordinarily a peaceful little village just north of the Highlands of the Hudson. The New England levies were to assemble at Easton, Pa.; the New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware men "at camp"; the Virginians at Alexandria and Shepardstown; and so on. The expression "at camp," of course, at that time meant Valley Forge. Now, I do not mean to say that these draft acts were enforced fully, or even partially. The Continental Congress was without ability to enforce its acts, but they show very plainly that the volunteer system of raising troops was not the great and glorious success so eloquently pictured to us by the orators who oppose the policy of the War Department; they show very clearly that it had in fact, so early in the initial struggle of our forefathers for liberty and independence, practically broken down. And if anyone wants any further evidence to convince him of the truth of this statement he has only to turn to the letters of Washington, many of them written from the historic old Hasbrouck House at Newburgh, N. Y., also, I am proud to say, in my district.

Washington lamented again and again that the Congress was without power to establish a proper military policy based upon universal liability to serve and declared that if such a policy had been adopted at the beginning of the war many valuable lives would have been saved and the war for independence would have been much shortened.

Mr. Chairman, how readily do the ear-splitting orators flock to the superficial side of every great question, as moths to a candle light! They see only the glitter and glare. They take as by instinct the side which they think will be popular, without giving themselves the trouble of any investigation of the facts or any thought as to the right or wrong of the policies they advocate. Oratory was defined by a great philosopher of ancient days as the art of making the worse side appear the better, and too often that definition applies in this House. The orators too often depend upon tricks of speech and flights of fancy to conceal their lack of information. Thus the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON], formerly a United States Senator, made a great hit with the opponents of the administration's Army policy by an exaggerated approximation to a correct pronunciation of the word "staff" every time he desired to ridicule the General Staff and the War Department. It was the only approximation to correctness I was able to detect in his entertaining oration. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I marvel that so many of the orators of this House should know so much more about how to conduct a war than the Army officers who have given their lives to the study of war and to the training of men for war, and I want to say that it is time to stop this cheap talk about the General Staff and the officers of the Army of the United States. A finer body of men or a body of men more devoted to the service of their country does not exist than the officers of our Army. [Applause.] I want to call attention to the fact that some of the men who are opposing the administration and attempting to discredit the War Department and the officers of our splendid little Army are men who have opposed every movement for upholding American rights, who opposed the declaration of war, and the inference is obvious that they are now seeking to hinder the prosecution of the war.

No, I can not yield, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman who desires to interrupt me. I know that American volunteer soldiers have been among the best soldiers the world has ever seen when trained for service. It is the system, not the men, that we are opposing. I know many of the men who volunteered to serve in the great Civil War from my own district. They were splendid men, as a rule. The regiment from my county was commanded by Col. John H. Ketcham, afterwards for nearly 40 years a Member of this House and well remembered by all the older Members. The regiment from an adjoining county of my district came under command of Col. Thomas W. Bradley, also for years a Member of this House and my immediate predecessor. There were never finer men or better soldiers than the early volunteers of the Civil War; but I may add that there were volunteers and volunteers. If every man who serves his country because his country requires his service and selects him is a conscript, then every man who volunteers his services is a volunteer. The bounty jumpers of the last year of the Civil War were volunteers. Some of them volunteered early and often. The Germans who served in the British Army in the days of the Revolution—the so-called Hessians of our old-time school histories—were volunteers. Some of them deserted from the British Army and volunteered on our side after the fatal policy of paying bounties had been inaugurated, then deserted and volunteered again in the British Army. Did you know that some States during the Revolution tried to fill their quotas of troops with these Germans or Hessians, and that Washington had to make regulations declining to accept them?

Those who laud to the skies the volunteer system have little to say about the bounties paid in the Revolution, the War of 1812, the Civil War; but those bounties amounted in the aggregate to an enormous sum of money and led to the grossest abuses. They tempted some young men who had rendered good service to desert and reenlist under assumed names. I know one old man living to-day, blind and helpless, who served his country well for nearly two years in the Civil War, but is denied a pension because after nearly two years of good service he yielded to the temptation of a big bounty, deserted, and reenlisted under an assumed name in my own home city. His pathetic case alone, Mr. Chairman, I think would determine me to vote against the plan of "giving a trial to the volunteer system" proposed in the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs. How can you prevent the giving of local bounties "in order to avoid a draft" when you give your trial to the volunteer system? I know that a northern city of 15,000, not a thousand miles from my own home, in order to raise money for bounties in the Civil War sold 7 per cent bonds amounting to $287,100, and those bonds are not all paid yet, though refunded at a lower rate of interest. I know also that an almost equal amount of bounty money was raised in the county of which that city is the county seat by taxation, and I know that in addition considerable amounts were raised by private subscription. I know that the State of New York alone paid $89,600,000 for State bounties, and I know that the United States paid $363,662,200 during the war in Federal bounties. Oh, you do not see much about all this in our school histories, and you do not see any reference to the fact that in nearly every battle of the Civil War there were twice as many regiments and officers as there should have been. Regiments were rarely, if ever, kept up to full strength by steady recruiting back home, because under the volunteer system it was much easier to raise new regiments with new sets of officers. A proper military system would have kept the regiments at the front at full strength instead of raising new regiments and overloading the service with highly paid officers, most of them without military training. You do not see much about the officers who were incompetent. They were not elected to Congress or to other positions of importance.

It has always been found impossible to keep up the standard of enlistments under the volunteer system through a long war. The best men, many of whom ought to remain at home, at least for a time, volunteer first, and in the years following the Army necessarily suffers deterioration. Under the selective-draft system this is avoided.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word about the wisdom of the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs. In October, 1914, before the adjournment of the long session of the Sixty-third Congress, some of the Members of this House, realizing that there was danger that our country might be drawn into the great war in Europe, desired to make a start at preparedness then.

The Committee on Military Affairs was against us and the House voted us down, but everybody now knows that we were right then and that the committee was wrong. A year later, when the scales had so far fallen from the eyes of the President that he was able to see the sparks falling from the conflagration and advocated a certain amount of preparedness, some of the Members of this House wanted to stand by Secretary Garrison, the very able and earnest Secretary of War. The majority of the committee turned down Mr. Garrison's program, just as it is to-day seeking to turn down his successor's program, and caused his resignation. Everybody now knows that we were right and that the majority of the committee was wrong.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after all those blunders of the past, the House has lost confidence in the recommendations of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I predict that this time we shall stand by the plans of the War Department, under the able leadership of the ranking Republican member, by a substantial majority, regardless of the majority of the committee and the oratory of the orators.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON].

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I voted for the war resolution because I was convinced that it was the duty and obligation of this country to uphold its rights and the interests of civilization as against intolerable assaults of the Prussian military autocracy. The act of the President in recommending this course and of Congress in declaring that a state of war exists is by representation the act of all the people of the United States.

There now rests upon each citizen of this country the duty and obligation of serving the country in any capacity in which he may be called for service. This duty and obligation is universal and applies to all citizens alike, whether rich or poor, high or low, willing or unwilling.

There may have been divisions and differences prior to the declaration of war, but now we are all united, and the whole country stands at attention, ready for the call. Some will be required to bear arms, some to assist in industries necessary to supply food and munitions, and others will be called to the kinds of service to which their peculiar abilities best fit them and in which they may best serve their country.

The organization of our people for war-time service must be made upon a plan or system that will measure up to the high standing of this Nation as the most efficient on earth. There must be proper coordination and marshaling of our forces according to rules that will be uniform, fair, just, and equal. There must be centralization of control and proper distribution and selective assignment of tasks.

The volunteer plan is not equal in its operation, just in its application, or fair and undiscriminative in effect. It permits the eager, although unfit, to perform service which might better be done by the shirker, though fit. It permits the performance of the highest duty to this Government by only part of those upon whom the duty rests. It is contrary to the mature conclusions of all experts who have studied the methods of efficiency in war. It is violative of the recommendations of the President, of the General Staff, of the Secretary of War, and of the great body of military experts of this country. It substitutes disorder, wastefulness, and inefficiency for order, conservation, and efficiency. I have heard upon this floor over and over again arguments that technical matters should be left to those who are expert in the particular science involved. This House has repeatedly broken from the traditions and practices of the past and has enacted laws to place intricate, administrative concerns in the hands of those who are best acquainted with them, and who are educated in the particular specialty involved. The art and science of war is a highly technical matter. It has been the subject of study by specialists. True to evolution and growth in such matters these specialists have discarded the wasteful and inefficient practices of the past. They have evolved a plan based on the best experience and practices of military experts. I am not technically proficient in the subject matter discussed in this bill, and I must perforce adopt the opinion and advice of those whom we have trained to give us expert opinion.

I see no other course, therefore, but to support the amendment proposed by the minority members of the committee for a selective draft to recruit the Nation's forces to maintain the war in which we are now engaged.

The selective draft plays no favorites. It is just, fair, and equitable. It regards all men of military age as ready and willing to serve their country, but calls only those who are able and who may best be spared. It does not permit the individual to be his own judge as to exemption from service, but regulates exemptions by just and uniform laws. It knows no shirkers, but regards all citizens as patriots ready for the call. It does not permit all of the heartache and sacrifice to be borne by the mothers of the most eager and high-spirited. It substitutes order and coordination in place of disorder and disorganization.

We all approve the application of the highest efficiency methods in our industrial activities. There rests on us a solemn duty of applying such methods in the conservation of human life in warfare.

The hour has grown so late that I will not burden the House longer with arguments that have been iterated and reiterated during the progress of this four days' debate. I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. SEARS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3545, to temporarily increase the Military Establishment, and had come to no resolution thereon.

COMMITTEE RESIGNATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication:

APRIL 13, 1917.

To the honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. SPEAKER: I respectfully beg leave to tender my resignation as the chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals, to which I was elected on the organization of the House of Representatives in the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Very respectfully,

HENRY BRUCKNER,
Member of Congress Twenty-second District, New York.

The resignation was accepted.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 27 minutes a. m., Friday, April 27, 1917) the House adjourned until Friday, April 27, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Portland Harbor, Me., including the obstruction known as Witch Rock (H. SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 27, 1917.

(Legislative day of Monday, April 23, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 10 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington obtained the floor.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. I have a petition, signed by Prof. Henry W. Farnam and Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University, praying for a tax on special war profits, the lowering of the present income-tax exemptions, increases in the rates of the income tax, and a high consumption tax on luxuries. It is very brief, and I think contains suggestions which may be of great value at the present time. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement, but it is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, however, calls attention to the fact that matters of this kind are not provided for in the unanimous-consent agreement, and he does not wish the request in any way to affect that agreement.

Mr. KENYON. Last night, before the recess was taken, the Democratic leader, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], remarked, when an attempt was made to introduce a resolution, that he would object to any resolution or anything of that nature until a vote was had, and I think that ought to be followed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would be very glad to have the Senator from Connecticut withdraw his request at this time and will try to hold the agreement strictly in force. The Senator from Washington will proceed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the very large number of Senators present at this early hour prompts me to say that I do not hope to influence any Senator in his vote upon the bill which is now pending. Their minds are pretty well made up upon the main issue that has been so fully discussed. I do deem it proper, however, to take just a few moments of the time that has been allotted for the consideration of this measure in presenting a sort of a summary of the conclusions to which I have come regarding the matter and of the reasons why I shall cast my vote as I expect to do. I shall not take the time to go into detail as to the facts and the reasons that have led me to this conclusion. That is not necessary, even if the time were not limited.

Mr. President, I hoped that our Nation would not get into this war. I did all I thought I could patriotically to keep it out. I thought I foresaw the awful consequences that would come from it; the cost in money, the poverty, privations, and sufferings at home and at the battle front; the desolated homes and broken hearts; the taking of thousands of our best manhood from peaceful, helpful pursuits to be slaughtered and to slaughter; the maimed bodies and wrecked minds lingering through delaying years of pain and wretchedness; the orphans and widows; the sightless eyes turned to strange skies above them; lifeless bodies rotting on foreign soil; and great national problems stretching far away into the dim future, taking us away from the landmarks of the past and wrenching us from the principles which we have long held dear and sacred and necessary for our highest development. To avoid all this I felt was worth striving for, and if death would have avoided it I would have gladly given my life to do it. If I erred, it was on the side of peace, and I have no apologies to offer.

The Constitution, ordained by the people as their fundamental rule of conduct, says:

> The Congress shall have power to declare war.

It has done so. We are at war. The past is passed. The future is our concern and problem. How long the war will last, what demands it will make upon us, what armies will be required, what battles will be fought, what sacrifices must be made, what sufferings must be endured, what problems must be met, no one can tell. We should prepare for the most severe task and test that can come to us to bring victory to our cause. We are not in the war to further the greed, ambition, or desire for territorial aggrandizement of any nation nor to gratify the vengeance of any people. We battle for our rights and our liberties under international law, the fundamental principles of democracy, and for a lasting world peace.

The war should be waged with all the vigor, energy, power, and strength this Nation has. We should act promptly, unhesitatingly, and unitedly. This is the surest way to bring victory and an early peace. To do this is humane as well as wise. It will save lives, lessen sorrow, prevent suffering, and economize in money and resources.

The President is our Chief Executive through the choice of the people. The Constitution says:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States.

Under his guidance, direction, and control must this war be waged. He must carry it on with the means and power which we place at his disposal. We can give him what he asks, or we can withhold it. We can adopt the plans he deems wise, or we can adopt plans of our own to control him in his actions. We declared war, but its conduct and its direction is his special duty. Democracy is again on trial. Lord Northcliffe says "Democracy is a bad war maker." That is true. It is true not only because democracy abhors war and is not trained to war but because of divided councils and responsibilities when it is forced into war. Let us profit as far as possible by the mistakes of the past. In my judgment, whatever the Commander in Chief deems necessary within the limits of the Constitution to prosecute this war efficiently and successfully it is my patriotic duty as a legislator to grant.

The same high purposes and patriotic love of country nerve him that move us. As Commander in Chief he is directly responsible for the success or failure of our Army. If victory comes to our arms, the special glory will be his. If we meet defeat or disaster, his will be the blame, unless it can be charged to us and our failure to do our duty or to give him what he thought necessary for success.

He has told us that he needs $7,000,000,000 to begin the war. We have given it to him. Its wise use is his responsibility. He says he needs 500,000 men at once, and authority for more if he finds that he needs them. No one questions his decision in this respect. We are going to give him authority to bring these men to the colors. How are they to be secured? That is the sole question of difference. With his knowledge of the task before him, the President urges that they be secured by Government selection, commonly known as "draft" or "conscription," rather than by self-selection, commonly called "volunteering." Upon this we are divided. Over this question the legislative battle wages.

The system urged by the President is denounced as "militarism." The other is held to be the time-honored and traditional method of raising an army in the Republic, and the essence of liberty and democracy.

No great war has ever been fought without one or both parties using conscription early or late. Should we use it now or when we are in an extremity? The man who must conduct the war, our Commander in Chief, urges it as a wise and necessary measure now. The military authorities, almost without exception, urge it now. The Senate committee that has fully examined into it recommends it. The honored Members of this body who have served in our wars as volunteers are for it. The lessons of this great war point to it as a wise course. Why should I not vote for it? What reasons can I give for failing to do so? I am not a military man, and it seems to me that strong, convincing, and compelling reasons should be presented to warrant me in going contrary to the mature opinion of these authorities, who are as patriotic as I am and moved by the same hope of a glorious victory.

I know that many of my people are opposed to it. I know that many of them favor the volunteer system and feel that it is a system in accord with our traditions, institutions, and principles. I want to be in accord with the public sentiment of the people who have selected me to represent them, but I feel that I have a duty to perform that is not discharged by simply trying to find out what their sentiment may be and express it by my vote, and I think they expect me to perform that duty. They expect me to study this as well as other questions from every angle. They expect me to consider and weigh information that I have and which they may not have. They expect me to take into account the exigencies of which they may not know and, giving due weight to their opinions and my duty to represent them, they expect me to do what I believe to be right and for the best interests of the country, and that is what I am going to do while I am honored with their trust and confidence.

Mr. President, I have investigated this question as fully as possible. I have listened to the discussion with an open mind, and I have sought information from every possible source. I have set aside personal preferences. I have tried to cast aside all personal considerations, possible future effects, and to ascertain exactly what the merits of the two systems are as new propositions and consider them without sentiment or prejudice.

No substantial or overpowering reason is presented to me which warrants my voting against the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief and those who recommend the provision in this bill for selective conscription.

It is said to be undemocratic. So is war undemocratic, and we must wage it with military efficiency, and effective methods must not be disregarded because they may seem contrary to our ideals in peace.

It is said to be odious to free, liberty-loving men. The conscription of the past was odious, because it was not used until its application reflected upon the courage and patriotism of those drafted. It is said to have led to riots, self-mutilation, and expatriation. Those who have resisted it by rioting, those who have tried to escape it by self-mutilation, and those who have sought to avoid it by leaving the country have been those who would not volunteer, and they were those who determined not to go into the Army though the country was in the greatest danger. No system should be condemned because it was odious to such men. If a nation's life depended upon their courage and sacrifices, it would not live long. No man who was willing to volunteer has resisted conscription. No man who was willing to volunteer has mutilated himself to avoid service in the Army, and no man who was willing to volunteer has sought refuge in Canada to avoid the draft.

This is not the draft or conscription of the past. It is not a measure to take the unwilling or the coward. It is a measure to select from the brave and the willing and those of equal obligation to the Government the number deemed necessary to meet the present emergency. It will reflect upon no man's patriotism, but will be a special badge of honor to the ones selected. It will disgrace no one, but it will save many from dishonor and reproach. It is truly democratic in principle and just in its application. It recognizes the duty of each to give his life for his country in times of stress and war, and takes impartially for that purpose. It attacks no one's patriotism, but assumes the patriotism of all.

Conscription is opposed because it is said to be militarism. Grant that it is the essence of militarism. Militarism is the essence of war. War is what we are to carry on. We can not fight battles and win victories without militarism, and a military machine composed of men who love liberty and the principles of democracy is the acme of militarism, and the more efficient such machines we organize the more quickly and surely will victory come to us. We are at war with the greatest military power of the world. To meet the militarism of that power with militarism is not to abandon liberty but to preserve it; is not despotism but wisdom.

It is urged that it means the permanent establishment of militarism. Not so. This legislation applies only to the war. When it ends whatever military machines we have will dissolve into the peaceful pursuits of the Republic just as did those great armies at the close of the Civil War. To think otherwise is to impeach the patriotism of our people and their devotion to democracy.

In peace the compulsory system should have no place in our military organization. Service in the Regular Army during peace should be entirely voluntary, and I would resist to the last any attempt to make such service compulsory. When I say this I do not condemn universal training. To my mind that is an entirely different matter and this bill should be acted upon independently of it. We are going to do many things now that we would not do in times of peace. We are going to invest executive officers with power and authority that we would not think of giving them in ordinary times. For the war we are going to establish practically an autocracy in order that democracy may live and spread throughout the world. There is no more reason to believe that the establishment of conscription now will make it a permanent policy than there is to believe that the establishment of such an autocracy as Germany and Russia never dreamed of means that such a system is to be continued when the war ends.

Unstinted praise has been bestowed upon the volunteer system. It belongs to the soldiers and not to the system. The patriotism and achievements of our volunteers are glorious and inspiring, but the system is unfair, unjust, inequitable, and undemocratic. The courage, sacrifices, and victories of our volunteers constitute the brightest pages of the world's history and are an inspiration to us in this world struggle for freedom and liberty, but should not blind us to the demerits of the system or the merits of another system.

These men, however, would have been the same invincible soldiers no matter how enlisted. When selected under this system our freemen will be the same true, loyal, brave, devoted, and patriotic soldiers of liberty, freedom, and democracy as if they had volunteered. It is not the manner of enlistment that inspires men like these but the purposes and objects for which they fight. If possible they will be better soldiers under this system because they will feel no injustice, because they will not feel that others have stayed at home to take advantage of their absence to make money and secure place and profit, and because they will know that if their ranks become thin reinforcements will come in men whose patriotism has never been questioned.

The system proposed permits no substitutes. It makes no distinctions and gives no special preferences. It treats all alike. It is thoroughly democratic and in harmony with the principles of equality. There are some details of the bill I want to see changed. The age limits should be increased. The boy who can not vote should not be taken to die by the country that gives him no legal rights. Men who have long enjoyed the blessings and privileges of free government should be required, if needed, to give their lives at the call of the country whose blessings they have so long enjoyed.

Ample provision should be made for the dependents of those who are called to the front. The Government can well afford to give assurances to its fighting men that those dependent upon them will be kept from poverty and privation.

Safeguards should be thrown around the boys at the front and at training camps to protect them from those vicious influences that always gather to prey upon them, and their loved ones at home should be assured that the sacrifices they have made are not to be nullified by such vicious influences. Other changes will be proposed for which I may vote.

My only fear is that the delay in getting the machinery ready to take the necessary census and to select the men needed will be greater than anticipated. I hope not. I hope this work will be done efficiently and expeditiously. Volunteers would be available for training and drilling almost immediately. That is a great consideration now, and if I did not think that those who have charge of actually assembling the men believe that in the end this is the most expeditious way to do it, I would hesitate about rejecting the volunteer system in this emergency. This is no time for "watchful waiting." I hope there will be none.

Whether volunteering has been a success or a failure I do not care to discuss. As I have said, I join in all the encomiums heaped upon the volunteer soldiers, but the system that is most effective, most equitable, most just, and best adapted to meet the present emergency is the one we should adopt.

Prompt action is needed. Our natural resources and industrial power should be mobilized under wise direction. Our military forces should be organized, officered, trained, drilled, and made ready for any service deemed necessary for victory. We should show Germany that we are earnest and united, and that all our power of wealth and men is behind our Government in this war, to be used to the utmost to vindicate the principles for which we entered it. To convince her of this is to hasten the war's end and to save our citizens, our wealth, and our resources, and bring peace to the world and democracy to aspiring millions.

Mr. President, there are three primary steps this Nation should take promptly to convince our enemies of the futility of continuing this terrible struggle.:

First. Select, drill, train, equip, and make ready at the earliest possible date an Army of a million men.

Second. Conserve our natural resources and human power by destroying throughout the Nation the liquor traffic.

Third. Stamp our professions of democracy with the seal of sincerity by enfranchising the integrity, intelligence, purity, strength, and lofty patriotism of our women.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I held back from our entering this war perhaps as much as anyone, but I am now willing to go forward as far as anyone to help make it a success. A success it must be, for there is no such word as fail in the lexicon of America. Like other Senators in this body, I have approached this question with an open mind, and with a full realization of the responsibilities upon the part of all Senators who are called upon to vote on this momentous question.

I shall vote for conscription and against the volunteer plan. I do it with a full realization of how unpopular such a vote as that may be in my State; but I have tried in public life to view questions from the National standpoint and not the State standpoint, much as I desire to be in accord with the majority sentiment of my State. The people of my State may differ as to details of warfare, but they are to a man enthusiastically behind the Government in any steps it may take.

There is strong argument to be made, and strong argument has been made, for both sides of this question. Earnest, conscientious, thinking men who are equally patriotic may well differ. I have listened to the arguments on this subject on this floor, and they have been of a high character. The strongest argument that has been advanced for the volunteer system, and the strongest argument that appeals to me, is that the volunteer makes the best soldier. I believe there can be no doubt of that proposition. His heart and his soul are in his work; and in any line of human activity the man who has an enthusiasm for his work will always be better at that work than the man who has not. If we should attempt, for instance, to draft a chaplain from the membership of the Senate, I fear we would be rather unsuccessful. Men go into the ministry because they have a call for service. If we drafted men into the ministry they would not be successful. That is true, I think, of other professions.

There is more patriotism, generally speaking, in the man who volunteers and goes out to the service of his country than there is in the man who stays at home, though not always. We have learned to venerate the volunteer, to place a halo about him, from the days when as small boys we saw the old veterans march by on Memorial Day and our mothers told us what it meant. We have looked upon him as being different from the soldier who was conscripted, and we have had a right to do so.

I do not join in the criticism of the volunteer system or of the volunteer as that system has been criticized on this floor. The proudest pages of our country's military history record the achievements of the volunteer. Old "Pap" Thomas at Chickamauga, Joe Hooker at the Battle of Lookout Mountain, leading the boys above the clouds, where the stars of the flag twinkled side by side with the stars of heaven; Hancock on that immortal day at Gettysburg—volunteeer troops, nearly all of them. On the other side, "Stonewall" Jackson, Forrest—brilliant volunteers. The men who under Pickett came across Seminary Ridge for a mile and a half, exposed to the deadly fire of the Union guns until their ranks were almost swept away—90 per cent of them volunteers.

Volunteers have been the gallant fighters of our wars, and somehow or other we have learned to think of the volunteer as having the greater degree of patriotism, whether he be in the prison cell dying of starvation, with no sight of the flag to urge him on and rob death of its terrors, or on lonely picket duty, falling with only an opportunity to utter a prayer for the loved ones at home—we have thought of the volunteers as the men who have gone without being sent. All honor to them. Their names are enshrined among the immortals of the Republic.

Mr. President, I shall vote for one exception on the question of volunteers, and that is to permit a distinguished ex-President of the United States to organize his division or a number of divisions and to go to the front. Of course, it may well be said that this is an exception that gives certain privileges to him and to the men who desire to enlist with him not given to others; but it is a different situation, because there is no man in this Nation who can gather around him the same number of recruits with the enthusiasm that Theodore Roosevelt can. It would be an inspiring sight for our allies in the war if he could lead a division under the Stars and Stripes to fight side by side with the tricolor of France. He wants to go; those who will enlist with him want to go; the people are anxious that they shall have the opportunity. We want this war to come to a speedy end, and nothing, in my judgment, would help to bring it to a speedy end as much as that.

But it is said that would demoralize the Army. It might work some demoralization, but, Mr. President, it will demoralize the army of our enemy vastly more than it will demoralize our Army. I shall vote for that amendment, which, I understand, has been or will be proposed.

The strongest argument presented against the volunteer system is that the best of our blood under that system go to war—and that is a strong argument; that the "slacker" remains at home; that the best should not all be killed in war; that the virility of the race for succeeding generations is thereby lessened; and that the best brand of American manhood is taken. I have a couple of letters from my home State that express the thought in the language of the man in the smaller town. The writer of one of the letters says—I will not mention the town from which the letter comes:

> Many young men have gone to serve Uncle Sam and many others just as able to go are afraid they will have to go. Universal obligatory service is the fair thing. I speak as a father whose only son, aged 20, is a member of the Sixth United States Cavalry, now stationed at Presidio, Tex.

I read another from a small town in Iowa:

> Seven of our best young men leave to-morrow to join the Navy, most of them giving up good jobs, while about 40 of our undesirable young men stay at home holding down the loafers' bench, which shows the injustice of the voluntary system.

I want to say in respect to those letters that there is no difficulty in the State of Iowa in raising volunteers. Our companies in the National Guard are recruited up to peace strength. In my own city, of 20,000 or 22,000 people, two companies have been recruited to full strength, and there are enough desiring to enlist to organize a third company. There is no trouble there. I have been somewhat amused at distinguished lawyers of the city of New York and other places going out to wake up the patriotism of the Middle West. If they will study the recruiting statistics, they will discover that there is more response from the Middle West than there is in other sections of the country, and they had better employ their energies in their home communities. The people of the Middle West do not need to be instructed how to be patriotic.

The strongest argument for conscription is that expressed in these letters. It is the fairest method. It takes the rich and the poor alike, the willing and the unwilling. The boy of the hod carrier fights side by side with the boy of the millionaire. The strongest argument against it is the irritation which it has caused in the past and which it will cause in the future. There is something about the very words "draft" and "conscription" that goes against the American grain. As the Speaker of the House said in his argument the other day, the word "conscript" is much like the word "convict," and is regarded by a good many people in the same light. But if the people can understand that this is a system, as enforced jury service is a system—and there is nothing injurious to a man's reputation in being called to serve on a jury, for that is a part of the duty of citizenship—and our people become educated to that idea as to the conscription system about to be established, the prejudice may lessen.

This bill provides for the selective system. I am not certain, Mr. President, but that in the condition the bill is now it is worse than if there were absolutely no exemptions, and I think that the men who are fathering this bill, that the War Department and Senators, ought to give consideration to one thing particularly in this bill that is going to cause intense irritation. If you are going to exempt the agricultural classes, as the bill provides may be done, and is perhaps necessary, I sometimes wonder just what kind of an Army we are going to have without any farmer boys in it. The boy who stays at home on the farm and helps in production will be just as much a patriot as the man who goes to the front. I want to suggest and appeal to the chairman of the committee that there should be some different method provided for determining questions of exemption. Under this bill as it now stands a petty military officer will go into a community and decide as to exemptions. He can say to John Smith's boy, "You are exempt," and to Henry Jones's boy, "You must go."

Now, look down the line, Senators, to where that is going to lead us. There will be irritation enough about this in any event, without having a self-important little military officer in a community deciding whose boys are going to the war and whose boys are going to stay home. The air will be filled with suspicion; there will be charges of favoritism, charges of corruption. I do not believe any civilized nation in the world puts such power into the hands of any military officer. England does not do it; England has tribunals to decide such matters. Let us not, in the language of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] a few days ago, be so careful about the democracies of Europe that we lose democracy at home.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has presented an amendment on this subject, providing for the establishment of tribunals to determine the question and a proper system of appeals, so that there need be no delay. His amendment, I think, provides—I have not studied it closely—for a local board appointed by the President for each congressional district, an appeal board for each State, also appointed by the President, so that there may be uniformity, and a central tribunal. We ought to give consideration to this matter. The men who believe in the justice of this war and the men who are standing by this bill—and I am one of them—ought to have vision enough to correct this trouble now. So I appeal to the committee, through its distinguished chairman, to correct what I regard as a tremendous evil in this respect.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator think that the amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Wisconsin cures that defect?

Mr. KENYON. I think so. It provides for local boards appointed by the President of the United States for each congressional district to determine the question, with appeals to a State board and a central tribunal.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand the Senator will support such an amendment?

Mr. KENYON. I expect to do so; yes. I feel deeply on this question because of my interest in keeping the people of our country united behind this war. If in the communities of this country feeling is to be engendered over this question, we are going to have trouble; and what is the use of inviting trouble like that? I hope the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the committee itself will do something to remedy that defect in the bill, if they are not satisfied with the amendments which have been offered.

Yes; we are going to have irritation. Conscription is irritating; war is an irritating thing. It is irritating to the men upon the firing line and it is irritating to the people at home who have to pay for it. I have heard it expressed in this Chamber that the men who go to the front should have no pay at all; that their service should be a supreme act of heroism. That is an irritating argument, too. Their pay ought to be increased.

I have not observed Members of Congress serving without any pay, and service in the Senate is no more dangerous, or not much more dangerous than service in the trenches, though I think that with the foul air we are compelled to breathe here, with all the doors consistently closed, it is about as dangerous to serve in the Senate as it is in the trenches, for the trenches, at least, have the advantage of fresh air. I have not observed that Members of Congress, instead of serving for nothing, were willing to divorce themselves even from mileage. It is heroic to talk about the men going to the firing line without any compensation, but heroism does not reduce the high cost of living or take care of the people at home.

This war must be fought somewhere else than at banquets, amid the clinking of champagne glasses and the disappearance of the elusive caviar sandwich. It must be fought somehow besides sending letters to the President offering services in a general way, without anything particularly specific, and then rushing to the nearest newspaper office and publishing the letter in the paper. Patriotism is too often exhibited by putting an extra flag on an automobile and then wiring a Member of Congress, for God's sake, not to tax any of these things that we are particularly interested in.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I interrupt the Senator at this point because of the last remark which he made; and with his permission I should like to read two short telegrams coming yesterday from the same community in my State, which show that even among the extreme advocates of this bill there are some cross currents of sentiment.

The first reads:

At largest mass meeting ever held here, last night, strong resolutions advocating administration's selective conscription bill unanimously passed. Your support of program is required.

The second telegram, from the same place, reads as follows:

War taxes in the form of stamp tax discriminatory, disturbing to trade conditions, and result in unfair methods of competition. We are willing to bear our fair share of war taxes, but this form highly objectionable. Will greatly appreciate your opposition to stamp tax.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, that illustrates some of the kinds of patriotism that will have to change in this country; that the people of this country will have to wake up to the fact that this war is not a Sunday School picnic, and is not going to be carried out by vocal volleys at banquets. They must get in their minds the fact that it is a hard, cold fact, irritating in the extreme; that we must fight, and fight hard. We voted to bring on this war; now let us never hesitate in every means to carry it forward to a successful conclusion. The harder we fight and the sooner we fight the quicker peace will come and the more enduring peace will be. We who vote for this conscription and we who vote for war must make our sacrifices. I have always felt that Members of Congress who voted for war ought to be willing to go to war. I believe in that philosophy and am ready to back it, as far as I am concerned.

We hear a good deal preached nowadays of what an awful thing it is to die for one's country. We used to believe and be taught that it was a glorious thing to die for one's country. A country that is worth having, a country with the ideals of our Nation, is worth dying for, and the man who goes out and dies for his country in a righteous cause does not really lose his life. The man who gives his life for others saves it. The man who saves his life for self loses it. It was the doctrine of the Master; it has been the doctrine of Christianity for nineteen hundred years; it is the truth.

Men have died willingly and happily for their country. It is a glorious way to go, and it is time we stopped preaching the doctrine that we are doing an unholy thing if we do give our lives for our country. In all time those who have given up their lives for a good cause, for the benefit of humanity, have not really died; no! David, the sweet singer of Israel, is not dead. Moses, the law giver, lives on. Abraham Lincoln is living in the hearts of millions of people who came from darkness to light.

They never die who fall in a great cause.
The block may soak their gore,
Their heads be sodden in the sun,
Their limbs be strung to city walls and castle gates,
And yet their spirit walks abroad.

Mr. President, as I have said, the argument presented is strong on both sides. In voting for conscription I do not vote against the volunteer system to place it in the discard forever. The time may come when it may be necessary. I vote for this equality-of-service proposition, weighing the arguments upon both sides, drawn to support it somewhat for the following reason:

I do not want to put my judgment against the judgment of the military experts. We have them for the purpose of studying war problems. We must trust them. If they are a class of men who have not the interests of the country profoundly at heart, we had better get rid of them. They have come to the conclusion that in this particular crisis conscription is the best thing. That it has been approved by the Secretary of War, and is asked by the President. It will get us an army. There is no question as to that. A volunteer system would probably get us an army, but it may not. We can run no risk in this time of emergency. As the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] a few days ago said in substance, while it would take time to build an army in this way, we would be building upon a solid foundation; and it is better to take time and do that than to raise our structure and have to come back and rebuild the foundation. We must have an army here, and go at it just as we would if there were no British Navy or French Navy standing between the enemy and us. We must raise the structure of an army that can stand against the waves of Prussian militarism just as unaffected as Gibraltar is with the waves that lap the rocks at its base. As our military experts have decided that this is the way to do it, and as I do not feel competent as a layman to place my judgment against theirs, I shall follow the plan that the President has asked, and vote against the volunteer system, and cast my vote for conscription.

I want to say this in closing: This age limit ought to be raised. It is a shame and a cowardly thing to put the burden of this war on boys 19 years of age. Let us raise it so as to take in the slacker, who will be above 25. There will be no boys around college who are slackers, but we ought not to take them mostly from colleges.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOX in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May I, with the consent of the Senator, ask him whether or not this age is recommended as well by the War College?

Mr. KENYON. I do not know.

SEVERAL SENATORS. It is.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes; I understand it is.

Mr. KENYON. It is recommended by the War College? I did not recall that.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that if we ought to follow the War College in one aspect of the bill, if it ought to be a Procrustean bed upon which we must lie concerning this question, we ought as well to accept the plan of the War College in every aspect, for exactly the same reasons that the Senator gives.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, no; not at all. Let us accept the War College plan, not the War College details, just as I decline to accept the details of the War College as to the enforcement of the selective system by some Army officer. I regard that merely as a matter of detail, and not a part of the fundamental plan. Fundamentals are not the same as details.

Let me say right here, while I think of it, that when we draft these boys it is our business to see that camps are free from liquor and other contaminating influences. Let none of these boys go back home after service with drink habits acquired in the Army or with the unspeakable diseases that have followed the armies of Europe.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator has just mentioned the matter of Army officers having charge of the exemptions. I think that point is well raised, and I have certainly listened with much interest to the very splendid and able argument of the Senator; but my understanding of section 5 is that the officers of the United States and of the several States and Territories will have that duty to perform.

Mr. KENYON. I understand it is under regulations that may be prescribed by the President.

Mr. BRADY. The first part of section 5 reads:

> The President is hereby authorized to utilize the service of any or all departments and any or all officers or agents of the United States, and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, in the execution of this act, and all officers and agents of the United States, and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia are hereby required to perform such duty in the execution of this act as the President shall order or direct.

Now, I fully agree with the Senator that if some petty officer is going to say which young man shall be exempt and which shall enter the service, that power should not be given to him; but in the discussion of the matter in the committee my understanding was—and I should be glad to have the chairman of the committee, who is thoroughly advised on the matter, correct me if I am not right in my statement—that the thought was to pick out men in the different counties to have charge of this exemption.

Mr. KENYON. Why not say so in the bill, then? Why not have some plan in the bill?

Mr. BRADY. I think that would be very wise. I think it would be very wise for us, when we come to the amendments, probably to agree on who we thought should have charge of the exemptions. We discussed the matter thoroughly in the committee, and I think it was generally understood that the plan was to have the sheriff, the health officer, and one other party that we discussed take charge of these exemptions; and by doing that it would be in the hands of the local authorities rather than in the hands of some petty officer.

I fully concur with the Senator in the thought that this power should be given to a commission or board that will be just as liberal and fair as it is possible to be in considering these exemptions, for the reason that we are not going to need such a great number of men for actual service, and we will find that we will need just as many at home, on the farm, in the shop, and places of that character as we will need in the ranks. We should have local men who understand conditions, who know the men, and know what they would be best fitted for.

I think the suggestion made by the Senator is a good one.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator can call to mind men in his community in the State, in the congressional district, of such high character and respect among all the people that their decision on a matter of this kind would be readily accepted and there would be no dissent whatever.

Mr. BRADY. And it would do away with any friction that might be in the community on account of the selection of any particular young men.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been somewhat worried in my own mind as to just what ages the conscription should apply. The bill provides that the ages shall be from 19 to 25. I note what the Senator said in relation to the increase of that age, but what has the Senator to say in relation to our past experiences, particularly in relation to the Civil War; for I notice that out of the total individual enlistments of 2,213,365 and the reenlistments amounting to 564,939, there were only 62,697 enlistments including and over the age of 25. I want to say to the Senator that that included the whole term of the Civil War; it included the volunteer system and also what few were drafted into the war.

Mr. KENYON. It is largely the result of the volunteer system.

Mr. SMOOT. All but about sixty-odd thousand.

Mr. KENYON. There were more soldiers along about 18 years of age than any other age in the Civil War.

Mr. SMOOT. Of 18 years and under there were 1,151,438. There were 2,159,798, 21 years and under, out of a total of 2,778,304.

Mr. BRADY. Twenty-one and twenty-two.

Mr. SMOOT. No; 21 and under. In other words, over two-thirds of the entire Army were of the age of 21 and under, with only 62,697 of the age of 25 and above.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I just want to say I am glad to have these interruptions, but I am afraid they will not be fair to those Senators who are to follow. I do not want to get into an extended discussion. I have only a few words further to say. I think, answering the Senator from Utah, it is the result largely of the volunteer system to get younger men. At the same time I believe it is one of the things that shows the injustice of that system.

Now, I believe we ought to raise this age limit. In any event, for the unmarried men, you ought to raise it indefinitely for them. A man who has lived to be 45 years of age and has never married ought to be compelled to go to war or something worse, except that he might be excluded on the ground he had evidenced some cowardice because he was afraid to tackle the matrimonial proposition. There might be some objection on that ground; but I think there ought to be a difference made between married and unmarried men.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is true. In my conversation with Army officers they have invariably told me, as demonstrated in every country in war, the best soldiers range in age from 18 to 25 years, and I suppose that that is the reason why the War College recommended the ages provided for in this bill.

Mr. KENYON. If we are compelled to go as low as 19, let us go above 25.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Is it not a fact that one of the objections against the volunteer system is that it takes the younger, the more virile, and the patriotic young men, which we now wish to avoid in a bill which fixes that identical age for all who can be taken?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I wish to conclude what I have to say. It will not take much time.

I want to add this, that while I am voting for conscription of these men I am going to vote later on for conscription of the great incomes of this country to help pay the expenses of this war. Conscription of incomes above the amount that any ordinary demands of life needs is just as logical as the conscription of men.

I want to just put in the RECORD a figure or two in showing the great profits that have come largely out of the war. The increase of millionaires in this country has been tremendous. I shall give the net profits after deduction for labor, material, interest, depreciation, and all other charges—in short, the amount available for dividends to stockholders.

In 1914 the net profits of the American Smelting & Refining Co. was $9,271,565; in 1916 they were $23,252,248. I will take only a few of them.

Armour & Co., in 1914 the net profits were $7,509,908; in 1916 the net profits were $20,100,000. Bethlehem Steel Corporation, in 1914 the net profits were $5,590,020; in 1916, $43,593,968. Central Leather Co., in 1914, $6,715,131; in 1916, $17,327,409. Crucible Steel Co., in 1914, $1,015,039; in 1916, $13,223,655. The E. I. du Pont de Nemours Powder Co., in 1914, $4,831,793; in 1916, $82,107,693.

The poor people of this country and the people of moderate salary ought not to be burdened with any of the expenses of this war. They are standing all they can stand, but the people whose incomes and dividends have increased practically 500 per cent in two years ought to be compelled to bear a large portion of the expenses of this war. In my judgment every income above $100,000 should be commandeered or conscripted for the benefit of the Government to carry on this war. That proposition is going to come before we get through the tax bill, and we might as well commence to think about it. When it comes up for discussion I do not know whether there will be the same enthusiasm to conscript these great incomes that there is to conscript men.

The General Chemical Co., in 1914, net profits, $2,857,898; in 1916, $12,286,826. Phelps-Dodge Corporation, in 1914, $6,664,839; in 1916, $21,974,263. The United States Steel Corporation—listen to these figures—in 1914 their net profits were $23,496,768; in 1916, $271,531,730. That has gone in increased dividends, increasing the incomes of many people whose incomes are simply enormous now.

I merely refer to this, Mr. President, in passing, because I expect at some time to discuss it at greater length, simply to lay down a proposition that will come up later on, that conscription will be in order as to incomes over $100,000.

I have taken up more time than I intended and I now yield the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the commander of a dreadnaught calling his sailors and stokers and pilots for their daily drill, while the ship is drifting to the very rim of the vortex of a maelstrom of destruction illustrates but faintly the situation of this country in this great war at the present time.

Mr. President, this war will be won or lost by the submarines and not by an American Army. If we can overcome the submarine, we can win this war. If the submarine overcomes us, we can not win this war. If we can triumph over the submarine, this war can be won without the actual employment of a single American soldier in Europe. If the submarines triumph over us, we can not win this war, though we have 10,000,000 of the best trained and officered men under arms. This is the living, vital, imminent question which confronts every nation engaged in this life and death struggle.

Yesterday's report from the British Admiralty's weekly statement of vessels sunk brings home to us for our immediate consideration and action this most imminent and important problem of this war. I simply call attention to the fact that during the week ending April 22, 40 British ships over 1,600 tons and 15 of less than 1,600 tons went to the bottom of the ocean. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that 2 weeks previous there were 17 of those over 1,600 tons and 2 of less sunk in one week; and in the next week there were but 19 of those over 1,600 tons and 9 of less; but the last week shows the enormous number of 40 over 1,600 tons and 15 of less than 1,600 tons sunk. This does not take into consideration any of the vessels of 100 tons or less, nor does it take into consideration any of the neutral vessels that have been sunk during that time.

Let me call attention to another clipping from this morning's issue of the Washington Post. Under the heading "Submarines may decide the war," the British Trade Board head says:

SUBMARINES MAY DECIDE THE WAR, BRITISH TRADE BOARD HEAD SAYS.

LONDON, April 26.

A grave warning that the submarine menace may be an important factor in deciding the outcome of the war was sounded to-day by Sir Albert Stanley, president of the British Board of Trade. Addressing a luncheon of business men, Sir Albert said:

"We have not yet found a way of dealing with the submarine as to remove the danger of their being an enormously important factor in determining the outcome of the war. The effect of the submarine war upon the existence of the British Empire is simply this, that we can not continue to bring into this country all the supplies and materials required for our existence for the continuance of the war and for the actual needs of our industries.

Mr. President, there is pending an amendment to this bill which, in its urgency, is far more important than the bill itself. The amendment provides for a board designated "board of merchant shipping defenses," the duty and purpose of which is set out in the amendment itself in the following words, which I beg to insert without reading at this time:

The duty of said board and the purpose of its creation is to provide for and perfect in the shortest possible time such mechanical device or devices as can be successfully used and employed upon a merchant ship while navigating the seas to check or deflect the course of a submarine torpedo and to prevent the same from coming in contact with the hull of the merchant vessel, or to explode the same before such contact, or the perfection of any other mechanical device to protect merchant vessels from destruction by submarine other than by use of defense guns.

I also wish to insert at this time the table given, from which I have quoted, showing the 64 British ships that went to the bottom of the ocean during the last week. I set it out in its details.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to ask him if he has any list of ships of other nationalities than Great Britain.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not; but I understand from the authorities it will bring the number up to about 80.

The table referred to is as follows:

BIGGEST WEEK OF U-BOATS; 64 CRAFT ON SINKING LIST.

LONDON, April 25.

The Admiralty's weekly statement of vessels sunk was issued to-night. It reads:

"Sinkings, by mine or submarine, over 1,600 tons, 40, including 2 sunk in the week ending April 15; under 1,600 tons, 15, including 1 sunk in the week ending April 1.

"Vessels unsuccessfully attacked, 27, including 1 attacked the week ending April 8.

"Fishing vessels sunk, 9, including 1 sunk the week ending April 15."

RECORD OF SINKING SINCE FEBRUARY 1.

This statement by the British Admiralty regarding the loss of vessels by submarines or mines since the German Government announced resumption after February 1 of ruthless submarine warfare shows that a greater number of vessels of over 1,600 tons each was lost during the past week than ever before. The record since February 1 follows:

	Over 1,600 tons.	Under 1,600 tons.
For first 3 days of February	5	3
Week ending Feb. 10	33	19
Week ending Feb. 17	17	10
Week ending Feb. 24	27	18
Week ending Mar. 3	14	9
Week ending Mar. 11	13	4
Week ending Mar. 8	16	8
Week ending Mar. 25	17	7
Week ending Apr. 1	18	13
Week ending Apr. 8	17	2
Week ending Apr. 15	19	9
Week ending Apr. 22	40	15
Total to date	237	117

Trawlers and vessels under 100 tons are not included in this list.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we can not equip and train an efficient army of half a million men and put them on the battle front in less than one year. If the German submarine fleet increases in number and effectiveness during even one-half of that year at the rate it has increased in number and efficiency during the last few months we shall never be able to put that army on the battle front during the entire war. I make this declaration in no mere tone of prophecy but with assurances that the conclusion can be demonstrated with mathematical accuracy.

Mr. President, the appalling havoc of the submarine has not been half told or half realized. I want this Senate to divert its mind one moment from its contemplation of waving banners and martial strains, from the prospective panoply of war's array, and look upon the grim reality that is staring us in the face at this very moment. Let us realize that while we are dining and felicitating the great and honored representatives of our allies not an hour passes that there are not scores and hundreds of the brave sons of those allies struggling in the waves, going down to death with their fair ships, victims to these scourges of the sea.

Let us look a moment at what this submarine devastation means to the world's shipping, and especially what it means to the shipping of Great Britain, upon whose shoulders has rested the burden of financing the cause of the allies and whose ability to continue in this war and make a victory possible depends wholly upon her ability to keep open the channels of ocean trade, that her people may be fed and clothed and her armies supplied.

How many of us have stopped to consider what percentage of the world's shipping has been sunk during this war, and particularly during the months of February, March, and April of 1917, since relentless submarine warfare has been resumed? How many of the American people have given any consideration to the value or quantity of the world's products which have gone to the bottom of the sea, and what proportion of those products can still be fed to the yawning waves without weakening or rendering ineffective the nations which must depend upon them? We have no publications and no information or statistics except what we may gather outside of our bureaus and departments upon the subject.

Mr. President, the total merchant tonnage of the world at the beginning of this war in 1914 was 48,139,365. Of this Great Britain had 19,779,119. In round numbers her total tonnage was about 20,000,000 tons. With her shipbuilding facilities she probably has maintained that tonnage, despite her enormous losses, up to February 1, 1917. Other maritime nations probably have met their losses in ships, so that the world's tonnage has been maintained up to February 1. It is perfectly safe to say, however, that the construction of ships since the beginning of February has not kept apace with the destruction of merchant tonnage of the world.

The Journal of Commerce, which has attempted to tabulate all the losses of the world's merchant marine from the beginning of the war, shows that up to March 1, 1917, the number of vessels destroyed was 2,573. The capacity of those vessels was, in tons, 4,711,100. This was about 10 per cent of the world's merchant marine at the beginning of the war.

This journal also shows that the destruction up to April 1 will bring the total tonnage to at least 5,500,000 tons. From the very best information which I can gain this will have probably increased by May 1 to more than 6,000,000 tons, or more than one-seventh of the world's tonnage.

The German report shows that during the month of February the submarines of that country sank 292 vessels, with a capacity of 781,500 tons. It is conceded by all that the destruction during the month of March exceeded very considerably the destruction during the month of February, and the British report of yesterday shows no diminution in this frightful devastation, but an enormous increase in the effectiveness of the submarines.

On March 27 Admiral Beresford stated that up to that date the March loss was more than 500,000 tons. Germany has not reported, so far as I am able to learn, just what her submarines accomplished during that month.

What these U-boats are accomplishing at the present time may best be illustrated by a comparison of their deadly work during the last two months with that of the previous 30 months of the war. The monthly rate of destruction prior to February 1 was about 150,000 tons. During the months of February and March, accepting the lowest estimate, the losses have been more than one-fifth of the total losses of the previous 30 months. What a heavy proportion of this loss in shipping is borne by Great Britain alone is shown by the following table, which gives the losses up to April 1:

	Number of vessels destroyed.	Tonnage.
All of entente powers	1,661	3,492,772
Great Britain alone	1,276	2,821,849
Teutonic allies	195	293,606
Neutral vessels	702	1,024,770

I have a table here showing the losses of both belligerents and neutrals, and call attention to the fact that out of a total neutral loss of 702 vessels the little country of Norway alone lost nearly one-half, both in number of vessels and in amount of tonnage, her number being 340 vessels destroyed and her tonnage 464,500.

I ask to insert at this point a table of details of all the losses of all the countries up to March 1, 1917.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Merchant marine losses from the beginning of the war to Mar. 1, 1917.

LOSSES OF THE ALLIES.

	Number.	gross tons.
Great Britain	1,276	2,821,849
France	164	294,338
Italy	121	225,114
Russia	64	77,803
Japan	9	31,904
Belgium	16	23,683
Portugal	9	10,879
Rumania	1	3,688
Canada	1	3,464
Total	1,661	3,492,722

LOSSES OF THE NEUTRALS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, when Germany announced that if she could destroy a million tons of the world's shipping which had been supplying her enemies per month she could dictate terms of peace within 10 months, she made no vain boast. She has not reached a million tons a month, but she has reached more than two-thirds of that amount per month since February 1 and is steadily gaining.

It will be seen that the submarine is accomplishing but little less than was expected by the central powers, and that, therefore, while the time allowed to accomplish the result will have to be extended, the purpose and the end sought by this ruthless undersea war will be accomplished, though in a little longer time, unless that menace is met or neutralized. The amendment which I have offered inviting the inventive genius of the American people to be concentrated upon this great problem, providing for proper opportunity to test and develop appliances or mechanism designed to meet, deflect, or destroy the effectiveness of the submarine torpedo, and intensifying effort and ambition by suitable reward, purposes to accomplish this most important result.

This rapidly increasing annihilation of the world's commerce demands immediate attention. To-day it means more than all the armies and navies we could ever put into this war.

I think it a fair estimate to say that 750,000 tons of merchant shipping have been destroyed in the last 30 days. At this rate—and without any question the number of submarines is increasing—how long will Great Britain be able to hold out? The report that comes from Great Britain this morning answers to a certain extent this question; and, boiled down, that answer is that unless she can find some means of meeting the U-boat devastation she will be starved out of this war in a few months.

If it required 20,000,000 tons of British merchant shipping to meet her economic demands in times of peace, how much more will she need that 20,000,000 tons of shipping in time of war? And what proportion of that shipping can she lose and still maintain herself and her armies on a war footing? Remember that her shipping must also supply her allies. Remember also it is not necessary to destroy the entire tonnage of Great Britain to cut off her supplies of the necessities of life. The destruction of a third of such tonnage would probably accomplish the result.

I repeat, Mr. President, that unless we are able to cope with this submarine menace there will be no occasion for the use of the armies which we are preparing.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am very much interested in the Senator's statement, and I think there is very much force in his argument. Does the Senator know, from his examination of the subject, whether or not submarines are as dangerous and as destructive to a modern battleship as they are to the merchant ship, or whether or not the battleship is strong enough to resist a torpedo fired by one of these submarines? I have never had occasion to examine the question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have examined the matter, Mr. President, and I will state that of course the battleship is much more immune from the danger of destruction than is the merchant ship, and possibly it would take at least several shots from a submarine torpedo to sink a battleship, unless a shot struck the battleship in a particularly weak place. Some battleships, however, have gone down from a single shot, for the submarine torpedo is about as powerful as is a mine, and many battleships have gone down from a single mine explosion. The great trouble, however, in the use of the dreadnaught and the battleship is that they can not go out and find the submarine and thereby protect the merchant ship from its ravages.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Would it be possible, I will ask the Senator from North Dakota, to convoy either a merchant vessel or a number of merchant vessels with convoys from either navy?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would say it would be possible but almost improbable, in view of the number of submarines which are in the ocean to-day, and especially would that be true during the hours of darkness. If by the use of these unseen instrumentalities of death, more dangerous than the Black Scourge or any other that has ever devastated any portion of the world, Great Britain could be eliminated from this war, what then? Demoralized Russia would fall in a week; brave France would be crushed and her sons and daughters suffer the fate of the Belgians; our foreign commerce would be destroyed; our mighty surplus of grain to be harvested this year would rot in the bins, and stagnation the most depressing and from which anarchy is most surely bred would hold in its death grip the populous cities of the country. Frightful as this result would be, we are bending our present energies not toward the most important and imminent problem of this war, not toward the most practical questions involved, but toward the accomplishment of a final end and purpose which must, from the very nature of things, be dependent upon the settlement of the preceding and most imminent one—the submarine problem.

Mr. President, this amendment provides for a board which I designate the "Board of Merchant Shipping Defenses." It makes little difference whether this be a board or a bureau, whether it be something ingrafted upon a board already created or a new board. The one important thing is that there shall be represented on that board men of more than one idea or line of thought, and to secure that end it shall be composed of men of different callings, but experts all in their particular callings or professions. I retain the chief constructor of the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy Department, and the naval constructor of such bureau. I suggest the Commissioner of Patents as an additional member because in his department is every invention, every mechanical device and appliance used for every industry in the country. Because his bureau furnishes a most wonderful array of suggestions for appliances that may be utilized in a modified form for protection against the self-propelling torpedo. The reason for selecting one other of the highest recognized skill and experience in the construction of merchant ships, and still another with the highest recognized skill and experience in the navigation of such vessels, must be apparent to anyone. We want not only mechanical ingenuity, but practical knowledge as to whether any mechanical device can be used, either in the construction or in the navigation of such vessel. I assume that in the chief constructor and the naval constructor we have expert information concerning the torpedo itself, its powers and its weaknesses. I have added to these members of the board two others with the highest recognized skill, experience, and knowledge of mechanical devices used in the great steel industries of the country.

But, Mr. President—and I particularly address this to the Senator in charge of the bill—it may be asked, Why go outside the Regular Establishment in this matter? Because the tendency of every establishment is to rut itself and ever deepen the rut; because the situation demands the resourceful minds of the people of the whole country and not alone of some particular department.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that for some time I have been trying to formulate some kind of an amendment with the object of getting the department out of the rut of which the Senator speaks, but I am frank to say that I never had in mind the question of the destruction wrought by the submarine. It has been my experience here that many of the departments do get into a rut. I will take for illustration, without meaning to criticize, the Ordnance Department. A man comes here with an appliance; if he gets a hearing at all he does pretty well, and if he ever gets his appliance tested he does remarkably well. As an instance of that, take the Lewis machine gun and other machine guns, over which there has been a controversy raging for years. If some board, such as that the Senator suggests, had had that matter in charge I am satisfied they could have made a report in a very short time. I am wondering if the Senator can not broaden his amendment so as to include other departments and other appliances that might be utilized in time of war.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection to that, and I was going to mention just what the Senator has mentioned; but I confined the amendment to the defense of merchant ships against submarines, because that is the vital question in this war, the imminent question upon which all others depend.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. My attention was called a few days ago to an interesting new device which was available for exhibit at Columbus, Ohio, by some people who invented a keyboard controlled by wireless, by which there could be controlled several different ships at once, moving by electricity, so as to take a net and put it ahead of a battleship and sweep mines out of the way without any danger to life whatever. It took quite a long time to get that examined, and I do not know whether it ever has been properly examined. I comment upon that because it is in line with what the Senator in charge of the bill has just referred to.

Mr. McCUMBER. There are a thousand men thinking this matter out to-day, but if they should go to the War Department or the Navy Department they would be told, "We have neither any law nor any appropriation that would allow us to investigate this matter." It is an important question, and there is knowledge and genius enough in this country, I believe, to secure the end desired if we will give them an opportunity.

Mr. President, human nature is the same whatever the line of employment may be, and one of its dominant characteristics is resentment of outside interference with what it may regard as its own special field. We are all afflicted with that weakness. The specialist nearly always views with disfavor any proposition which has not been suggested by his own investigation in his own field of endeavor. It very often happens that we have to go outside of a particular vocation to find originality, original ideas that are most valuable in that very vocation. We all remember that a few years ago no physician would ever allow a pneumonia patient to inhale a breath of cold air. By accident rather than by investigation it was lately discovered that the colder the air the better, and so to-day the course of treatment prescribed is that which was strenuously prohibited by the profession but a short while ago. Political jealousies, official jealousies, professional jealousies, Army and Navy jealousies should be brushed aside and the American people, not the Army and Navy alone, should be invited to assist in the solution of this most vital problem.

Accidental discoveries have played a far greater part in the realm of mechanical devices and inventions than has studied research. So, too, the military has generally adopted for its use that which the industrial world has conceived and brought out. Take, for illustration—and I call the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to this, because it is along the line concerning which they have interrupted me—the evolution of the explosive shell. The almost certainty of the shell exploding from the same power that sent it on its mission had to be overcome, and compressed air, already used in the industrial field, was utilized. This became obsolete almost as soon as utilized by the use of compartments filled with cotton, which absorbed the impact. Then some one, I think out in Tacoma, who was experimenting with blasts for work in the Alaskan mines, accidentally found that he had produced an explosive that was not affected by either cold or heat, that could not be exploded by the blow of a trip hammer or by a red-hot billet of steel, but which could be easily exploded by the percussion cap. This immediately eliminated the shell with its cotton packing, and so to-day we can send one of these shells through an ordinary steel armor and have it explode at any given distance beyond, according as it is timed.

Those who will follow the history of the use of the submarine—and I am coming down to that now—will recall that heretofore the possibilities of that vessel have been grossly underestimated, often scoffed at, by the naval authorities of the world. The Navy and Army authorities, I repeat, are human, just as much so as those engaged in other lines of endeavor, and they just as naturally fall into ruts, out of which they must be pried. We began the construction of submarines in this country against the judgment of our naval experts. I think the same thing is true of the Lewis gun, which is to-day proving its efficiency. And even to-day, Mr. President, we are spending hundreds of millions for the construction of mighty dreadnaughts, the most costly and the least effective craft used in this war.

Why was it, Mr. President, that every layman foresaw the mighty havoc that the submarine would produce in this war, and predicted it freely, while our naval authorities and the naval authorities of Great Britain as well, unable to divert their admiring glances from the grim superdreadnaught, practically ignored the little submarine with its far vaster possibilities? Why was it that the layman, knowing that the slightest mishap to a dreadnaught would destroy thousands of lives and send a score of millions of dollars and the product of the toil of years to the bottom of the sea, was the first to attempt to impress upon the naval authorities the necessity of spending a greater proportion of our naval appropriation in the building of the cheaper and swifter armed cruisers, with more powerful and longer range guns? Why was it that the layman insisted all the while that the submarine would prove to be the most effective and most dangerous arm of sea war craft; that the swift cruiser would prove to be next in value and importance, and the mighty dreadnaught the least used, while the naval authorities of both the United States and Great Britain recorded their view of the importance of these several types in inverse order, and failed to consider the submarine as a matter of serious importance?

To the layman it was somewhat strange that with full knowledge of the potential power of the submarine, with its torpedo accompaniment, practically no consideration was given to that type of battle craft, whose possibilities seemed almost without limit, until its work of devastation was well under way. The superdreadnaught was the all-absorbing thought and topic of the Navy and of naval constructors. Billions of dollars have been expended upon this type of vessel, not only up to the beginning of this war, but continued almost up to the present time, only to find that they have become almost impotent; and during this time the whole sea has become infested with the submarine, against which every vessel from superdreadnaught to the smallest merchant craft has found no means of defense.

Against the continuous protests of the layman and in the face of his warning we have sacrificed effectiveness for grim appearances. We have rested our faith on bigness and mighty names. The naval authorities of Great Britain had to be taught by the sacrifice of thousands of her brave sons that naming a war ship Invincible did not make her invincible. The Dardanelles catastrophe, worse than a failure, was not the blunder of laymen.

It is well, Mr. President, to be sanguine and courageous, but overconfidence in one of these monster battleships, based upon its bigness or the millions of dollars that have gone into its construction, is too often far more disastrous than excessive caution. We have seen enough of this war, we have seen and read enough to know that all the wisdom and good judgment are not lodged in the minds of our Military or Naval Establishments.

A layman would have said that pitting a battleship against a land battery, with guns of equal power and range, was almost equivalent to suicide. He would have insisted that a land gun could carry a shell seaward just as far and with far greater accuracy than a gun on board a ship could carry a shell landward; that if a shell from a 16-inch gun on a warship should strike a land battery it might dismount one of its guns; but that if a like shell from the gun of a land battery should strike the ship, the chances would be ten to one that within 10 minutes $20,000,000 and thousands of brave men would be at the bottom of the ocean.

By this bill we are providing for a vast army. We need 1,000,000 men in arms. It will take more than a year to secure, train, and equip these men for service. It will take that long before we can develop an efficient fighting machine that we would dare send into the conflict. Now, what will all this vast army avail us at the end of the year if the German shipyards, spending all their time and energy in the production of standardized submarines, pour into the ocean every month a new spawn of these hell-born demons of slaughter, capable of sending every transport we could fill with our soldiers to the bottom of the sea? Unless we find some way to check these submarine ravages we will not be sending these armies into the trenches in any effective numbers. Unless we devise some sort of mechanism to meet their torpedoes, American mothers may still their fears that their sons will be fed to the cannons' mouths. It will rather be the cold waves that will strangle out their young lives, and the shark's jaws that will close on their nearest and dearest.

While, Mr. President, we are preparing our Army we should give our first, our greatest consideration, our deepest concern to the submarine problem, which must be effectively dealt with before the Army can be used. We should not wait until some independent measure could be devised and put through. We should make this a part of this bill, so that the work can go on contemporaneously with the creation of our Army.

Mr. President, the first step taken by this Government before beginning the construction of the Panama Canal was to deal with the problem of yellow fever. Little as were the mosquitoes which infested that region, our first effort was to battle these insects. We began to study and investigate the cause of the yellow fever. Men sacrificed their lives to test out the truth of the proposition that this deadly contagious disease was contracted through the bite of an infected mosquito. The mosquito with its yellow-fever germ, destroying thousands upon thousands of workmen, had defeated the dream of de Lesseps. We gave our first attention to the mosquito and made that dream a reality. So, Mr. President, the dictates of reason point our course in this war. Our first attention, our first and greatest effort should be to meet this awful peril of the sea.

And how are we proposing to meet the situation? I want the attention of Senators on this line. They say, "Let us build more ships. If we can not build steel ships rapidly enough, let us build wooden ships. Let us see if we can not build more rapidly than the submarine can destroy."

I wish, Mr. President, that thinking business men would stop a moment and ponder that proposition, that method of solving the submarine problem. Think of it as an original proposition. We propose to founder this sea monster by overfeeding him. We propose to choke him to death by crowding more ships down his rapacious throat than he can swallow. We hope to keep him so busy that a sufficient number of these ships will get away while he is swallowing others. We have not in that proposition even contemplated how rapidly the number of these throats are increasing. Strange as it may seem, I have not heard one single suggestion, and the thought has never seemed to have occurred to those who propose this solution, that the all-important thing to Great Britain and our allies is the cargo that is in the ship; that every time we feed a ship to this sea monster we feed a cargo that is worth many times the value of the hull that takes it; that the world's capabilities in the production of food, clothing, and munitions have a limit, and the present supply of food is exceedingly short; and that we can not feed a quarter of that food, clothing, and munitions to the waves and have sufficient left to feed our allies and supply their armies. The thing we want to get across the ocean is the food. These terrible losses should be measured in cargoes rather than in hulls, and though we should increase our hulls, if we can not lessen the number of cargoes that are sent to the bottom of the ocean, the hull without the cargo is of little value.

Now, Mr. President, I want to impose again upon the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] by asking him to listen to the report of Mr. Hoover, whom we have chosen to take charge of the conservation of our foods.

Under the headlines, "Eat less or war is lost; Hoover warns America; Says allies will starve before September unless United States helps now," in the New York Tribune of Sunday, April 22, Herbert C. Hoover, chairman of the American Commission for Relief in Belgium, now head of the American food board, states that the food situation is one of the utmost gravity, which, unless solved, may cause us to lose this war; that if America continues its present rate of consumption, the total stock of food in the allied world is not sufficient to last until September; that the allies will need a minimum—now, listen to this—a minimum of 90,000,000 bushels of wheat from North America, more than twice to-day's apparent surplus on a normal export basis.

Mr. GORE. How much?

Mr. McCUMBER. Ninety million bushels; that to carry the allies over until the next harvest we must reduce our wheat consumption 30 per cent; and that conclusion, Mr. President, is based on the assumption that we get safely across the ocean all that we can export. We have not got in North America to-day 90,000,000 bushels to export and still supply our own wants. The winter-wheat crop may come in before the middle of July, but it must be harvested, thrashed, and marketed, and then it must be carried across the ocean. If any important part of that which we have hulls to transport should go to the bottom of the sea, we could not by any possibility supply their demand.

Mr. Hoover's observations were made after three weeks' consultation with members of the British, French, and Italian cabinets. He also investigated the food and shipping situation and plans for American cooperation.

So little consideration has been given to the more important subject of cargo that not one of our bureaus—neither the Department of Commerce nor the War Department, neither the Shipping Board nor the Bureau of Statistics—has attempted to secure or record any data whatever upon the value or quantity of food material that has been sunk, and yet that is the all-important thing at this time. It but demonstrates what I have been insisting upon, that our governmental bureaus are inclined to burrow themselves. I was compelled to go to the Journal of Commerce to secure the only information obtainable concerning even the tonnage and number of ships that have been sunk.

Mr. President, would it not be better to stop and see if we can not produce and equip our vessels with that which will protect them from these sea serpents? A torpedo working its way through the waves at a speed of about 30 miles per hour presents a very different problem from a shell shot from a gun with a velocity of several hundred feet per second. The torpedo has no guiding mind to control it the moment it leaves its tube. To say that there can not be devised some mechanism that will deflect or enmesh or explode the torpedo before it comes in contact with the hull of the vessel is, in my opinion, paying scant respect to the inventive genius of the country.

Mr. President, the mind of man has never produced an instrument of destruction which the same mind can not devise means to counteract. Our great error, grown now to be a great misfortune, is that we have given so much attention to the question of instrumentalities of ever increasing destructive power that we have neglected the equally important question of defense against such power. Germany alone seems to have comprehended the possibilities of the submarine and governed her warfare accordingly. At the beginning of the war she created as much havoc as possible to the merchant marine of her enemies by the use of her cruisers. Then she withdrew her dreadnaughts and her battleships from the seas, fenced them with her chain of mines under the shadow of her land batteries; and then she gave her whole attention—the constructive capabilities of all her shipyards—to the production of this weapon, the submarine. Those rattlesnakes of the sea, whose unseen stroke is always death, have driven every warship into port and have rendered the billions of dollars spent in building up what were thought to be invincible armadas almost useless so far as the defense of the merchant marine is concerned.

Mr. President, we have suddenly awakened to a new era—absolutely new—in naval warfare. It is worse than folly to go on as we are going to-day, spending hundreds and hundreds of millions for dreadnaughts, until we have devised some means to combat this new instrumentality. We can not conduct a successful warfare by attempting to produce a surplus greater than the submarine can destroy. We can not do it. And at present we have found no successful means of submarine destruction. The ocean is too large, and we can not destroy that which we can not see, or at least only to a most limited extent.

There are hundreds and hundreds of inventors ready and eager to spend their energies in the solution of this problem. They have not the means to test out their theories. Some of their propositions, of course, may have little or no merit. An intelligent board will be able immediately to cast those aside. Some propositions may presage great possibilities, but their efficiency or lack of efficiency can only be determined by proper trials and tests. Many of our most useful mechanical contrivances, in fact most of them, have been but the application of some older mechanism to new purposes and ends. The Patent Office contains thousands of these. The business world constantly has to deal with problems seemingly as desperate as the U-boat problem is to warfare. In the great steel factories of the country new mechanisms and new machinery are being constantly devised and constructed to meet new requirements. Given proper opportunity with proper inducement and I believe the U-boat problem can be solved. If we solve it, it will not be necessary for us to send one man to Europe. If we do not solve it, and if it increases, as it has been increasing, this war will be over before we have an army ready to send to Europe.

There should be constituted immediately an unbiased board composed of men with minds capable of investigation and open to conviction to weigh and measure these suggestions and propositions. The naval authorities of Great Britain and of the United States have so far been compelled to acknowledge their inability to meet the situation. Let them have the advice of the great mechanics, of the inventors, of the designers of this country, and let their energies be spurred on by promise of reward that will measure up in some little degree to the importance of the problem. If they succeed, we end this war in a few months; if they fail, it at least has cost the Government almost nothing. Is it not well worth the trial?

When the Merrimac, with ribs of steel and an impenetrable iron hull, threatened the devastation of all our northern commerce an Ericsson came to the front. There are many men of equal genius, power, and capability. We should call upon them, and we should call upon them now.

It has been suggested by the Senator from Oregon that this amendment would be more appropriate if offered to another bill which is upon the calendar. I concede that, but no man can say when that bill may become a law. This measure will become a law in a few days. This work can go on while you are creating the Army. Who can say that before another month we may not have devised some new mechanism that will protect the hull of a merchant vessel against the torpedo? We should not delay action simply because the amendment would be more closely related to the provisions of another bill. In the meantime famine and starvation stare our allies in the face. We can not afford to wait. Every energy of this country and its people—all the genius of this great Republic—should be brought to bear, and to bear immediately, upon the solution of that problem, which must be solved or we lose this war.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, Senators have quoted from different authorities in the discussion of this measure, and so I shall speak of the views of some gentlemen to whom I have written recently on this important question.

I addressed a communication to the presidents of several of our larger universities in the eastern part of the country requesting their views on this legislation, and if the Senate will bear with me for a few moments I will read their replies. They indicate, as I expected, the fact that these institutions of learning, where men have given years of study to the great problems of government, where as much as in any other place in the country you can find the true democratic spirit, are a unit in favor of raising an army by the selective draft system.

I am advised that in these great universities 90 per cent of the boys are ready and anxious to answer the country's call. The opinion of these gentlemen is all the more interesting in view of the fact that practically every student in these colleges are within the ages from which the new army will be drafted.

I will read first a telegram received from Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University:

> Earnestly favor selective draft provision in the Army bill. Hope it will be followed by permanent provision for universal national training for national service, which I regard to be quite as necessary in time of peace as in preparation for war. About 8,000 students and younger alumnis of Columbia University have registered as willing to accept some form of national service for which they may be found fit. Over 500 students and more than 600 alumnis are now taking voluntary military training. About 100 engineering students are preparing for coast patrol work. Others have gone to Newport Naval Training Station. Other large groups preparing for aviation work and Red Cross work.

> I am very strongly convinced that this measure will tend to equalize the burden of service and to increase throughout our whole citizenship the feeling of obligation to the country both in time of peace and in war.
> One hundred and fifty of our students have enlisted in active service, and upward of 900 of them in addition are taking the regular daily drill under Capt. Heintzelman, with additional military instruction of a theoretical nature, preparatory to offering their services to their country. In addition to this number, also, we have between 75 and 100 who are taking the course in aviation, which the alumni have established at Princeton, having procured an aviation field, two machines, and instructors and mechanics.

Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman, president of Cornell University, among other things, writes:

> Thanks to the statesmanship of President Lincoln and of Senator Morrill and his associates in Congress, there is in every State in the Union one university or college having a military department whose principal object is the training of undergraduates so as to qualify them in case of war to become at least lieutenants of volunteers. Cornell University has this military department in the State of New York, and we require military training of all our young men three afternoons a week for the first two years of their course. Since the danger of war appeared we recognized that some of our young men would be needed for military service and others for industrial, agricultural, and other labor, and on March 28 the university faculty, on my recommendation, adopted a resolution granting leaves of absence, without prejudice as to residence, scholastic standing, or degrees, to all students who might enroll in the land or naval forces of the State or Nation or in industrial or other enterprises contributory to the efficiency or success of such forces. Since that date we have granted leaves of absence to about 400 students to engage in farm labor and farm management, to about 200 students to engage in other kinds of labor contributory to military efficiency, such as labor in munition plants, in chemical establishments, etc., and to about 400 students who intend to enroll in various branches of the Army or Navy.
> I must, however, call attention to the fact that these 400 students who have already enrolled in the various branches of the Army or Navy represent only a small fraction of the students at Cornell University who are ready to enlist. At the present time I know no place in the country where young men have better opportunities for military training than those afforded by the military department at Cornell University, thanks to the personnel, equipment, and facilities supplied by the United States and the State of New York. I have consequently advised our students to remain in training under the military department of Cornell University until they were summoned to service in the Army or Navy. And in order that their opportunities for training here might be raised to the highest potency, I asked the faculty, and the faculty unanimously voted, to excuse all students of the university who would devote either a considerable portion or the whole of their time and energies to military training from a considerable portion or the whole of their academic work. Over and above the 1,400 students who still remain in the corps of cadets taking the required military training we now have a considerable number of men taking this intensive military training, and the number of these is daily increasing. I am glad to report, also, that my advice to students to continue their military training at Cornell University is in accord with instructions that have been issued by The Adjutant General to students in Cornell and similar institutions throughout the Union.
> May I end with a personal remark?

Dr. Schurman says:

> I have said to the students of this university that in all my experience and reading I know of no cause better worth fighting for and dying for than that which our country is now maintaining. I have said to them that if my life were of any good to the cause and the Government could use it I would willingly give it. I have no right, however, to urge other men's sons to enlist for battle or for death, nor have I done so. I have not even urged my own sons to enlist; but they are enlisting just the same, one of them a graduate in this year's class and another who graduated in 1913.

In the name of the young men of the country and for the sake of the young men of the country, I beg Congress to adopt the plan of organization of our military forces recommended by the President and his expert advisers—the only plan which will assuredly bring us success in the warfare we have deliberately and on high grounds decided to wage for the sake of freedom, civilization, and humanity.

Mr. President, here are the views of some of the great college presidents of our Nation, at the head of institutions where all the young men are eligible for draft. They see the wisdom of requiring men from every walk of life taking their share of the burden now facing the Nation and not permitting it to fall upon a very few.

I have some observations of my own on the subject to submit.

Mr. President, enlistments in the Regular Army since April 1, given by States, indicate the failure of the volunteer system. The Regular Army on April 1 required 183,898 enlisted men to bring it up to its full authorized strength. After 20 days of enlistments all over the country, the greater part of this period being after war was declared on April 6, the Regular Army had gained only 25,842 men. The figures of recent date do not show any appreciable increase in the rate of enlistment. It required 20 days to raise one-seventh of the quota for the entire country. At that rate it would take 140 days to complete the quota, or nearly five months. This is only the quota needed to bring the Regular Army to full strength, and takes into no account whatever the National Guard and the new army which is planned in this bill. It sustains completely the argument that the United States can not raise an adequate force by the volunteer system.

The selective-draft system is the only one which distributes the burden equally and scientifically. It levies the draft proportionately among the States, and each State must do its share. Likewise, no State can do more than its share, except by volunteering either in the Regular Army or the National Guard. It provides an Army not made up of classes—conscripts and volunteers—but wholly of drafted men, all on an equal footing.

It is the only system which will assure the United States of being able to engage in the war on a large scale without disturbing its industrial and agricultural balance. By the selective draft the Government will be able to take only those men, of the required military age, who can best be spared for service in the ranks. Under a volunteer system there is no way of preventing men from leaving necessary industries and crippling resources that are just as important as an army itself. The Government, in order to keep the Nation's industries at a high point of efficiency must have the power to reject men for service in the ranks who are needed more elsewhere. Such rejection will be no reflection upon these men, but will be a tribute to the fact that they can do better service for their country outside of the Army.

The selective draft is the only method by which the Nation's great industrial machinery can be safeguarded against deterioration. There are many patriotic men who will want to enter the military service and who ought not to be permitted to do so; not because they will not make good soldiers but because they can do more for their country by continuing in their occupations. The exemptions from draft provided in the pending bill, and the discretion which is left in the hands of the President to make additional exemptions, make certain that the Nation can not cripple itself, particularly when one of our first and greatest duties in the war is to assist our allies in maintaining living conditions in Europe rather than fighting conditions.

As an example, one of the first things this country faces is the construction of a very large fleet of cargo ships in addition to increasing the Navy. It would be a grave mistake, both from a military and economic standpoint, to take any man into the ranks whose services are needed in building ships. There is a shortage of such labor now. No man needed to help build ships ought to be allowed to volunteer as a soldier, and under the selective-draft system such a mistake will be prevented. The same thing applies to other industries directly affecting the war and also to agriculture.

Although none can predict the duration of the war, the only safe and sensible course for the United States to follow is to prepare for a long war; that means the raising of a large army; it means proceeding upon the principle that ultimately this country will be required to send an army to the European battle fields. The volunteering figures published from day to day by the War Department prove conclusively that no army of a size worth while sending to Europe can be raised by the volunteer system. Talk about raising a million volunteers overnight is nonsense. The United States has been actually at war for three weeks, and the ranks of the Regular Army and National Guard have been open to more than 600,000 volunteers; they are still open—wide open—and the volunteers are coming in slowly.

Mr. President, my attention has been called to certain facts regarding the enlistment of volunteers in the Civil War which has not yet been discussed in this Chamber. I am informed by the War Department that the loyal States of the country paid in bounties to volunteers the sum of $288,000,000, and the Federal Government also paid for the same service in the days of the Civil War the sum of $360,000,000. These two amounts together aggregate the enormous total of $648,000,000. It was necessary then, even in the hour when men were moved by great patriotic impulses, for the States and the Nation to contribute this vast sum for the purpose of obtaining volunteers. This fact, it seems to me, is worthy of very serious consideration.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. May I suggest to the Senator from New York that that was more than one-fifth of the total cost of the military operation of conducting the Civil War?

Mr. CALDER. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for his suggestion. The figures are certainly very large and go to show how important it is that this bill should be enacted.

Of this amount alone New York State paid in bounties to her volunteers the sum of $80,000,000. The State of New Jersey, a neighboring State to New York, contributed a sum exceeding $22,000,000.

The army that the United States must possess in order to wage successful war must be a large one; it must not be sectional; it must fall equally upon all States; it must be so organized that it does not in any way drain or impair the industrial resources of the United States; it must be raised upon a basis of equality and universal obligation, with full power to the Government to take into it those men who can best serve their country as soldiers and leave out of it those who can do more for their country by continuing in the occupations where their services are imperatively needed.

Mr. President, it is my purpose to vote for this measure, and for two reasons: First, it is the only certain way of raising an army of sufficient size, and, second, I can see no reason, Mr. President, why one man who is patriotic enough to take up his share of the burden should do his service while another, less patriotic, should be permitted to shirk his duty.

This is not a partisan war. It is a war in which all the people are united behind one leader, and is to be fought with all the might that the country possesses, in the end that peace may soon be accomplished. Mr. President, I make no complaint against any individual, but I trust the President will take advantage of the experience of England and France and in the very beginning place in charge of the departments of Government men who have been tried, men who are able to handle matters of large concern, so that the very best results can be obtained as we take each successive step.

This war upon which we have entered is the biggest business being transacted in the world to-day. Europe has organized for it on a business basis. It is paramount to every other form of human activity. The United States must organize for war in the same way. While there is high and noble sentiment in the aims for which we are fighting we can not permit sentiment to interfere with the building up of the organization that will carry on the work. It must be scientific; it must be effective and democratic; one under which no man can do more than his just share, while at the same time making sure of the fact that no man can be a slacker.

Mr. NEW obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield for a moment? I wish to ask the Senator from New York if he has the figures showing the amount of bounties paid to conscripts in the Civil War?

Mr. CALDER. I have not, I will say to the Senator. I particularly inquired of the War Department as to the sum paid to volunteers, and they informed me that the totals indicated by me were paid for volunteers only.

Mr. President, I ask to insert in my remarks a telegram from the chairman of the recruiting committee of the mayor's committee on national defense of the city of New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The telegram is as follows:

NEW YORK, April 26, 1917.

Hon. WM. R. CALDER,
Washington, D. C.:

Notwithstarding tremendous efforts and intensive campaigning on behalf of the regular recruiting officers and men assisted by numerous citizens' committees as well as thousands of volunteer women workers, supported by press, theaters, and motion-picture houses of New York, as well as comprehensive display of posters and window cards, the results to date are totally inadequate to meet military requirements. We consider the volunteer system an absolute failure. We know you are supporting the measure approved by the President, but we are furnishing you the above facts in the hope that they may be of some value to you in assisting the administration to pass the legislation which they consider essential for the purpose of increasing the military forces by the draft system, which is the only fair, efficient, and democratic way by which an army can be raised.

ALEXANDER J. HEMPHILL,
Chairman Recruiting Committee of the Mayor's Committee on National Defense.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, it is not my intention to deliver anything like an address to the Senate; I have not the purpose to do anything of that sort; but, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I have given to the pending bill the best thought and attention of which I am capable, and I have some ideas concerning it on which I should like to express myself very briefly.

In the first place, Mr. President, I think it is true that in the part of the country from which I come there is a considerable misapprehension as to the real character of this bill. At least half of all the mail I get refers to the bill as "a universal-service bill," which it is not. For the last 20 years, Mr. President, or nearly so, I have individually favored a system of universal military training, a service which goes a great deal further than this bill does. I do not think it is understood by the public in my section, for instance, that this bill does not provide for anything that even approaches universal military training. It falls far short of that, certainly. For instance, it is proposed to take 1 man in every 12 between the ages of 19 and 25 years; those who obtain military training are but the 1 in 12 who are drafted into the service. The other 11 receive nothing of the kind. Of course, they may be used in the manufacture of munitions or there may be a good reason why they are exempted; but the fact remains that they are exempted, and that they do not get any military training.

Mr. President, the newspapers seem to think that there is no opposition to this measure; that the opinion about it is all one way. I think that I could prove to any of the editors of such papers by the mail which I get in my office that they are mistaken about that. Half of the mail which I get, perhaps, is in favor of this bill; the other half is against it. The opinions that are expressed are by people who differ diametrically, and one set of them is as much entitled to consideration as is the other. I have tried to give proper weight to both sides.

I have now been a member of this body long enough to discover that a Senator gets a good deal of advice, to all of which he should listen, of course, and to all of which I have listened. I have also discovered that there is only one safe guide a Senator should follow, and that is his own judgment, and I shall follow mine. In taking my position on this bill I shall vote exactly as I think the exigencies of the occasion require. I am going to support the measure. I have had no thought at any time of doing anything else, and yet, Mr. President, there are some things about it that I confess I do not like.

For instance, I think too much is left in some respects to the discretion of the War Department. It is, Mr. President, just as important that after this bill has passed it shall remain the law as it is to pass it in the first instance. In this country no law will remain in force beyond the day when popular approval of it is withdrawn. It is important that every feature of this bill to which there is reasonable objection and which can be removed or modified without impairing the efficiency of the measure should be so removed or modified at this time.

For instance, one feature of the bill of which our people in Indiana complain is the section that provides that under the operation of the bill the Indiana man who is conscripted after the time the National Guard units are taken over into the Army of the United States may be assigned, and probably will be assigned, to commands in different parts of the country in which there are no Indiana men serving.

I am willing, Mr. President, to defer to the General Staff and to accord superior wisdom to it in most of the recommendations that they have made with reference to this bill, but neither the General Staff nor any other authority can make me believe that the 19 or 20 year old soldier from Indiana will serve as well—that he will make as good a soldier—if he finds himself in a command with a soldier from North Dakota on one side and one from New Hampshire on the other as he would if he found himself with soldiers from his own State, his own companions, with whom he has some community of interest.

The senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], in the very able exposition of the bill which he gave a few days ago, told us that it would be the policy of the War Department—and it was so stated before our committee also—to follow the plan of assigning the soldiers from a particular State to commands which had originally come from that State; but, Mr. President, if that is to be the policy of the War Department, why not write it into the law? The time to make a law right is when you make it in the first instance, and I think that should be written into the law. Departments sometimes change their minds; departments change their heads; the policy of one Secretary may not be the policy of the Secretary who preceded him; and so this policy should be made a part of the law and not be left to the varying whims of shifting department heads.

Another thing, Mr. President. I think the Senate of the United States ought not to pass a bill with a "joker" in it, and I think there is one in this bill. To that I am opposed, and I have prepared an amendment, which will be offered in due time, that is intended to provide that each State shall furnish its just proportion of the men who are to be conscripted into this army in the proportion that their population bears to the total population of the United States. It is not fair that one State should be required under any circumstances or for any reason to make up the quota that another State fails to provide. It is my opinion that no considerable element of our population should either be granted immunity from the draft, or to have immunity forced upon them, especially when that element is protesting against it, and where forcing it upon them in any particular State will result inevitably in the people of another State having to supply the deficiency thus created. There is in this bill a hidden provision which will result in exactly that very thing. The Senate and the people should know of this and know just what it is they are adopting and the difference it will make to the respective States if they do adopt it. I am opposed to it, and in the interest of the State I represent and those to be adversely affected by it I shall seek to have this measure amended to meet this objection.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield for a question?

Mr. NEW. I will.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why should not the same rule be brought down to the county or even to each township in the State? Why, for instance, should a State in making up its quota be allowed to take them from certain counties and leave other counties to not furnish any; or why should a township, or even a voting precinct, be relieved of furnishing its quota? Would it not be well to make the township the unit rather than the State?

Mr. NEW. I think it might be brought down to as fine a point as that without doing anybody any injustice, and I think that would probably meet with general approval. It certainly would meet with mine.

However, Mr. President, I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate. It was for the reason that I entertained the objections to the bill which I have just stated that I withheld my signature from the report of the majority of the committee. Those were the things which I had in mind when I withheld my name from that report. I shall at the proper time offer an amendment which will provide for meeting those objections.

Mr. President, that is all I now care to say.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, to-day it is not a question which should be discussed for one moment as to whether the Congress of the United States or any citizen of the United States shall stand by his country and stand by the President of the United States as the representative of his country.

The measure now pending is one which is being advocated, through which an army is to be raised to be placed at the command of the President of the United States. Under the Constitution of the United States the Congress of the United States, and not the President of the United States, nor the General Staff, nor the Secretary of War, shall raise the armies of the United States. In debating this question the Congress of the United States is performing its constitutional duty. To follow, without consideration and without debate, any plan proposed by anyone else would be a further surrender than Congress, even, as yet has made of its constitutional duties. The impatience of some of the great newspapers, of some of the Senators, of some of the college professors, and of some of those who are holding meetings in the different States of the country with the action of Congress in proceeding to debate this proposition is based upon the modern theory that the entire management of the affairs of this country is vested in one department.

I might admit, sir, that since four years ago the Congress of the United States, without rhyme or without reason, reversed itself upon a great matter of policy because the President told them to do so, and that Congress, surrendering then its prerogatives, has continued to yield its constitutional prerogatives to the executive department, therefore that Congress iself has given cause that there should now exist among the people of the country a misunderstanding of the duties of this body.

Mr. President, those of us who think that the pending measure should be amended at least are sincere in the belief that we are just as patriotic as are those Senators who take this bill as it comes from the committee without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." I know that those of us who have the temerity to express the views which I am expressing may expect criticism, violent criticism, possibly denunciation; but for one, Mr. President, I have been for five years in the position where, by experience, to paraphrase Kipling, I have learned to hear the words I have spoken twisted by others to make a trap for fools.

Mr. President, we are to-day, in my judgment, confronted by the greatest emergency which our people have ever met or been called upon to meet in this country, with the exception of the days of the Civil War. I am so thoroughly impressed with the fact that it is an emergency that I object to the passage of this bill as it stands, because it is in no sense an emergency measure, except that it contains in its first line the word "emergency."

I propose to stand by the President of the United States. Not only as the President of the United States, but when we shall have raised an army as the constitutional Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States; but I know that when the Congress of the United States has by the passage of this measure, or any other measure or resolution, simply authorizing the President of the United States to raise an army—or as I conceive this bill, restricting the President of the United States in raising an army—when the Congress of the United States has done that, then the Congress of the United States has no further power of any character whatsoever in the matter of, in the conduct of, the war, of the direction of the war, of the removal of an incompetent from some important position, but that the power is vested in one man, and in one man alone; therefore, with due respect to the great press of the United States, to the college professors who are sending telegrams here, to those who are holding patriotic meetings and instructing us as to our duties, with great respect to the people of the United States who believe that this measure is an emergency measure and should be adopted, I propose to explain what it is in my conception.

The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in interrupting the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]—I thought with some heat—stated that this had been his measure for one year and a half; that it was not an emergency measure offered now to meet an emergency, but had been the policy which he, as chairman of the committee, thought should have been adopted a year and a half ago in time of peace, when this country was yet pursuing the "watchful waiting" policy.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to say to the Senator that I did not intend to go quite that far, if I made that statement. My purpose was to state that the principle of universal military training, which I had been advocating for a long while, is fully recognized in this bill, and I stated, or intended to state, that the same principle was embraced in a bill which I had introduced more than a year ago and which was known as the universal military training bill.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I think that I did not misquote his words, but I thank him for his explanation, because if he could make it to every man who has sent a telegram here, if he could impress it upon the minds of Senators here, then this bill would never pass without such amendments as some of us are insisting upon.

Universal military training! Yes; the people of the United States have been aroused to the necessity of universal training, and the telegrams that are sent here to-day are upon the proposition of universal training and not with reference to the existing emergency, except in so far as they have been told by the great press of this country that this measure does meet an emergency. This is a measure for peace; it is a measure of preparedness; it is possibly a measure which should be adopted to prepare us for an emergency, but in no sense, as I have stated, is it an emergency measure in itself, except that it has the word "emergency" printed in the first line of the bill. That, sir, is my objection to it.

Mr. President, some of the Members of the Senate will remember that for four years or more I have been insisting that some emergency measure should be adopted, that some measure of preparedness should be adopted. Some of you who were here when the treaty with Denmark for the purchase of the Danish West Indies was under consideration will recall that at that time I told you almost word for word what you would be confronted with at this time, and urged the purchase of the Danish West Indies as a measure of preparedness.

I have been thoroughly impressed for a number of years that, governed solely by our own selfish, material, national interests, the United States of America should have prepared to enter this great war on the side of the allies. I have urged here time and again that if she did not prepare and selfishly take part with the allies in this war she would in all human probability be confronted with the serried armies of Germany upon the American Hemisphere; and, sir, I am sorry to say that I am not now an optimist. I believe now that unless the United States of America throws its men into the trenches of France in all human probability the United States of America must build trenches upon her own soil in the near future to resist an attack from an almost irresistible world power.

You can understand from my expressions that I am not one of those who seek to stand for one moment in the way when it is proposed to raise a great army; but, on the other hand, it has been astounding to me to note the insistence upon the passage, without any amendment, of a measure of this kind, which is avowedly a peace measure, a measure of preparedness, and, in my judgment, not a war measure, or, at least, an emergency measure.

As yet, sir, the people of the United States understand that we have made a declaration of war, and therefore we are at war; but the great mass of the people of the United States apparently do not understand that the United States of America, our loved country, is now in war, and the Senate and the Congress of the United States, in my judgment, do not yet understand that we are in war, and that every sacrifice must be made, every material resource must be used in its prosecution.

Why, Mr. President, we will win this victory; but, unless the German people rise up against the military régime now governing them, we will win it at a sacrifice that we did not make even from 1861 to 1865; we will win, because eventually right must triumph and civilization will not be extinguished; we will win, because soonor or later this great Nation, not a military Nation in any sense, but a Nation of great warlike people, will rise in its might and at least, through the pressure of public opinion, if not through the voices of their selected Representatives here, will force from office those who would tie their hands and shackle their feet and leave them, without experience, at the mercy of the military régime, which to-day is as absolutely unprepared to meet the emergency as it was four months ago, drilling men who are offering themselves in the service of their country with broomsticks; not able, they say, to arm the National Guard, which is offering itself day by day to fill up the ranks, using as an excuse that they have not authorized the recruiting to war strength of the present National Guard, and stating that they are not even able to supply the equipment which is needed. Why, Mr. President, some great calamity, possibly occurring immediately, might arouse the people of the United States and might arouse those who have charge of its present Military Establishment to the fact that the United States is in war.

France sent us money when we needed it. She sent her sons to serve under Washington. She sent her navy under Rochambeau. She sent her army to join us in the trenches at our call. The Congress of the United States has passed a bill providing for a loan to be made upon Government bonds to be issued by France as security; and the Senate of the United States is now proposing to pass a bill under which by August 1 it is proposed that the men who shall be summoned shall be registered, and that after August 1 the boys between 19 and 25 years of age who have been registered shall be considered by the recruiting officers; and, in the discretion of the President of the United States, any one of them who has any occupation of any kind or character can be exempted, or, if inadvertently he may have been enlisted, then he may be discharged. An emergency measure to allow or to direct the President of the United States to raise an army for the defense of this country! It is a restrictive measure, tying the hands of the President of the United States and shackling the people of the United States, which in the end will result, if fully carried out, in establishing a military caste among the people of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. If it will not interrupt the Senator, and because he has approached a part of this bill which I think is susceptible of a construction that I did not discover until a short time ago, I should like the privilege of asking the chairman of the committee his construction of the language I am about to read. I am addressing the inquiry to the chairman of the committee; and it is in point with what the Senator from New Mexico is saying, or I would not bring it up.

Mr. FALL. I am glad to have the Senator interrupt me.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to the language appearing on line 19, page 6. By way of preliminary I will say that the bill up to that point provides for filling the Regular Army by enlistment; and if the men do not enlist, then by draft; for filling the militia by enlistment and drafting the militia into the service; and then for raising 500,000 men by draft, with the privilege of raising a further 500,000 by draft, and then a further 500,000 by draft.

On page 5 the language is:

> Such draft shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 19 and 25 years, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act.

Now, coming to the language to which I especially call attention, section 3 provides for an absolute exclusion from the draft of certain officers of the United States, persons of certain religious opinions, and then this language follows:

> And the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof—

> or to draft for partial military service only, persons of the following classes: Customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mails; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate; pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency; those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support, which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable; and those found to be physically and morally deficient. No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists.

Now, to explain what I am trying to get at, notice: "The President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft" these people; but there is the other clause: He is authorized to exclude or discharge or to draft for partial military service only. Now, I want to know from the chairman of the committee if those words, "or to draft for partial military service only," were not put in this bill after it was prepared, if he can tell me?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator mean whether they were put in after the bill came from the committee?

Mr. REED. Oh, no; whether they were put in after the bill was drawn, either before it actually went to the committee or in the committee?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not so sure about that; but I think I have the original draft of the bill, as it came to the chairman of the committee. I do not think any change was ever made after it came to the committee.

Mr. REED. If the Senators will take the bill and read it with the words "or to draft" in it, the presence of those words makes a part of the language almost meaningless; but the point I am trying to get at is an important one: I want to know if, under that clause, "or to draft for partial military service only," an additional power is not conferred upon the President, a power in addition to the ordinary military draft, and if it is not possible under that power for the President, if he saw fit, to draft, we will say, every engineer upon the railroads into the military service and simply call upon them——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that in nearly every military act that has been passed since the first act of 1792 all of the classes named in the language to which the Senator calls attenion have been entirely exempted from military service.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Oh, I am not speaking of an exemption; I am speaking of an additional power to draft. Does not this language give the President the power to call upon anybody outside of those who may be ordinarily drafted?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I am going to ask the indulgence of the Senator from Missouri. I think the proposition which he is now advancing must be settled before this bill is ever voted upon. I think it is very important, and I have been struck with another phase of it; but at this particular moment, if the Senator will allow this to go over until I come to the conclusion of my remarks, I should be glad to continue my statement.

Mr. REED. I perhaps ought not to have interrupted the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I am very glad the Senator has called attention to the matter, because it will give other Senators an opportunity to look into it and possibly be able to meet some of the objections which I can see, as well as those which the Senator has read.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I just say, in conclusion, that I presume that language was put in to exclude from the partial military service these individuals.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I will say that I do not know whether this was intended to enable the President of the United States to draft some people for military service and then to draft other people for partial military service, or whether coming under this exclusion proposition there was no provision for his drafting for partial military service; but this was a provision to enable him to exclude certain people from partial military service. I will say that I can not understand it.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to have it stated as strongly as words will express it, that it may appear in the RECORD without any equivocation whatsoever, that I hope not to vote for any measure which does not contain a conscription proposition. At the same time I hope not to be compelled to vote for a half-prepared, half-way peace measure, half-preparedness measure at this critical moment unless there is along with it a provision to meet the present emergency, which, in my judgment, should be met by appealing to the patriotism of the people of the United States, which has never in the past been appealed to in vain, by authorizing the President and directing the Secretary of War to call for volunteers, and at the same time empowering the President to take the coward and the slacker who will not serve his country in one capacity or another and compel him to serve it.

I would not want to vote for the volunteer system without a provision for conscription. I do not want to vote for any purely conscriptive measure; and certainly I do not want to be compelled to vote for a measure which is not one of universal service, not one under which a proper army can be conscripted, but one which restricts the President in every move which he makes, which provides that he can not raise an army except of those between 19 and 25 years of age first, and then which provides in terms that the sense of the Congress of the United States is that he should exempt those men who come under the provisions of this act; which is so broad in its terms that he may exempt "persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency."

In other words, as a lawyer I say, following the ordinary rule of statutory construction, where the legislative body enacts a law and includes within it a provision directory, or even permissive, in its nature to the executive who shall carry out the law, the executive is entirely justified in construing the permissive words of the statute as directory to himself. I appeal to any lawyer here whether that is not the correct rule of interpretation. In the event, to go to the extreme limit of that rule, the President chose to treat these words as directory, then, sir, between the ages of 19 and 25 he could only place in the ranks of the United States Army the boys who have not a job.

An emergency measure? Mr. President, gallant France, to which this country owes so much, is practically, except in nobility of spirit and courage, at her last gasp. She is praying for men to take the vacant places in those trenches which are flooded with the blood of her soldiers. She has a right to expect that the descendants of those whom she helped to gain their independence will at any sacrifice of their volunteers, the best blood in the United States, come now to her assistance in her time of dire need and peril. But if this offers no appeal, then I say to you that if you ever let the Germans reach Paris, through Mexico, backed by 15,000,000 people friendly to them, they will next reach Chicago and cut your great United States in two without the necessity of bombarding one of your Atlantic or western ports. In self-preservation you must have men on the firing line, and you must have them there at the earliest possible moment.

This is no measure providing for that policy. What is the policy which we propose to pursue? If you are voting for a half-hearted, half-prepared measure for preparedness, that you may here be ready selfishly and cold-bloodedly to defend your own factories and farms through the sacrifice of France and Great Britain; if that is your purpose, this measure will to some extent enable you to carry it out, provided the thin

French lines hold, and provided the gallant Britons are able to land recruits in France until such time as you may hide behind your breastworks on American soil and then say to Germany, "Come and attack us." If this is your purpose, Senators, this bill well prepares to carry it out. If you realize your danger, although you may think nothing of the sacrifice of the French and of the English in your interests—if you realize your danger, then you will pass a war measure, and not a peace measure.

Now, sir, the questions as to how the armies of the United States should be raised were discussed when the Constitution of the United States was formed. The people of the United States were determined that they should have no great military establishment. It was proposed that the standing army of the United States at any time should be limited to 3,000. It was proposed that the United States should not be allowed to have a standing army at all, or to raise troops. It was proposed that only the States of the Union themselves should have the right to raise troops, and that the National Government might, in time of emergency, call upon those States for their troops. It was proposed that the troops of the United States of America should not attack another country on foreign soil. It was the understanding that the troops of the United States could be used upon American soil. Finally, by a compromise, it was agreed that no restriction should be placed upon the power of Congress to raise troops for the National Government, except that no appropriation bill on the subject should be passed for more than two years, so that no military caste might be formed, and so that this country might not become a great military nation.

The question of the constitutionality of conscripting troops for foreign service I do not propose to discuss. Constitutions must yield to great national necessity. The question was discussed in this Chamber by Daniel Webster, who took the position that you had no right to raise an army for foreign service, at least, by conscription. By volunteering we have fought upon foreign soil; by conscription, never. By volunteers we fought the Mexican War. By volunteers we fought the Spanish War. By conscripts we have fought no war upon foreign territory. These matters were all discussed at great length when the constitutional provisions were being adopted.

You can not be efficient as a military nation and maintain your freedom as a democracy. The world knows that. Military efficiency and democracy do not go hand in hand except as the democracy may be made efficient by military training in time of peace; and yet even then it can never be as efficient as is the Prussian autocracy to-day.

Hold up to us the example of Prussia? Then, sir, forget the words of the Declaration of Independence, reject the counsel of those who made this country for you, and remember that in the adoption of these constitutional provisions and restrictions with reference to the military force of the United States the great authority appealed to by some here for conscription, George Washington, presided over the convention, and Madison and Hamilton and Jay and others took part in the debates. The constitutional provisions and the policy of this country are the outgrowth of their counsel and of their ability.

Now, sir, if you choose military efficiency, if that way lies the path for this country in the future, then you must understand that your form of government itself must be changed. Why, Mr. President, Germany is supposed to be composed of some six kingdoms and many grand duchies and duchies, free cities, and free States, represented in the Reichstag and represented in the Bundesrath; but under their articles of confederation or agreement the Prussian Diet has the right to veto any measure restricting the army or its conduct which might be adopted by the Reichstag, and remember that under the Prussian constitution the Kaiser has the right to veto any act which they may pass touching the army, and that no power exists to pass such an act over his veto. They have military efficiency; but without the abject surrender of the constitutional rights, powers, and prerogatives of this body, or even with that abject surrender unless you change your form of government, you can not expect to have the military efficiency of a nation like Germany.

Now, Mr. President, what is the emergency, and to what is it due? Let us have a little frank talk.

For several years past we have heard nothing except that practically at any cost we were to be kept at peace, to be kept out of war. Then the talk about universal military training sprang up as an antidote. Those who would keep us at peace at any cost held out to the people the proposition that they should be trained in military science by some method of universal training.

The last campaign was fought entirely or practically so upon the issue of peace. The people of the United States were not prepared for a declaration of war. The people of the United States have not been aroused to the necessity for this war, because they have been told that there was no necessity and would be no necessity for the war. They were told three years ago that those of us who insisted upon preparedness for war were hysterical. Then a great Secretary of War, impressed with the idea that there should be some measure of preparedness adopted, offered a bill creating a continental army of 400,000 men for use in just such an emergency. The President of the United States indorsed it in a speech made November 5, 1915, at the Biltmore Hotel, before the Manhattan Club. The President of the United States gave strong indorsement, as I read it, to that measure as he is now understood to be giving to this. And yet it was not insisted upon, and that Secretary of War resigned from the Cabinet and nothing yet was done.

Mr. President, we had and have now a law providing for this emergency. Congress in 1914 prepared an act to meet exactly this emergency. Nothing more was necessary than that. When the President of the United States asked us to declare war he should have asked us in the same resolution to authorize him, under the act of 1914, to raise armies with which to carry on the war. The provisions of the law were already made. He could have called into the service of the United States any number he might desire, and he could have asked you to apply to the volunteers exactly the same measure of selection which he asks you to provide here in the draft. As a substitute for the Garrison plan we passed, with the approval of the President, the National Guard act of June 3, 1916.

It was announced over the signature of Gen. Hugh L. Scott, in indorsing an article written by the present censor of the press, George Creel, that the National Guard act of June, 1916, was a failure. We are told one day that we will not recruit up the National Guard. We are told by the Secretary of War that there is no power under which they will recruit any additional units, as authorized by law, of the National Guard. Then we are told the next day that the Judge Advocate General has overruled the Secretary of War and that he will recruit it. We are told by the advocates of the bill here that there is a provision for volunteers exactly under this National Guard ruling by the Judge Advocate General. The fact remains the orders are out and are being obeyed that the National Guard shall not be recruited, and the excuse given is that we have not the weapons with which it can be equipped.

There is no purpose, in my judgment, to use the National Guard except purely upon this soil in any event, and that was one of the provisions which was discussed in the convention which framed the Constitution. It was intended that the State troops should remain within the United States territory. Therefore, except as a defensive force on our own soil, under the plan as I understand it and under the laws and procedure heretofore, the State troops were expected to remain within the confines of their own country. Therefore, of the troops which you are going to send abroad, if you ever conclude to send any abroad, there will remain the Regular Army of the United States and such troops as may be raised by conscription under the provisions of this act, if any such pass the censorship of the recruiting officers appointed by the President of the United States.

Why has recruiting for the Regular Army been a failure, as we are told? There are several reasons. Officered as is the Regular Army of the United States the enlisted man is not the social equal of his officer. He receives a pittance for his service. He is not allowed in a dining room if his officer happens to be dining in the same room, because the officer objects to it.

Mr. BORAH. Is that a rule of the Army?

Mr. FALL. It is not a rule, but there are regulations of the Army which provide that there shall be no familiarity between the enlisted men and the officers.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that that is a regulation which is promulgated by some one who has authority to promulgate it, and that it is found among the prescribed regulations of our Army?

Mr. FALL. It is not in the prescribed regulations, as I recall it, but the Senator will find it in Andrews's work on the units of the American Army, and in instructions to the squad leaders and instructions to the younger men in the Army; and I may say that Capt. Andrews's book has been indorsed as of very high authority and of very great worth by Gen. Leonard Wood, of the Regular Army of the United States. The general instructions are understood and followed by officers.

I may say to the Senator that I made this statement because of something that occurred in my presence recently when the National Guard was sent to the border. In one of the large hotels in our part of the country, and for our part of the country a great hotel, on the immediate border of Mexico, near a Regular Army post, Regular Army officers were in the habit of taking their meals, particularly their dinners.

When the National Guard was ordered to the border there came men from Michigan, from Wisconsin, from New York, from Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and all the other States of the Union, young college boys, some who had gone in to recruit and fill up the ranks of the Boston Battery, officered by men whose fathers and grandfathers were in the service of their State. The battery was served by enlisted men of the best families of the State of Massachusetts. It is a great State institution and a State pride. Boys came from Oregon and from every State in the Union and enlisted even as orderlies, that they might serve in that battery. The best blood of the Union, if there is any best blood—if by best blood we mean those who have the advantage of education and who can name their grandfathers—was in that battery; and yet, in my presence, a Regular Army officer demanded of the proprietor of the hotel that he should not let these Massachusetts boys come into the dining room. He could provide them a separate dining room; or if that were impossible, he should have an officers' table for themselves, and put up a screen or arrange the tables in a way so that they—the officers—would not be associated with enlisted men.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me? Can the Senator tell me whether I have been correctly informed that the Canadian officers and enlisted men mess together?

Mr. FALL. I am told so; and if we ever send any of our Regular Army to the trenches of France to serve with Poilu, they will find the private soldier drinking his bottle of wine with his major or his colonel, for there the enlisted man feels that he is equal to any officer, but that he must obey the command of that officer when on military duty. France, the great democracy, is able to maintain a great army, which she has been compelled to do, because she maintains it as a democratic army and has not created a military caste.

Again, why do the boys not go into the Regular Army? Sir, those in the Regular Army on enemy soil at Vera Cruz were very industriously engaged for many months in cleaning up the filthiest city north of the Panama Canal for the benefit of a lot of brigands. Those who served in the Regular Army in the Pershing expedition were compelled to see their comrades shot down by a mob at Carrazal and were not allowed to go to their assistance. They were compelled to see their comrades lie blistering in the sun and begging for water, and hear their moans, and were not allowed to go to Carrazal.

If you want recruits for the Regular Army, my friends, put over every recruiting station, "Men enlisted here for battalions in French trenches," and immediately you will get all you want. So long as they understand the policy of this country to be that they are to serve on the border by keeping their faces turned to the American side to prevent some reckless American from hurting Villa or some Mexican bandit, so long as they understand that this is their duty, so long will your Regular Army system be a failure, and those of us who have in our hearts any love for democracy as a matter of fact respect that feeling on the part of those who otherwise might have enlisted.

The recruits for the National Guard were a failure. It was a very hard matter to fill up the National Guard on the border. Why? Because those who were mustered in or drafted into the service of the United States who had joined the National Guard under such terms of enlistment as their States provided were required to sign an oath joining the National Guard in the service of the United States for six years. Many of them would not do it. And now the Secretary of War has been compelled to say that when he does call for enlistments for the National Guard, if he does do so, he will agree that he will discharge them at the end of this war. If that agreement had been made when the National Guard went to the border, that they could be discharged so soon as the emergency for which they were called was over, there would not have been a missing man at roll call the next morning.

Why, sir, with all the enthusiasm of the patriotic American youths, the National Guard in every State of the Union at the call of the President made its way to the border as rapidly as the Regular Army headquarters could furnish transportation. It is not their fault that they did not get there sooner. They went there because they believed that when the President called them immediately after the massacre at Carrazal they were going there in the service of their country and not simply to lie in tents in the blistering southern sun. When they found they were mistaken and that they had been drafted in under what they considered, many of them, practically false pretenses for a six years' enlistment, three years in the active service and three years in the reserve, many of them were so thoroughly disgusted that they would have availed themselves of any excuse or any opportunity to avoid any further service in the National Guard.

Now, Mr. President, the newspapers of the country and various good citizens of the country have been criticizing Congress for delay in passing this bill. Congress has stood as patriotically behind the present occupant of the White House as any Congress ever stood behind any man in time of dire danger or in time of peace.

Congress has passed the greatest appropriation bill ever known in any five years of this country's life and has placed without any one qualifying restriction billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is the duty of the Congress of the United States, sir, to see that money is paid out by direct appropriation. Congress has abdicated its functions, has surrendered to the President of the United States the sole control of practically seven or eight billion dollars, I believe, for which not even an accounting can practically be demanded.

I am not going to refer at this time to the use of some of the funds already provided by the Congress in this bill in direct opposition to the wording of the law made by the Congress of the United States, as I understand its terms. Congress has voted this enormous amount of money; it has pledged all the resources of the Government and gone further than that and pledged all the resources of the country; and is it now expected to place the lives of the boys of this country, without any restriction whatsoever, in the hands of men of no military experience without expressing its own views, without discussing fully what should be done, who should serve, and how they should serve? Sir, if the people of the United States generally demand this of Congress, then the people of the United States demand an autocracy to-day and are tired of their democracy.

I for one, Mr. President, may say to you now that in the face of the propaganda which has been carried on in the United States for the last few years, in the face of that which is now being carried on, in the face of the apathy of the people to the danger of this great country in the last three or four years, I have not believed and do not believe now that some of those charged with the administration of this Government realize the great emergency. In the firm belief that out of this war will come a change of government in this country, I am speaking to you now probably for the last time, because I say to you frankly and openly, Senators, the end of my present term will witness my withdrawal from public life, and I am speaking to you with all solemnity, earnestly if mistakenly. You are in the passage of this bill giving a greater power to a President than was ever possessed by Peter the Great of Russia or any other autocrat from the earliest days of history to the time of the overthrow of Nicholas of Russia. You are doing what Washington and others advised against rather than in favor of, and you are doing under the provisions of this act a futile and, in my judgment, a foolish thing.

Sir, Congress abdicates its functions upon the demand of newspapers or of the executive officers who seem to be laboring under the delusion that a Secretary of War called from civil life in Cleveland is as fully armed and equipped for the management of a great military force as was the goddess Minerva, who sprang, fully armed and armored, from the head of Jupiter to defend Athens in time of need. Is it possible that the people of the United States believe that a man, serving possibly as a proprietor of a newspaper, by the simple call of the voice of the master becomes one qualified to direct the destinies of the iron dogs of the Navy and advise what shall be done with our first line of protection? And we shall not discuss it; we must vote as patriotic Senators from our States, as the Senator from Oregon doubtless thinks we should vote, for this measure, placing in the hands of the Secretary of War the lives of our boys without restriction of any kind, and then allowing him to select whom he pleases.

Mr. President, the people of the United States so long as their Constitution remains in effect during this war can only pray that from the admitted intelligence of the President of the United States may arise the wisdom that his may be the great heart, the knowledge of the people of the United States, the sympathy with the common man of the United States, the understanding of the purpose of this democracy. We can only pray that with his intelligence he may possess those faculties which enabled Abraham Lincoln to save this Union in its time of need. We can only hope and pray that the Secretary of War may become imbued with the wisdom of military science, the knowledge of a Napoleon, but if so, it contraverts your theory that only the Regular man is a proper soldier. We can only hope that this may prove true. We can only hope that the Secretary of the Navy of this Union may arrive at some understanding of the needs of the Navy and of the desire of the people, because having placed the wealth of the country, as we have done, in the hands of these two Secretaries we are now placing as well the lives of the country in their hands.

Should incompetency or mistake cause the loss of millions or of hundreds of thousands of lives there is no method by which the Congress of the United States can meet that incompetency, because you can only impeach one in the executive department for high crimes and misdemeanors. No power under our Constitution can make a vacancy in the office of the Secretary of the Navy except the power of the presidential office, although that Secretary might send to the bottom every ship upon which you depend for your safety.

In what I have said I want it distinctly understood that I am not reflecting upon the intelligence, patriotism, or ability of either of these men. I only offer my earnest prayer that they may make no mistakes, and my since hope impressed in my heart, Mr. President, impressed with the great seriousness of this occasion, is that they will prove themselves competent and of the courage and wisdom of any military leader who ever led a devoted people to victory. But if they prove incompetent, Senators, you can not reach them. Your power stops with the creation of the Army and voting and raising the funds. And yet it is demanded that in these measures your voice even should not be heard if in any respect not voting "aye" to every proposition submitted for your consideration under the statement that it is an administration measure.

Mr. President, there have been some authorities quoted here, and I am going to occupy the time of the Senate in using the same authorities. Gen. Emory Upton is the authority relied upon and quoted by those who advocate this measure without amendment—I mean in the Senate and by those upon the outside. I may say it is relied upon and it is quoted by the newspapers.

Some of his opinions on the previous page and on page 14 also have been quoted from. On page 14 Gen. Upton says that one of the great weaknesses of our military system is "the assumption of command by the Secretary of War." I read from page 14, Upton's Military Policy of the United States, under the subhead of "Tenth." Gen. Upton goes a little further, Mr. President, than he has been quoted, and on page 11 he says, "Battles are not lost alone on the field; they may be lost beneath the Dome of the Capitol; they may be lost in the Cabinet, or they may be lost in the private office of the Secretary of War."

Now, over the constitution of the armies in the field the Congress has some power; over the deliberations in the bureaus the Congress of the United States has no authority. No one except the President of the United States has the right to be present at a secret conference in the office of the Secretary of War. Yet this great military authority, relied upon absolutely by those who insist on the passage of this bill without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i," calls the attention of the people of the United States in his introduction to the work that the fault with the military system is not the volunteer. The cause of the loss of battles—and very few battles have been lost by this country in a conflict with any other country—the cause of the loss of battles, as Upton knew, the cost of millions to our citizens, the cause of the loss of thousands of lives of the citizens of our country lay here—not with the men. If at Bull Run they were untried men, they were fighting untried men; if they were not Regular Army men, neither were their opponents. The cause of the failure for the first two or three years of this great Government of the United States to do what it finally did lay in Washington, not with the armies in the field, and Upton knew it, because Upton had been one of those volunteers himself.

And, quoting a little further, he says that some who may have been in the volunteer service or may have approved of the volunteer service may criticise him for his expressions here with reference to the volunteers.

I am now reading on page 3—

I can only reply that where they have enlisted for the period of three months, and, as at Bladensburg and on many other fields, have been hurled against veteran troops, they should not hold me responsible for the facts of history which I have sought impartially to present.

His criticism has been invariably directed at the old State militia system and at the short-term enlistment, not at the drilled volunteer.

To such volunteers as enlisted for the period of the Mexican War, and particularly for two and three years during the War of the Rebellion, with whom it is my pride to have served and to whom I owe all of my advancement in the service, I but express the opinion of all military men, in testifying that their excellence was due not to the fact that they were Volunteers but to the more important fact that their long term of service enabled them to become, in the highest sense, Regulars in drill, discipline, and courage.

Read Upton's Military Policy from the first line of the introduction to the last section, and you will find that his criticism has been that of any man of ordinary common sense in reference to the volunteer system, not to the volunteers as soldiers, because the world, I think, realizes the truth of what Lord Roberts, of England, said. Although he had been insisting upon preparedness and had not been listened to, when, in expressing his opinion, as I read somewhere, he made the statement that the volunteer was the best soldier on the face of the earth; and neither Upton nor any other military man dares to or has differed in this opinion. The whole fight here is not against the volunteer; the fight here is for the control of any army by the Regular Staff.

The absolute impotence of the Congress of the United States has possibly not struck the world because up until this time the eyes of the world have not been upon the action to be taken or proposed to be taken in any great world crisis by the United States; but, Mr. President, it must appear to our distinguished visitors from Great Britain and from France that this is a most peculiar form of so-called democracy which we have here. If they had happened to read the newspapers published about the time of the arrival of the first contingent of these visitors, must they not have been astounded at the statement reported in the papers that the President of the United States had been in his room at the Capitol sending for Senators of his party—Democratic Senators—and objecting to the passage of the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] for the creation of a legislative committee to advise with his departments.

Why, sir, these distinguished visitors of ours are themselves the representatives of the legislative departments of their Governments. They hold office not respectively under the King of England nor the President of France, except by fiction of law, but under the authority of the English Parliament and the French Assembly. They are responsible to the English Parliament, and through that body to the English people, on the one hand, and to the French Assembly and to the French people upon the other. Must it not be astounding to these distinguished allies to meet a civilian board, created by the Legislature of this country for advice in national defense—must it not be astounding for them to meet such a board, and then to be told that, although these civilians are rendering magnificent service and have been created by Congress, the Congress itself shall not appoint a board to confer and advise with the members of the Cabinet or with the President? It may be well enough that our visitors should understand something of the Constitution of our Government, because, otherwise, as we proceed during this war they may be most absolutely astounded at some of the obstacles presented or some of the things done by those who can not be held responsible except by the people of the United States at an election four years from now. They must be made to understand now that the Congress of the United States when it passes this measure is bound and helpless, and that the safety of this great country is in the hand of one man. The conduct of the war and of all our other business, even to the drafting of our citizens from one occupation into another, the fixing of our food prices, the control of our industries, under any bill which you may pass, are to be placed absolutely in the hands of the greatest autocrat—I do not mean personally, but under our form of government—of whom history has ever spoken.

These are some of the defects of our Government, and yet in attempting to maintain this as a democracy we have the weakness, when it comes to an emergency, as I have stated, of a democracy as opposed to the efficiency of an autocracy. When you now undertake to make this country as efficient as an autocracy under the provisions of the Constitution as it stands and under the provisions of your legislation as you are making it, you are changing your form of government inevitably, and the people will hold you responsible. If they acquiesce, then they do not want a democracy.

Mr. President, a good deal has been said about volunteers in the Revolutionary War; quotations have been made from Washington and others. During the Revolutionary War this was not even a country; we had no Union; we had only a confederation. We had a Continental Congress. State troops might be sent by the governor, or persuaded after pleading by the governor of the State, to go to Valley Forge or to join Washington in the field. When they found that he was living upon potatoes or upon scraps, at their sweet will and pleasure they could leave him and return to their States, and there was no power which could keep them in the service. That condition is now used as an argument in favor of military conscription as proposed in this bill.

In the War of 1812, Mr. President, it might as well be understood now—if some Senators possibly do not remember a little of the history of that war—that we had just had trouble with France a few years before, and that the Democratic Party had sprung into existence largely in opposition to the Federalists upon the issues of the war with France. It must also be remembered that the war with Great Britain was not a popular war, either, except where Henry Clay had influence, although it was brought about in a great measure by depredations upon our commerce and the seizure and the impressment of our seamen at sea. The fact, however, must not be forgotten that that war was so unpopular that Thomas Jefferson, a few years before the declaration of war was finally made, was compelled to ask the repeal of the embargo act, because John Adams presented him evidence which convinced him that there would be a revolution in this country if that act were not repealed. The people who were interested in that war made a fair showing, I think, at New Orleans.

But, Mr. President, the most significant statement made by the great military authority to whom the proponents of this bill always appeal, the most significant statement made by this great military authority within the pages of his book is this, to which I call your attention. Discussing our policy, he says:

> It has been truly remarked by one of our philosophers that "we follow success and not skill."

This is from Gen. Emory Upton, and is quoted from page 3, the second from the last paragraph. Yes, Mr. President, that statement is true, and has always been true. The American people do approve success rather than skill; success by skill, if possible; but if skill stands in the way of success, they certainly approve success in their wars; just as one of us, Mr. President, if he were compelled to undergo a surgical operation would prefer that it should be performed successfully rather than unsuccessfully, although skillfully. Certainly we are worshipers of success; and yet to have heard the speeches of some of our friends here in favor of this bill, one listening would have believed that originally this country was a great country of magnificent resources, of four or five times its present extent, of possibly hundreds of millions more of population and of billions and billions more of riches, and that by the volunteer system, by following the system of unpreparedness which we had followed, that we had lost our heritage until now we have clustered in the District of Columbia, defending our last stronghold, and that to do so it is necessary to impress our free-born citizens into an army. Yes; I prefer success. The fact is, Mr. President, that I much fear that some of my colleagues are inclined to vote, as many of the papers are inclined to write, for anything which comes to them under a certain brand and which is claimed to be drawn with some skill.

I do not think the volunteer system was a failure in the Civil War. At least, the country was saved, though possibly not so skillfully by Grant and by Lincoln as it might be saved now. It is unfortunate, possibly, that Lincoln died without the knowledge that he might have saved his country more skillfully. It is unfortunate, possibly, that he could not have availed himself of the great military genius of which we have so much now in Washington. It may have cost thousands of lives; but, nevertheless, we still worship success.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Relative to the subject which the Senator is now discussing, the Senator will remember that when Napoleon was accomplishing his wonderful results in Italy, and that fact was called to the attention of one of the old generals of Europe, he admitted the fact that Napoleon was accomplishing those wonderful results, but said that he was doing so in violation of every established principle of the military art.

Mr. FALL. Yes; and I recall, Mr. President, that Lincoln was so foolish that he wanted to know what brand of whisky a certain general drank, in order that he might procure some of it for others. I recall also the fact that Capt. Lee, of the British Army, now Gen. Lee, then a military attaché with our forces in Cuba, when the Rough Riders charged the veteran Spanish Army behind the breastworks at Kettle Hill, without the artillery of the United States first playing upon those breastworks, said, "Magnificent, but not military." "Successful," as Upton puts it, "but not skillful."

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume a similar criticism was made when John Stark was summoned from the sawmill, on the banks of the Merrimack River, to go and rescue the Colonial Army, when it was in such sore straits—so sore that in the minds of most people it was considered a hopeless struggle for the Colonies. Stark started out, and as he went across the fields and through the woods of New Hampshire and Vermont, on his way to Bennington, where valuable military stores had been accumulated, he encouraged the people to volunteer, and 1,200 brave men responded to the call. The Battle of Bennington was fought and won by Stark's volunteers over the seasoned troops of Great Britain. I presume that it was not military, but it was a wonderful triumph for the militia, and laid the real foundation for our independence. With that circumstance fresh in my mind, I have been surprised that Senators have said that the recruits during the War of the Revolution failed to accomplish what might reasonably have been expected of them. Why, our victory in that war and our independence were won by recruits almost entirely, as the Senator from New Mexico knows.

Mr. FALL. Undoubtedly the Senator is correct; and it has been appalling to me that Senators who I know are imbued with just as much patriotism as burns in my heart should stand here for hours denouncing the men who made the country, the men who have saved it, the men who have turned it over to us to fritter away, as we are frittering it away now.

Why, sir, I was impressed, as we all were, with the magnificent exposition from his standpoint made by the young and distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] of the provisions of this bill. I listened to him and have read his remarks with very great interest, and no stronger presentation could have been made, and, with due deference to other Senators, no stronger, in my judgment, has been made from his standpoint. I asked him one or two questions. I asked him whether we could not apply the selective system to the volunteers. "Certainly." I also asked whether with the same drill day by day the volunteer was not as good a man as the conscript. "Certainly." Then I asked, "Why not adopt both systems side by side?" He was afraid that we could not obtain officers. Can we not obtain officers for volunteers as well as we can obtain them for conscripts? The only objection of the Senator was that the selection of officers for volunteers might be influenced by politics—listen, Senators—that the selection of officers by the governors of the States might be influenced by politics. I ask you who will select the officers under the pending measure? Answer me that. Show me the examples which may come from the National Administration and then show me whether under the volunteer system anything more of a political nature can be expected.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have been very much interested in the examples of heroism related by the Senator, and it recalls to my mind a very interesting statement made to me by Gen. Gordon, of Georgia, a volunteer in the War between the States and an ornament to this body for a number of years. He said to me that his most brilliant achievement during that fateful conflict between brothers of 50 years ago was accomplished in violation of the rules laid down in military books; and he remarked, "If I had failed, I would have been court-martialed; I succeeded, and received honorable mention." I share with the Senator in his utter inability to understand and appreciate the motives behind all of this derogatory criticism of the volunteer soldier, whose record illuminates and glorifies the pages of American history.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, not only that which has just been spoken, but from the standpoint of military science the tactics of "Stonewall" Jackson have been taught to the German and English soldiers since the Civil War closed; and the great battle which ended for a time this morning in northern France was fought by the British and French on one hand and by the Germans on the other on the tactics of Grant and "Stonewall" Jackson with their volunteer armies. Trench warfare as employed to-day was pushed by Grant to the gates of Richmond, and hand-grenade warfare was used before the ramparts of Vicksburg. Hindenburg in the swamps of Russia never displayed the military initiative and science displayed by men like those to whom reference has just been made, who were fighting for what they believed to be right under the volunteer system in the United States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think the most remarkable military genius developed by the war between the States—although not so well known to the world—was Bedford Forrest, of Tennessee, who has been referred to as the "Wizard of the Saddle." Though illiterate and unlearned in books, as a military leader he stands alone in the annals of American history.

Mr. FALL. Yes; Mr. President, my own father, who fought with Bedford Forrest, wrote me when I was in the volunteer service of the United States and was being drilled five hours a day, that he did not understand that. He had fought for about four years, but he never heard but two commands, and one was "charge" and the other "run like hell." [Laughter.]

Mr. VARDAMAN. And one of his mottoes was to get there "fustest" with the "mostest" men.

Mr. FALL. Now, Mr. President, with reference to officers. If the Germans, whom we are providing to exclude from our councils by the espionage bill, have read or listened to this debate and credit many of the statements made, they may think ours the least prepared nation on the face of the globe, and the least military nation. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on yesterday stated that Gen. Miles said that there were a million men in the United States with some measure of military training. There is no question about the fact that there are large numbers of men of military training in the United States; but those men, almost to a man, would be excluded under the provisions of this bill, as the Senator from Missouri remarked.

I want to call attention with reference to the matter of the selection of officers, and so forth, to page 187 of Secretary Garrison's report for 1915. He publishes here a list which I am going to ask to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. It is the paragraph found on pages 187 and 188.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). The Chair hearing no objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

As a result of the annual inspection of the military departments of educational institutions at which officers of the Army are detailed as professors of military science and tactics, the following-named institutions, arranged alphabetically, were announced in bulletins, dated June 25, 1915, as the 13 "distinguished colleges" and the 11 "honor schools" whose students have exhibited the greatest degree of military training as compared with others of their class:

DISTINGUISHED COLLEGES.

University of California, Berkeley, Cal.
Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y.
University of Illinois, Urbana, Ill.
Kansas State Agricultural College, Manhattan, Kans.
University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, Minn.
University of Missouri, Columbia, Mo.
Norwich University, Northfield, Vt.
St. John's College, Annapolis, Md.
The Citadel, Charleston, S. C.
Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, College Station, Tex.
University of Vermont and State Agricultural College, Burlington, Vt.
Virginia Military Institute, Lexington, Va.
University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis.

HONOR SCHOOLS.

Culver Military Academy, Culver, Ind.
Kemper Military School, Boonville, Mo.
Kentucky Military Institute, Lyndon, Ky.
New Mexico Military Institute, Roswell, N. Mex.
New York Military Academy, Cornwall on the Hudson, N. Y.
St. John's Military Academy, Delafield, Wis.
St. John's School, Manlius, N. Y.
Shattuck School, Faribault, Minn.
College of St. Thomas St. Paul, Minn.
Wentworth Military Academy, Lexington, Mo.
Western Military Academy, Alton, Ill.

STUDENTS AND GRADUATES OF CIVIL INSTITUTIONS OF LEARNING AT WHICH ARMY OFFICERS ARE DETAILED AS MILITARY INSTRUCTORS.

In December, 1914, an effort was made by this office to ascertain for each of the 10 years, 1905 to 1914, inclusive, the number of students enrolled at, and the number graduated from, civil institutions of learning at which officers of the Army were detailed as military instructors. Requests for information on the subject were sent to all such institutions (108 at the time), and all but 7 of them furnished figures. The following table shows the numbers of students at, and graduates from, the 96 institutions from which data were obtained:

1907	21,616	3,073
1908	24,101	3,441
1909	25,222	3,789
1910	27,122	4,215
1911	28,843	4,701
1912	29,979	4,757
1913	31,028	5,153

During the school year ended in the spring of 1915 there were 32,313 students enrolled in the institutions of learning at which officers of the Army were detailed as instructors. The total number of graduates from those institutions during the 10 years 1905 to 1914, inclusive, is approximately 39,430.

Mr. FALL. This list contains the names of the "distinguished colleges" and "honor schools" under the rules of our War Department, in which military science is taught under the West Point system by officers detailed for that purpose by the General Staff. I will say to you now, Senators, that these names only include those classed as distinguished colleges and as honor schools.

There are 96 officers detailed in the different schools of this country, and have been for more than 10 years, teaching military science under the West Point system. The University of California, Berkeley; Cornell University, Ithaca; University of Illinois, Urbana; Kansas State Agricultural College, Manhattan; University of Minnesota, Minneapolis; University of Missouri, Columbia; Norwich University, Northfield, Vt.; St. John's College, Annapolis, Md.; The Citadel, Charleston, S. C.; Agriculture and Mechanical College, of Texas; University of Vermont and State Agricultural College, Burlington; Virginia Military Institute, Lexington, Va.; University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis.; are all in the distinguished class. Culver Military Academy, Culver, Ind.; Kemper Military School, Boonville, Mo.; Kentucky Military Institute, Lyndon, Ky.; New Mexico Military Institute, Roswell, N. Mex.; New York Military Academy, Cornwall on the Hudson; St. John's Military Academy, Delafield, Wis.; St. John's School, Manlius, N. Y.; Shattuck School, Faribault, Minn.; College of St. Thomas, St. Paul, Minn.; Wentworth Military Academy, Lexington, Mo.; Western Military Academy, Alton, Ill.; are all in the honor class. From this honor class to-day officers are serving in the United States Army, and are appointed every year.

Not only that, but let me read a little further from the Secretary. I read from the paragraph marked on pages 36 and 37:

No one can possibly have a higher or more just appreciation of the worth and value of West Point than one who, like the writer, has been brought into close contact with its present operation and its past history. It is unnecessary to dilate thereon in this place. But it must be remembered, in studying this problem in the light of facts and those imperative conclusions which facts demand, that officers of our armies and of the other armies of the world have been efficient in every respect without having received the benefits of any national academy. No other nation, in fact has any such institution as West Point. Forty-four and seventy-six one-hundredths per cent of the commissioned personnel of the United States Army to-day are graduates of West Point, and 55.24 per cent are not.

This is in the annual report for 1915 of Mr. Garrison, the Secretary of War. He goes on:

In this country and in other countries where no similar institution exists, officers are made in other ways than by preliminary instruction in such an institution. They learn practically by practice, and they learn theoretically in service schools or by service instruction carried on within the military establishment. We are singularly fortunate in this country in the fact that many of our great universities and colleges have now a course of military science coupled with practical training; that there are agricultural and mechanical colleges receiving Federal financial assistance; and numerous military schools or academies in all of which military science is taught and military training is imparted.

I want to call the attention of the Senate here, Mr. President, to the fact that in the pages which I have asked to be placed in the RECORD not only is it stated that there are 96 regular officers attached to 96 institutions throughout the United Sates, but these 96 institutions do not cover all the military schools the United States. There are hundreds of other military schools to which military officers have not been assigned.

Mr. VARDAMAN. All the military colleges have them.

Mr. FALL. There are purely State institutions, supported in part by State funds, to which officers are not assigned. Officers are assigned only under certain circumstances to such State institutions, and yet let us see what the figures show:

During the school year ended in the spring of 1915 there were 32,313 students enrolled in the institutions of learning at which officers of the Army were detailed as instructors. The total number of graduates from those institutions during the 10 years 1905 to 1914, inclusive, is approximately 39,430.

Now, right here let me say to you that there is a misunderstanding with reference to the officering of the German Army. In 1910, prior to the outbreak of this war, there were 14,000 German officers known as the reserve officers waiting to be called to the colors at any time. Those are largely the men who are leading the German army to-day, together with the others who were in the reserve corps and who had been graduated under the volunteer army officers' system in the German Empire. In Germany boys who have graduated from the high school are allowed, between the ages, I think, of 17 and 19, to volunteer. They then take one year's training. At the expiration of six months they are examined, and those who have proved themselves specially efficient are then trained for the balance of that year, for the next six months, very intensively. They pass an examination and go on the roll as officers of the German Army, and when this war broke out there were only 25,000 regular German officers to command an army of 5,000,000 men. The other officers were taken largely from this volunteer list with one year's special training, and from that list such successful officers have been produced that, it is said by Prof. Fullerton, of Columbia University, that it is the understanding—although it is too early, of course, to decide—that Germany will go entirely to the volunteer officer theory. Yet Germany is held up to us as the greatest military power on the globe, while during the last 10 years at least 80,000 bright young Americans took military courses under military officers in the military colleges to which such officers were assigned in the United States of America. Thirty-nine thousand of them were ready last year with a more intensive and a longer course than any German officer serving from the volunteer list in the German Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FALL. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it is well for the Senator—if he will permit me to comment upon this portion of his discussion—to remember that the courses given by the officers detailed by the War Department in the different colleges and educational institutions to which they are assigned are not uniform in intensity or duration. For instance, I myself visited a very large land-grant college which, under the law, is supposed to impose upon the students military training, and an officer of the Regular Army has been detailed there for many, many years. I found, upon investigation, that the military course there followed was given only to the freshmen class and was only two hours a week. All the graduates of that college must be included in the number which the Senator said were available for officers.

Mr. FALL. Precisely. There is no question about that, Mr. President. In fact, I have never insisted that the Regular Army system was the best. I have never insisted that every Regular Army man was the best instructor. I do not know of my own knowledge, except from certain personal experience which I have had. I am frank to say that one or two Regular Army officers I have known are not those whom I would choose as military instructors.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I did not mean to reflect upon the Army officer who was detailed to this institution.

Mr. FALL. Oh, no; I understand.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But I do say that the spirit of the land-grant law has not been lived up to in more than one institution.

Mr. FALL. Well, that is the fault of the Government at Washington.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very true.

Mr. FALL. That is just exactly what has been the burden of my song. It is not the volunteer; here in Washington is the trouble.

Mr. President, if I believed, as some of my friends here who voted for the declaration of war have said that they believed, that of all the great people of this country, of all the enormous population of this country, of all the military force of this country, 500,000 volunteers could not be obtained in the hour of our country's need, I would offer an apology to the people of the United States for having voted against their convictions. If there are not 500,000 men who will come to the assistance of this country if they believe that it is actually assailed, if they believe that it is their duty, if they believe that an opportunity will be offered them to do something more than take a correspondence course in warfare—if they believe that and 500,000 of them do not come, then I for one regret, and will regret to my dying day, that I voted to place the resources of this country and its people in the hands of the President of the United States in order that he might carry on a war which the people did not want.

Mr. President, we are told that the training is necessary. We have published to us in the headlines of every paper, practically every day, some assertion made by some expert, or some statement thrown off by some visitor from England or from France. In the headlines, as I say, you will find it stated that it will require two years to drill men before they can go upon the firing line. That is said with reference to the offer of a gallant American citizen to take the flag of the United States over to France to give her that assistance which she gave to us. I find that statement in the headlines over such a quotation from Gen. Bridges, of the Canadian Army. Farther in the column, as published in the Evening Star of Tuesday, April 4, 1917, the general says that 2 years of war service is equal to 10 years of training in peace, and he further says that within 11 weeks after training they put the recruits in the firing trenches; not that they organize a division entirely of recruits and put them in as a separate division, but that Great Britain is putting recruits into the firing trenches within 11 weeks after they have rendezvoused.

Now, Mr. President, I want to see the unit system preserved. I, for one, want to see Indiana soldiers in Indiana regiments of volunteers, and at the same time I want to see the President empowered to take a recreant Indianian or any other recreant American who is needed and place him in the ranks to serve his country. I have some measure of State pride. I yet have some belief in the fact that this is a Government of 48 great States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Sovereign States.

Mr. FALL. Sovereign so long as their sovereign representatives correctly represent them, and no longer sovereign when their representatives are recreant to their duty.

Mr. VARDAMAN. On that proposition the Senator can take judgment by default. I file no plea.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I say that the suggestion which I have just offered is the one adopted by the greatest military country in the world. A great many have misunderstood things, I think, and misrepresented things, about the German military system. Did you notice that in the papers the day before yesterday it was reported that an entire brigade or regiment of Pomeranians had been annihilated? Did you notice that an entire regiment of Bavarians had been captured? The unit system is preserved in the German Army, and a Prussian is not placed in a Bavarian nor a Wurttemberg regiment. The Saxon serves in a Saxon regiment, the Pomeranian in a Pomeranian regiment, company, or division; and with all their ingenuity and skill they have adopted the unit system, which you are now being called upon, for the first time in your history, to do away with in an emergency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Will the Senator from New Mexico permit the Chair to ask if, in his investigation of that matter, he discovered whether they are officered also?

Mr. FALL. They are officered, also, by men elected. The volunteer officers in the Germany Army are elected by the volunteer corps to which they belong. The Pomeranians elect a Pomeranian, the Bavarians a Bavarian, and the Prussians a Prussian, as I understand. Of course, the Kaiser might finally disarrange their program, and I am providing in the amendment which I offer here, or which I shall offer, that the President of the United States, if he discovers that the officers of one of the State units is not a competent man, shall have the right to discharge him and replace him, just as he has under the provisions of the draft in this bill.

Mr. President, there is one phase of the volunteer system which has been referred to here in this discussion and which I propose to comment upon for a few moments in closing my remarks.

Together with the condemnation of the volunteers in the other wars, we have heard condemnation of the volunteers in the Mexican Army. We have heard dire tales here of disaster, or but slightly averted disaster, because of the volunteer system during the Mexican War.

Mr. President, about the middle of April, 1846, the Congress of the United States authorized the President of the United States to call for 50,000 volunteers for the Mexican War, and by the proclamation of the 13th day of May, of President Polk, the States of Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Tennessee, Kentucky, Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi were those which were called upon for volunteers. Later other States were called upon to furnish volunteers to accompany Scott's army to Vera Cruz. In all, 200,000 volunteers offered, 17,000 were accepted. The proclamation issued by the President under this act was issued on May 13. By June 5 the State of Missouri, for instance, had furnished every man of her quota. The quota of practically every State called upon was on its way by June 5, or June 23, at the outside, to the border to join Taylor, Wool, or Kearny.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator how long they were in preparation?

Mr. FALL. From June 5, at their rendevous points, to June 23 they were given preparation, ready to go, filled up after the call came on the 13th of May. Within the 11 weeks' time specified by Bridges the Missouri Volunteers were fighting battles and winning every battle they fought.

Mr. President, the first great battle of the war was the Battle of Monterey. Taylor had, under the authority of the President, called on Louisiana and one or two other States for six-month troops. The six-month troops had just reached him after the declaration of war in April. They were called for, and they reached him a short time before. When he understood that the 12-month volunteers and the volunteers for the war were on the way he discharged or sent back to Louisiana and other States the troops of six months' service, and the consequence is that they were not in the war. At the Battle of Monterey Zachary Taylor attacked Ampudia with 10,000 veteran soldiers behind seven forts, each created under the French military system by officers, some educated in France, each defended by more powerful guns than Zachary Taylor had in his army. The town of Monterey itself was a town of stone houses, and Taylor had but little artillery which would batter down one of those houses after repeated shots. He had with him a total of 6,000 men, including the Fourth and a part of the Fifth Infantry of the Regular Army. The balance of his 6,000 men had never been under fire in their lives. During the battle, when Twiggs's division was ordered by Taylor to make the attack on the central fort or fortification of the defense, he was unexpectedly confronted with a battery placed at a bridge in the street, while three forts were opening upon him, one from in front, the others from each flank. Seeing that, Taylor ordered three regiments to go to Twiggs's assistance, and of those the names of the First Tennessee and Jeff Davis's Mississippians, all of them, ought to be immortal. There were 450 men of the Regular Army of the United States, 379 Tennesseans under Haskell, and 354 Mississippians, if I remember correctly, under Jeff Davis, and it was not the volunteers who broke under the withering fire. But it was Alec McClung, of Mississippi, who was the first man over the walls of the No. 1 fort, and it was the Tennesseans and the Mississippians who took it and who turned its guns upon the enemy, and who held it in the face of the fire of artillery such as we were not confronted with in the Mexican War again, unless at Cerro Gordo. It was those "untrained" volunteers who had never been in a fight. They did not break.

At the Battle of Buena Vista a short time later—and in referring to that I want to call your attention to where the trouble was in the Mexican War. There were two parties in the United States at the outbreak of this war. There was opposition to it. The leader of one party was Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri. The leader of the other—not in opposition to the war, but in reference to the conduct of the war—was John C. Calhoun. The whole trouble in connection with the prosecution of the Mexican War, the cause of the delay which resulted in the muster out of the volunteer troops at Churubusco after having completed 12 months' service, was the policy announced here by John C. Calhoun to be the policy of "masterful inactivity"—that is, the seizing and holding of the northern portion of Mexico from Matamoros to Mazatlan—that there we should plant ourselves, that no further should we go, and we should there wait any attack if the enemy chose to attack us; not go beyond the line which six years later was admitted by Mr. Calhoun to have been intended to be the line of the States which should be annexed to the United States.

At the Battle of Buena Vista Taylor did not even have the forces who had fought with him and captured Monterey, except that he had a portion of the Fourth Infantry, and he yet had Jeff Davis's Mississippi Riflemen, the only volunteers at that time who had ever been under fire, because under this policy, inaugurated and carried on here in Washington, Scott was placed in chief command and Taylor ordered to send his veteran regiments by way of Tampico to join Scott in Vera Cruz and to march to the City of Mexico. In the same dispatches came other orders to evacuate Saltillo and return to Monterey. The dispatches were sent by the hand of two officers separately. The first reached Taylor. The second was captured by Santa Ana. Santa Ana was a soldier. He had 32,000 veteran men in his army thoroughly equipped according to the last word in "military units."

Santa Ana, discovering that all his best men were being taken from Taylor and sent to Tampico, gathered 20,000 of the best veteran Mexican soldiers and advanced upon Saltillo. Taylor, as was always his custom, accepted the challenge and led against him 4,462 men, despised volunteers from the different States of the Union with Jeff Davis, the Mississippian, the only veteran among them. Taylor was attacked on front and on flank and in the rear. Those volunteers stood and hurled back Santa Ana and won the Mexican War on the battle field of Buena Vista. Never again was it possible for the Mexicans to gather a veteran army such as confronted Taylor's volunteers at Buena Vista. These are the men whom Upton speaks of when he says that no better soldiers could be gathered together than the American volunteers in the Mexican War.

Why, sir, see what was done by the American Volunteer! Let me speak now for a moment of the Army of the Northwest. Under the plans adopted here Taylor was to lead the Army of Occupation of the South and Gen. Wool, with 3,500 men, was to advance from San Antonio upon Chihuahua, the Army of the Center. Kearny, with the Missouri Volunteers and his own regiment of Regulars, was to advance to New Mexico and to what we now know as Arizona and proceed to California. Taylor did his work as far as Monterey and then, when superseded and his soldiers taken away from him, won the Mexican War at Buena Vista.

Advancing from San Antonio, Gen. Wool, a Regular Army officer, with 3,500 men, lost himself in Mexico and never reached nearer than 600 miles of the city of Chihuahua, which he was commanded to take. Brave, of course; but no farther did he penetrate. He reported to Taylor that the mountain range between Parras and Chihuahua was impassable, and he asked permission of Taylor to join him in Saltillo, which he did, possibly very fortunately, because Wool's command, or some of his men, were in the battle of Buena Vista.

In the meantime Kearny proceeded to New Mexico, not with Sterling Price's command—they followed him—but with his own regiment, a regiment of Missouri farm boys, doctors, lawyers, and other men who are not considered now the proper men to send to the firing line. Under the leadership of Doniphan, a Missouri lawyer, invited to volunteer for the service on the 13th day of May so that they could recruit, everyone was on the ground by the 5th day of June at the place designated by the governor of Missouri. By the 23d the last of them were en route for New Mexico under directions to go to California. They took New Mexico, and Kearny, expecting Sterling Price to reach him with his regiment in a few days, yielded to the request of Doniphan that he might be allowed to leave the Army of the West and proceed with his men and join the Army of the Center at Chihuahua. Kearny notified Marcey, the Secretary of War, that he had yielded to this request and that when Sterling Price reached him he would then allow Doniphan to join Wool.

To make a long story short, Doniphan proceeded through New Mexico. Within 21 miles of El Paso, his force being divided between the mounted men and the Infantry, the Artillery being behind with the Infantry, he was attacked, 450 strong, by Mexicans under Ponce de Leon with 700 regular Mexicans, regular soldiers, artillery and 700 State troops. Within less than 15 minutes these recruits, volunteers, had killed and wounded 150 Mexicans, captured their artillery, and driven them into El Paso without the loss of a man of Doniphan's command. They waited at El Paso and sent couriers out to endeavor to ascertain where Gen. Wool was. They had just marched over 250 miles of almost trackless, waterless desert. They left El Paso and proceeded practically over the route recently covered by Pershing's expedition into Mexico, 225 miles, to the city of Chihuahua. At what is known as the Battle of the Sacramento, 17 miles from the city of Chihuahua, they were confronted by 5,000 Mexicans, 2,700 of whom were regular, 32 pieces of artillery, and the balance of the soldiers were old State troops. The hills were covered with the population of the city of Chihuahua, a city then of about 18,000 inhabitants, coming out to witness not the fight but the capture, because they brought with them chains and irons forged with which to carry back these "Yankees," as they called the Missourians. Doniphan attacked that fortified place with those raw Missourians. His teamsters parked their wagons, took their mules out of the harness, and rode them bareback over the breastworks, and ran every Mexican soldier out of the State of Chihuahua and lost one man killed!

Why, Mr. President, Capt. Stevenson, commanding dismounted men, charged in double time, kept up with the Cavalry in charging the breastworks, and when he reached the parapet sprang in front of his company and dressed his line as if in drill, and everyone mounted the breastwork without one man out of line and with all the artillery and a thousand Mexican rifles firing upon him. This is what volunteers can do!

These 900 men captured the city and State of Chihuahua, and later marched across the country 600 miles and found Wool!

Now, Mr. President, I shall not take more time of the Members. I desire to see adopted a separate provision in this bill by which the President of the United States shall be authorized and the Secretary of War directed—if this is a war measure—to raise 500,000 volunteers immediately, and with all other provisions of the bill exactly as they stand I hope I may have an opportunity to vote for it.

Mr. President, the volunteer of the United States is the man who has made this country great. When I heard the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], of my own native State, speak against the volunteer system and in favor of draft system alone, I remembered that in the historical cemetery at Frankfort there is a tall, slender column, and engraved on the pedestal are the names of McKee, and Henry Clay, jr., son of the great commoner, and of many other sons of that State who lost their lives for their country believing at least that they were as good soldiers as any conscript ever dared to be. Then I remembered that this monument was erected to the Kentucky dead in 1847, as their bodies were being brought back just as the Mexican War closed, and that an "epitaph," I may say, was written for them by another gallant Kentuckian who had been with them and who afterwards as a volunteer served on the staff of Albert Sidney Johnson.

Theodore O'Hara, on the occasion of the raising of that monument, wrote that poem, the epitaph of the American volunteer:

On fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on yesterday I called the attention of the Senate to a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury with regard to the amendment to the Federal reserve act as a very important matter. I am not going to attempt to take the floor; I merely wish to make a request. It is a very important part of our preparation for war to strengthen the banking system of the country. I wanted to ask unanimous consent that on Monday morning we take the matter up for disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senate prefer the request to the Senate at this time?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators, you have heard the request of the Senator from Oklahoma, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. WATSON. Has the matter been referred to the committee?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; it was referred to the committee, was passed on by the committee, and was submitted to the Senate some time ago. Senators who are interested in the matter will find in the report printed in italics the indication of the changes proposed to be made with the parts stricken out. So it is perfectly clear what the meaning is. There is an extended note on each proposed amendment.

Mr. BRADY. I could not consent to anything which would in any way interfere with the progress of the debate on the pending measure.

Mr. OWEN. No; this measure will be disposed of; and I ask that this be taken up for disposition on Monday.

Mr. LODGE. Is this a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. OWEN. I am asking unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. Then we must have a quorum, under the rule.

Mr. OWEN. I believe that is the rule. Then, I will not ask it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma recall his request?

Mr. OWEN. I withdraw my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question before the Senate is the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KELLOGG entered the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] having entered the Chamber, the Chair will not submit the question.

Mr. LODGE. What is the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 13 add a new section after section 11.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I rise to a question of order. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs on page 13 of the bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask the chairman of the committee if he is disposed to take up the bill and vote on amendments now?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think I can clarify the situation in just a moment. None of the amendments have been taken up to be voted on as yet, but we are waiting until the Senators who desire to speak on the subject have finished. I understand the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has been recognized by the Chair, and he wants to proceed. I therefore prefer not to take up the amendments until after the Senator has finished.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I had not at this time intended to address the Senate upon this bill, but at some time before the close of the debate to say a few words outlining my views and giving the reasons which impel me to support its main features. But as the chairman of the committee has suggested that I proceed at this time I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments while I discuss what I believe to be the important features of the measure.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to make any extended remarks upon this question, though I realize the surpassing importance of the issue and that we are now turning away from the traditional policy of this Nation. I am ready to do it, because I believe the time has come when the safety of the Nation and the great issue that is now pending before the civilized world demands it.

It has been said that this bill does not provide for universal military training or universal military service, and that therefore it is sailing under false colors. I admit that that is technically true. The bill does not provide for universal military training, although I believe it does provide one step which is a necessary feature of every such system in this country.

I believe in universal military training. I do not believe in the exclusive voluntary system of service, but in the selective compulsory system where there is an obligation upon all the youths of the land. I believe that every citizen owes the duty to be prepared, to make the sacrifices, to defend his country, his country's institutions, and his country's homes, whenever the Nation calls upon him. I believe that is the duty every man owes and that the country should not be left for defense merely to those who are willing and patriotic enough in its hour of peril to step forward and defend it.

Permit me for just a moment to say something about universal military training. I regret that this bill does not contain a clause for such a system. I believe that, while we are confronted with the shadows of the great European war, we should in this crisis make preparation by legislation so that every young man in the Nation may receive the rudiments of a military education or training. I believe he would thereby become better qualified physically, mentally, and morally, and that it would engender in him a patriotism and a love of country that would make him a better citizen and better qualify him for the competitive struggle of civil life.

Furthermore, in a country like ours we do not wish a great standing army. It is against the traditional policy of our country and of the Anglo-Saxon race. All the army we need in this country is a force of three, four, or five hundred thousand men, who would be necessary to repel invasion, protect our frontiers, and be the nucleus of a great army if the time should ever come when we should be subject to invasion by any foreign country. The people of this country, for many reasons, would never permit a great professional standing army. One reason is its militaristic aspect, another is that it is unnecessary. Unless, however, we are going to have such an army, it is necessary that the young men of the country should receive the training that fits them to go to arms when the Nation calls them.

It has been said, I think, by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] that such a system encourages militarism. I deny it absolutely. Did that sort of training encourage militarism in Switzerland, where every man is subject to such training and where the nation has never had a war since the Napoleonic wars swept Europe with their consuming flame? Has it inspired militarism in France, which country fought against going into this war with all the intensity of that spirited people? Did it inspire militarism in Holland, or has it inspired militarism in any other democracy? Was militarism inspired in this country by the Revolutionary War, by the War of 1812, by the great struggle of 1861, or by the war of 1898? Yet in the war of 1861 we had an army which was the greatest the world had ever seen, except the armies of Imperial Rome, which overran Western Europe. At the close of that great war the citizen soldiery dispersed and in a day the great armies which had rallied on each side to carry on the conflict returned to their homes, engaged in the occupations of life and in the affairs of the country, and were better qualified as citizens by reason of the baptism of fire.

Not only that, but militarism in this country will never be inspired by teaching the citizen soldier how to defend his country and then allowing him, still in his youth, to go back to his neighbors and his friends to engage in the occupations of life. It will rather inspire him with the patriotism of peace. It will inspire him with the desire that his country be left to enjoy the fruits of peace and work out its own great destiny.

Another objection is made to universal military training and to compulsory service or universal service in the Army. The pacifist orators who are opposed to military training or to universal service oppose it upon the assumption that some day we are going to reach the era of universal peace. Do not let us delude ourselves with the idea that the millennium has arrived or that universal peace has come to the world. Segur, the great French historian and military writer of the Napoleonic period, once said, and said wisely, that "universal peace is the dream of the wise; war is the history of mankind."

Only two years and a half ago, Mr. President, all the world was at peace. The people of the belligerent nations were a highly civilized and christian people of the same blood and of the same races who go to make up this great Nation. They were far advanced in the arts of civilization—I might say in the arts of peace. There was no widespread poverty, no unusual oppression of government, no general spirit of discontent; yet in an hour, as measured by the life of nations, there burst upon the world a war, the horrors of which surpass the ages of barbarism, and the appalling loss and waste of life staggers humanity. Yet, with this history, and the fact that the pathway of progress of civilization is strewn with the wrecks of empires from great wars, we have been living in a fool's paradise, deluded by the dream of the peace of isolation.

I say that this country should have made preparation years ago, to be able to meet just such an emergency in the world's history as this one. However, we have not done it, and we are now confronted with the necessity for doing it; and how shall we best accomplish this object?

Coming now to the question of selective compulsory military service, I believe that the only possible system for the defense of a country is universal military training and universal obligation for service, under which every young man within the proper age, and with the proper qualifications, shall be enrolled in the Government service to be called for by some other system than by the volunteer system. If we had had universal military training, the question now confronting us, as I have previously said, would not have arisen, and if this bill had contained a clause providing for the inauguration of a system of universal military training much of the opposition to it, I believe, would have been removed.

I am, however, opposed to the volunteer system for many reasons. First, I do not consider it democratic. I do not consider it democratic to leave the defense of the country alone to the man who has patriotism enough and who is willing to make the sacrifice. I believe that the highest obligation the Government imposes upon a citizen is to be prepared and ready at any time to defend the country. I do not believe that burden should be left to those who are willing to assume it any more than we should leave to those who are willing to assume it the entire burden of paying the taxes to defend the country in its hour of peril.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KELLOGG. With pleasure.

Mr. McKELLAR. Having those beliefs, does not the Senator think it would be better to put the burden upon all men of military age rather than upon the boys between 19 and 25?

Mr. KELLOGG. That may be; I am not fully prepared to say. I am inclined to think that it ought not to be put on the boys under 20 years of age, and possibly under 21.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator believes in universal military training and service, does he not think that it ought to be universal, or certainly universal to the extent of those of military age—say, from 20 or 21 to 45—as is ordinarily the case in the various countries? Would not that be a more just distribution of the burden, rather than to place the whole burden of the war on a lot of boys between 19 and 25?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I do not think so. I was astounded the other day with the figures given by my colleague [Mr. NELSON], who was a soldier in the ranks for four years during the War of the Rebellion. As I recall those figures, only 62,000 of the soldiers were 25 years or over.

I believe that the young men from 20 to 25 years of age are better qualified to stand the strain of such a contest than those beyond that age, and that after they have married and settled down and have engaged in the occupations of life, which are as important, perhaps, to the life of the Nation as military service, it is not wise to include them within the draft. I must be governed in that respect very much by the opinions of the men who have made military subjects a study. I do not pretend to have done so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a further question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield again to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says he was struck, as I think we all were, by the figures read into the RECORD by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] showing the ages of the boys who served as soldiers in the Civil War. Then the Senator speaks of the splendid organization of the Army at that time. The Senator recalls that out of the 2,700,000 in the Civil War on the Union side all of them except 47,000 were volunteers. Does not the Senator think that the figures submitted concerning the conscripts in that war, to wit, that of the 776,000 conscripts enrolled under the enrollment or conscription act of 1863, the Government got only 47,000 actual soldiers out of that great number, show that the conscript plan is not the best possible plan?

Mr. KELLOGG. Now, if the Senator will allow me, his question involves two propositions: First, that the best material in the Union Army, the best soldiers, as I understand, were the volunteers; and, second, that out of about 700,000 conscripts during the War of the Rebellion only 46,000 were finally enrolled as soldiers. I will, with the permission of the Senator, answer, so far as I can, the last question first. I am not familiar with the figures nor have I made a study of the reasons for the small number of conscripts who toward the close of the war were selected from the large number who had been enrolled. I am informed, however, that over 113,000 men were never found at all; that is, that number enrolled to be conscripted did not appear when called. Is it not quite possible that many of those in the local communities, knowing that they were liable to be conscripted, volunteered? I am informed that such is the case.

Is it not also quite possible that at the time the draft came the best and bravest men of the Nation had already enrolled themselves in defense of the country, and that the percentage acquired by conscription was therefore less than otherwise might have been expected?

But, Mr. President, I do not consider it conscription when every young man in the Nation is enrolled on what I call a "roll of honor," to be summoned at any time for the defense of his country. I call that a "roll of honor" rather than a roll of conscription.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection, may I suggest to the Senator that one of the reasons for the failure of a large number of the conscripts to serve as soldiers in the Army was that many of them purchased substitutes, and those substitutes went into the Army intead of the men conscripted. That accounts for a great number of the conscripted men who never served in the Army itself.

Mr. KELLOGG. I thank the Senator for the interruption. I have no doubt it is true; but, as I said before, when a list of eligible young men between certain ages—whatever ages the Congress in its wisdom may select—is made up as a roll of men to be called for to defend the country, or when by universal military training those young men have consecrated themselves to the defense of the Nation, we avoid the hateful word "conscription." They are called to the flag to defend their country, and they are not conscripts—a word which, owing to its history, I admit is odious to the American people.

Furthermore, I do not deem it necessary, nor could I say anything against the magnificent accomplishments of the volunteer soldier in this country or in any other. To maintain the position which I am going to take after many hours of thoughtful consideration I do not find it necessary to say aught but in the greatest praise of the honor, the patriotism, the effectiveness, and the splendid spirit of the volunteer as he has shown it on many a field of battle in the wars of this country. Were I an orator—as I am not—I should delight to add, to indulge in encomiums on the splendid volunteer heroes who have been enrolled in honor and have been in many battle fields from Runnymede to Appomattox; and I do not think any eulogy could be too great for the men who fought to make this democracy possible.

But, Mr. President, I believe that the men to-day who are familiar with the subject—the statesmen of Great Britain, of Canada, and of France, and of the other allied nations—have come to the conclusion that in this great war there are reasons which prove the voluntary system inadequate. I shall not stop to discuss many of these reasons. I do know, however, that in Great Britain, magnificent as was the feat of enrolling nearly 5,000,000 men by the voluntary system, as has been said by Senators upon this floor, it really was not voluntary at all. Remember that Great Britain was confronted across the channel by the greatest military force of all time. Remember that Great Britain was fighting for the maintenance and continuance of the British Empire. Remember that every British citizen was being put to the supreme test of patriotism. War was at the door of Great Britain. We do not realize that war is at our door, though I verily believe that we must fight the German Empire now or later, and that we had better do it now.

Furthermore, there is no doubt, however splendid the results may have been in Canada and in Great Britain, that the statesmen of those countries to-day—and I have it upon the highest authority—believe that the voluntary system nearly cost the British Empire its life and nearly ruined its industries.

Mr. President, there is one phase of this question which has given me very much thought and much anxiety. It is as necessary for us to maintain the industries of this country, including agriculture, which are essential to the prosecution of this war, as it is necessary for us to send an army to France. What France and Great Britain need to-day above all else is food and iron and steel products to maintain their munition factories. And unless they get them and get them quickly the great allied forces fighting the powers of the central empires must be defeated and the ideals of democracy which those countries hold in common with us must perish.

Mr. President, much as I hope it will not be so, I fear that we in this country, on account of the demands of France and England and perhaps other allied nations, are going to be unable to produce the food products necessary to maintain those countries in this great struggle. With a shortage of crops in this country last year, with a threatened shortage of 50,000,000 bushels in the spring wheat crop, with a loss of almost the entire crop of Argentina, unequaled in 20 years of its history, with Russia bottled up and none of her products reaching the allies, it develops upon this country and Canada to produce the foodstuffs necessary to maintain us in that struggle and to maintain the allies. We can not afford to take from the farms of this country the labor which is necessary to cultivate those farms and harvest the crops, if God in His justness gives them to us to harvest.

It has been stated upon this floor that the rural districts of the Nation furnish more volunteers than the cities. That is always true, for the real, great virile heart of patriotism is near the soil in every land, and to-day the thing that makes France able to withstand this conflict is that the French people are a great agricultural people, owning and living upon the soil they cultivate. The roots of that civilization, like the roots of our civilization, spring from the soil, and I say that we can not afford to raise a great volunteer army principally taken from the farms of this country, for if we do we shall face a food shortage in the world which will be more disastrous to the armies of the allied nations than defeat upon the field of battle.

I believe that a system of compulsory service similar to that contemplated by this bill enables the Government to draft for military service and partial military service the men of the land best fitted therefor, and to exclude and permit or direct to go back to the factories and to the farms of this country such men as are best suited and fitted to maintain the industrial life of the Nation. I know that under one section of this bill it is provided that these men may be drafted for partial military service or may be excused, and that means the Government has the necessary control over them. It may send them back to the factories or to the farms, in order to preserve the industries of the country which are as vital to our success as are marching armies. That is one reason why I favor this bill.

But another reason, which I have partially stated before, is that I believe it is more democratic to call upon the rich man's son and the poor man's son, the son of the man of influence and the son of the man of humble station, to serve together in the Army, in the training camps, and upon the field of battle. Nothing in the world disseminates a democratic spirit more than this, and I know of no reason why they should not serve together, side by side, under the same flag and the same conditions; especially would it be true when men are called from all walks of life, trained in the same school, and upon the same fields.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KELLOGG. With pleasure.

Mr. HARDWICK. Would not the same thing happen, and is it not exactly what has happened under the volunteer system?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think it would happen under the volunteer system.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, it has happened every time in that way, has it not?

Mr. KELLOGG. Undoubtedly it has, to a very great extent.

Now, one other reason. We are not faced by any imaginary dangers. We are engaged, Mr. President, as I believe, in the greatest struggle the world has ever seen. I stated the other day, and I shall not stop to reiterate, that I do not believe this war is going to terminate by mere declaration or by an effusion of patriotism. I believe that we are yet confronted by the greatest militarv power in the world's history, still intact, still powerful, still concentrated, and that it may yet require many, many months and possibly years before the war is brought to a successful close. I believe that our plans should be laid now not only with this volunteer system of filling up the Army and the militia in view, but that they should be laid now looking ahead with a certainty that we are going to get 500,000 or 1,000,000 men, whether they enlist or whether they do not, and that there should be no doubt whatever upon that subject.

Mr. President, I have taken more time than I intended, but, like many men, I become infatuated with the sound of my own voice and continue longer than I expected. There is one other suggestion I have to make, and it is this:

The only question I entertain with respect to this bill is whether, outside of the system of selective draft to obtain a force of 1,000,000 men, we can not raise in this Nation from those not subject to the draft a trained and properly equipped army—a small army, I will admit, perhaps from 25,000 to 100,000 men—in a shorter time, so that they might be put upon the soil of France at the earliest possible moment. I shall vote for this bill. I shall vote for universal military training, if I have a chance, and I shall vote for the selective compulsory military service.

But, Mr. President, I shall also vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, which does permit a limited number of divisions to be raised by the volunteer system; and I will state my reasons therefor, although in doing so I do not wish it to be understood that I am not absolutely in harmony with the principles of universal military training and compulsory service, if you may call it that, rather than to leave the country's defense to those who are willing and patriotic enough to serve.

I believe that in France to-day a great crisis is at hand. The other day the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] said in substance, as I recollect, that there are occasions when he believes in compulsory service, but that the time had not yet arrived. I believe the crisis has arrived. I do not believe as I have heard it said that the Constitution is suspended during the war. I believe rather that the Constitution and constitutional government to-day are on trial. I believe that France and England have been straining every nerve, raising every dollar, using and mobilizing all of their vast resources to meet the great struggle with which they are confronted. I do not know how long they can maintain their present position without assistance. I was in France when the war broke out and saw the effect upon the French people and upon the army by that expeditionary force from England of a little over 100,000 men which was sent to France, which confronted the great onrush of the German hosts through Belgium, which inch by inch, and mile by mile, with a stubbornness, with a determination, and with a bravery and a coolness unequaled on any battle field of the world, retreated before that army until the men of France, with the men of England, standing side by side, rolled back the invading hosts. I know the inspiring influence, I know the eager questions of the French people and the enthusiasm which was brought to that nation and the encouragement by that little heroic band of the English Army which helped to save the day for France and perhaps save republican government in the world.

If it is necessary, and I believe it is, I wish to see as soon as it can possibly be accomplished a like force sent to France to encourage them and to stand side by side with them in this great conflict. I do not rely upon my judgment alone when I make that statement. I read the statements the other day of English and French statesmen and soldiers pointing out the great importance of our sending a little army into France at the earliest possible date. Let me read what Winston Churchill said:

> It seems to me certain that the presence of even a single American division on the battle fields of France or Flanders this year would exercise influence and afford encouragement out of all proportion to the actual number of men employed.
> Now, when the terrible weight and burden of this struggle has pressed for nearly three years upon the French, British, and Belgian troops, the arrival of the American flag and the American uniform on the actual line of battle would be the veritable signal of approaching deliverance and of victory and would kindle joy and enthusiasm in every heart.

I happen to have the honor of a personal acquaintance with Winston Churchill. He has for nearly two years been in the trenches and he knows what he is talking about. But that is not all. A French statesman recently said:

> The moral factor involved would be more important than the military aid. This war is a struggle of liberal, progressive nations to overthrow a reactionary governmental system. It is of the highest moral importance that the United States, the most progressive power in the world, should be represented in this new army of crusaders.

Again Lord Northcliffe said:

> The appearance in Europe of even one American division would be a sign and portent of America's devotion to the cause of freedom. France and the world will never forget the day when a division flying the Stars and Stripes shall make its way to the fighting line at Verdun or on the Meuse.

Statesmen like Viscount Bryce and others use language to the same effect. I will not take the time of the Senate to quote them.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that we should send an undisciplined mob to France, but I do believe it to be feasible to permit the most distinguished citizen of this Nation, Col. Roosevelt, to raise from those not included within this draft from one to four divisions composed of the patriotic citizens of this country who are now willing and ready to go to France. I say let them go, and support and encourage them with all the influence and power of this Government. That is why I am willing to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING].

But, Mr. President, in the main I shall support the principles of this bill. I have not arrived at this conclusion lightly, because I realize the splendid spirit of the American people. I would not wish to believe—and I do not believe—that in this hour of the supreme test of our patriotism the American people would be found wanting in spirit, or seen to shirk from the self-sacrifice entailed by enlisting, but I do believe, Mr. President, after careful and sincere consideration that the principles of military training and of selective compulsory service are principles which are democratic and which will in the future prepare this country to meet any exigency that may arise.

Mr. President, we have in the past been willing to shed our blood, to make sacrifices for our ideals of Government, and the protection of our citizens. Let us without bitterness, but with a high resolve, engage in this war with the firm determination that the principles of democracy, of advanced civilization, and the wise rule of international law shall prevail, so that the earth shall not be a military camp, but nations governed by laws and inspired by the highest ideals.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, in a situation like the one that confronts us to-day it is well for the country to pause, to deliberate, to be careful, prepared as we ought to be, and as we are to make good our declaration of war against Germany by every just and adequate method and in every reasonable way within the scope of our power. At the same time there is no lack of patriotism involved in stopping to inquire whether or not we must necessarily adopt a system that is completely subversive of every American principle, dangerous to the liberty of this country, and absolutely unnecessary, for the present at least.

There is a good deal of confusion, Mr. President, not only in this Chamber but throughout this Republic about the present situation in which the country finds itself. We are at war with Germany, although there is hardly a physical manifestation of that fact which has yet been made to the people of this country. We are at war with Germany, but why? To establish a world league to maintain peace by force among the nations of the earth? No. To change the form of government in Germany, in Austria-Hungary, in Turkey, or in Bulgaria? No. To battle for some vague, undefined, indefinite something called "the democracy of the world"? No. We are at war with Germany at this moment simply and solely because the German Government insisted upon murdering American citizens upon the high seas when they were engaged in their peaceful and legitimate business.

If the contention voiced by certain Senators and by certain Members of another body in this building, and by others in high place, is sound, then for three years we have all been slackers; we have all been laggards. Then, for three years we have all left the British and the French and other European, Asiatic, and even African nations to fight our own battles. I deny it. I dispute it. I repel the insinuation with the scorn and contempt that it deserves. No high-flown phrase from any high place in this country or elsewhere will ever lead me to believe that the American people are going to be humbugged into the idea that they are fighting a great war to liberate all these peoples, as a part of some new-fangled political dispensation.

No, sir; we are fighting this war simply and solely because a Government with which we were at peace denied us our rights on the high seas, and through its established agencies of government and warfare murdered peaceful American citizens. As far as I am concerned, when we avenge that wrong, when we establish American rights, when we teach all the nations of the earth that no nation can lay its hand in that sort of a way on American citizens, then I am willing to conclude peace with Germany and her allies.

Ah, sir, we fought England in 1812 when we were a weak and puny Nation for just such reasons as that, because England denied to us our rights on the high seas and claimed the right to impress our seamen into her service. Yet, when we fought England in 1812, we did not join hands with Napoleon and say to him, "We will never make peace with England until England is humbled in the dust at your feet." We fought for American rights, for American principles, for American lives that had been taken and for American citizens that had been wronged. So we fight to-day, unless I mistake the temper and purpose of the American people.

Is there any Senator in this Chamber; is there any Senator whose name is on the roll of the membership of this body who believes for one moment we would have gone in this struggle if Germany had not fired upon our flag and murdered our people?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator does not understand that I made any such statement?

Mr. HARDWICK. I was not particularly directing my remarks to the Senator, and unless he entertains such sentiments he need not think so. I know the Senator does not take that position, and I do not believe there is a Senator on either side of this floor who thinks that when Belgium's neutrality was violated we were obligated to have anything to do with it, or that for any such reason we ought to have gotten into this war.

Now, it is just as well to get back to first principles every once in a while. I am willing to have the aid of these allies and I am willing to give them aid, because it is to our interest to do so. I think we ought to have passed the bill lending them money. In fact, I am willing to go further on this subject than most people would go. I would be glad to send at once a division of American Regulars to fight on French soil. I think it ought to be done at once for the moral effect it would have over there.

But, Senators, I do not want to be misunderstood. I do not believe that because of that feeling, because of that desire we commit ourselves to these European quarrels. In other words, I am willing to feed American boys, Georgia boys, to German cannon for American lives and American honor, but not for European squabbles, not to decide who shall have Alsace or Lorraine or Bosnia or Herzegovina, or some other outlandish country over there, but the last drop of blood that flows in my body I am willing to shed for American rights and for American honor.

I do not object; in fact, I welcome the visit of the commissioners here from these allied countries. Every drop of blood in my veins on both sides is English, old English and pure English, and naturally even when we were neutral my heart went out in great and silent sympathy to my kinsmen across the seas. France I love. Every American acquainted with the history of this country must, yet we can not but realize that we are going to give these allies fully as much, yea more in tenfold measure, than they can possibly give us. We are going to give them freely of our treasure, of our foodstuffs, of our munitions, of money, so that they may maintain this struggle against a common foe, but I am by no means willing that we should enter into any agreements with them to make their several quarrels ours.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. I suppose under those circumstances the Senator is very much gratified by the interview with Mr. Balfour, as given in the Post of yesterday morning.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; and I want to say in this presence and to this body I think the fact that Mr. Balfour had the good sense to make that statement at the very outset of his mission shows that he is splendidly qualified for the task for which he was chosen and for the mission which he is to perform. I only hope that in our enthusiastic hospitality we will display just as much good sense as Mr. Balfour has already shown in this matter.

Now, this country has not decided, but you would think so from some of the newspaper statements that have been written about the subject, that we are going into a hard and fast agreement with England, France, and Italy, with the allied powers, to prosecute this war as long as they want to prosecute it; never to end it, no matter how thoroughly American rights and American honor are vindicated, without the consent of the allies. No, we have adopted no such policy. To adopt it would be to reverse the traditional American policy from Washington's day to this. Such a policy can only be adopted in one way, under the Constitution of the country, and I think that document is still in force; it is supposed to be at least.

It can be done in only one way, by treaty submitted by the President of the United States to this body and ratified by a vote of this body. Having adopted no such policy, having made no such alliance, having contracted no such engagements, I say that it is entirely undetermined yet, to what extent, in what manner, and how we must wage the war that is necessary to vindicate our honor, and to secure and to preserve and to maintain our rights. I say that the sole question that concerns this Government and this people is, not to see that European matters are settled to suit this man's idea or that man's idea or another man's idea, but to see that American rights are vindicated; that American honor is kept unsullied; to see that this country exacts adequate reparation for the wrongs that its innocent, peaceful citizens have suffered. I say once that object is achieved, once that purpose is accomplished, I greatly mistake the temper of our peace-loving people if we shall not be able to accommodate ourselves readily and entirely with our enemy.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator, of course, with pleasure.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator if he believes that by engaging in this war with the allies for the defeat of Germany we in any way bind ourselves to engage in the settlement of the dispute over Belgium, Alsace, the Balkan Peninsula, or Russian rights in Turkey?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not, and I hope the Senator from Minnesota does not.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think I stated on the floor of the Senate the other day that I did not.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am very glad the Senator from Minnesota entertains that view, and it seems to me utterly incomprehensible that an American Senator could entertain any other view. Of course, "many men, many minds." There may be Members of this body on either side, or on both sides, of this aisle who may view that question differently; but, so far as I am concerned, Washington's policy is yet sound. I do not want to sit at the council table of nations and settle European disputes, and I do not want this Government to have anything to do with what sort of a form of government Russia or Germany or Italy or any other nation on earth shall maintain.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator from Georgia indulges the hope that the representatives of this Government will not sit at the head or to the right of the power occupying the head seat at the table when this settlement comes about, in my judgment, he is doomed to a very sad disappointment.

Mr. HARDWICK. I spoke only of my desire, of my hope, not of my belief. The Senator from Mississippi may be right.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I hope I am not, but I think I am. I am, in fact, of the opinion that this matter was very maturely considered before war was declared.

Mr. HARDWICK. So far as I am concerned, the only council table at which I wish to sit is the council table where reparation is exacted for American wrongs and where recognition is demanded for American rights. If I am right about that, and we have not gone any further than that, we have merely declared war on Germany because Germany murdered our citizens. We have not agreed to capture Berlin; we have not agreed to join the allies in a death feud on those people. We simply are maintaining and waging an American war to vindicate American rights, American honor, and American principles, and to avenge American citizens who have been murdered. If I am right about that, what policy are we to adopt? How is it related to the pending question? In an effort to carry out an American policy, as contradistinguished from an allied policy, what is necessary to be done? What steps ought we to take, and when and how, because of the situation that now confronts us? Shall we find it necessary, in our efforts to combat Prussian autocracy, to establish a greater autocracy here in America? In our fight on Prussian militarism has it become necessary to establish in this country a more drastic and a more burdensome militarism than that under which Prussia has groaned and which we profess to hate? I think not; I believe not. Has the time come when, in order to democratize the balance of the world, we must lose our own democracy? Has the time come when, in order to curb despotic power in the hands of the German Kaiser, we find it necessary to establish in this Republic the most despotic power that ever was vested in one man in the history of the world? I believe not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am in profound sympathy with the declaration the Senator has just made, and I hope it will be accepted by the American people. I am also in profound sympathy with the suggestion the Senator has made that, when this war comes to a close and the final accounting is made as between the warring nations of the world, the United States will not be found in close conference with European powers. I will say to the Senator that in thinking that matter over before to-day I had indulged the hope that the majority of this body, which controls legislation, might in some bill make a declaration to that effect. I hope yet that that may be done.

It will be a sad day for the United States when we forget the admonitions of Washington and find ourselves in entangling alliances with European powers in their quarrels. While I am strongly in favor of prosecuting this war, we having declared it against the German Empire, I trust that we may not at the end of it find ourselves in a position that will involve us in complications with foreign countries such as we can not contemplate with composure.

I thank the Senator from Georgia for his courtesy.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire for his interruption. As he must see, I am in hearty and profound sympathy with his American view of this great question, and I regard it as fundamental if the liberty handed down to us by our fathers is to be transmitted by us to our children. We can not depart from it, and I expect to show the Senate and I hope the American people before I finish this address that the traditional liberties that were the prize for which Washington's "ragged Continentals" fought is surrendered in this bill which it is now proposed to pass.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, I desire to say to him at this point that the President, in his address to Congress, has announced his opinion that the United States Government can no longer occupy a position of isolation; that it is a part of the great world system and must take its responsibilities in the settlement of these international questions. I agree very heartily with the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from New Hampshire, but I think already we have been a little forgetful of Washington's teachings. In truth it strikes me that the teachings of Washington and the wise founders of this Republic are regarded by many of the so-called leaders of public thought to-day as altogether obsolete.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, it is not my purpose, and it is not the intent of this address, to criticize anyone or to take issue with anyone, except in so far as criticism is involved and issue is taken with those who dispute the principles I announce. Regardless of whom it may be, regardless of the personality of the person who objects to it, I still believe in Washington's doctrine, that this country ought not to enter into entangling alliances with European Governments. No matter how far progressive thought may have carried us forward in certain directions along those lines, I do not yield to it, and I do not believe the sound sense and sober patriotism of this country will ever approve such a proposition.

Undoubtedly Congress ought, even in advance, and necessarily in advance of the settlement of the questions I have suggested, to proceed without delay to the vigorous and adequate prosecution of the war which we have declared, remembering its purpose, mindful of its object, its one purpose being to vindicate American honor, to redress American wrongs, and to establish American rights. First of all, as I said a moment ago, purely as a matter of interest, purely because it is for our interest as well as that of our allies for the time being, a matter of common interest to us all, because we are engaged in a combat with a common foe, we ought to give bountiful aid in money, supplies, equipment, and munitions of all sorts to the other nations that are also engaged in war with Germany and her allies. We ought to do that at once, without the slightest delay; and I think we have done it already in bountiful measure; but, for one, I stand ready to do it in even more bountiful measure whenever and wherever the necessity arises, and to the very extent and limit of our resources and power.

Second. We ought to mobilize and to use at once the full power of our Navy—of our fleet equipped and augmented with proper submarine destroyers—to clear the high seas of the people who have impudently denied us our rights thereon, and to punish them for their assaults upon our peaceful merchant ships. We can do that without raising a regiment; we can do that without calling a single man to service in the land forces; and it ought to be done at once, and doubtless will be done just as soon as adequate preparation can be made by the Navy Department.

Third. As I said a moment ago, my own opinion is that we ought to send at once to the battle fields of Europe a picked division of our Regular forces, to plant on French soil the Stars and Stripes for the encouragement that they will give to those who are temporarily our allies—although we may not agree with every purpose they may have—to the men and the nations whom it is to our interest to encourage and sustain in their fight against our common foe. We ought to do that; we can do that without any trouble. We have the Regulars; and the United States Regulars, whatever else may be said about them, are, in my opinion, among the very best of the picked troops of earth. They are ready and equipped and willing to go, and their places here at home and in our insular possessions can be readily taken, and instantly taken, by the picked men of our National Guard, who have already been called, many thousands of them, to the colors. We ought to do that immediately.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. Is the Senator willing that Col. Roosevelt shall go?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir; I am not only willing, but I will go further than that—and I am coming to that feature of the matter a little later—I am not only willing, but anxious. I believe we ought to let every man in this country who is willing to go to this war to go, unless he can not be allowed to go without leaving too big a void behind him; and, measured by that rule, I think we can spare "the colonel." [Laughter.]

I will tell you another thing. I want to let every man in this Republic go who is willing to go, and who can be spared, before I drag any man into it unwillingly who does not want to go. It looks to me like that is common sense and common justice at the same time.

Selective conscription! Conserve the Nation's industry, keep it industrially strong and vital, say these gentlemen. Why, you can apply exactly the same principle to volunteering. I have never yet heard that you were obliged to accept every man that offers. The Good Book says, "Many are called, but few chosen." I do not suppose that we have to accept every volunteer who comes along, any more than we have to take every conscript who might be enrolled.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the man who volunteers will go wherever he is assigned.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir; and if he volunteers in the right spirit he would just about as soon go as a private as a brigadier general; but, unfortunately, most of the volunteers we have had up to date have been for officers and very few for privates; and I suspect that is the real reason for most of this conscription talk.

The Senator from Mississippi understood me to mean that I did not think the force required could be raised of volunteers. I do not mean to be so understood. I believe it can. I did not intend to convey the impression in that half jocular remark that I thought otherwise. If there is the right method applied to the volunteer system, such as we have always had in this country, with some slight modifications I think we can raise all the soldiers we require. I know that the State I represent in part on this floor can raise her quota within a very limited period of time under a proper volunteer system, and I think the same thing is true about almost every other State in this country.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HARDWICK. I would dislike to believe that that was not true about any American State.

How shall we raise an army—by volunteers or by draft, by free-will offerings or by forced conscription? Mr. President, I want to outline in a very brief way some of the objections which have been made to the volunteer system, and then undertake to make equally brief reply to those objections.

First. Senators who object to the volunteer system at the present time tell us that it will take the Nation's bravest and the Nation's best. That is true. It will take just as many of them as we will accept; and I will tell you now that a nation never won a great war, never achieved glory, except at the expense of the richest and the bravest and the best blood that flowed in the veins of her sons. If you think this war can be won with an army made up of pool-room sharks and barroom loungers, you hold the German enemy in much lighter estimation than he ought to be held. If you win this war at all, if you carry the Stars and Stripes with honor and with credit and with glory through its perils, you will not do it with anything short of the very best blood and the very best manhood that this country can furnish.

Second. Senators object to it because they say it makes for waste and weakens the Nation industrially. I answer that every principle of selection that by human ingenuity can apply to the one system can be equally well applied to the other; and if you rejoin, "Well, but we may not get enough volunteers," then, I answer that then, when that happens, and not until then, will you be up against conscription.

Third. I have heard the statement made that this system is antiquated and as much out of place in these automobile days as an ancient stagecoach would be if brought back to the streets of this Capital. Well, I am not so sure that that is a good argument against it. All these years I have heard the same argument made against the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to be working, too.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator, of course. The Senator says the argument seems to be working? Yes, unfortunately; and yet I am not convinced, and I know my friend from Idaho is not convinced, that it ought to be working, or has any real value. I am not convinced that the argument is sound even if a few fools do adopt or urge it. The fact that a thing is old and long established and has served us well for a long time does not prove that it is bad, old fashioned, old fogy, or out of date. On the contrary, to my mind it seems to prove that it must have intrinsic worth, or it would not survive.

Practically the same men will fill the ranks, with few exceptions, under one system as under the other system, and in the same time, unless, indeed, it be true that volunteers will not come forward so fast that they can be organized more rapidly than all the preliminaries of this conscription business could be gone through with. They can be as well trained, as well equipped, as modern and up to date, under the one system as they can under the other.

Fourth. Senators who oppose the volunteer system say that the officers will be selected for political reasons rather than for efficiency, and will be untrained and inefficient.

Now, that is a serious objection. If it is true—and it is partly true, at least—it deserves serious consideration and the application of some remedy. Now, in the first place, under the law that we ought to pass, inefficient men who, because of their natural leadership are selected for these places need not be commissioned. We are not obliged to accept them. They can be rejected, but if they are real men, whether they are very efficient in technical training or not, we can train them just as well, just as efficiently and just as thoroughly, as officers for this army, whether they happen to be elected or selected by the commands or appointed by the Executive. The personnel is the same and the proposition is the same. Unless there is something wrong with the timber that is offered, one is as good as the other and you are just about as likely, and in fact more likely, to get unsuitable timber from the one system as you are from the other. Executive favoritism in making appointments is just about as dangerous as popular mistakes in making choices. There is no doubt about that.

We are proposing now to train, in four or five great camps in our country—one established in my own State—10,000 of these young officers. Why could we not train the officers for these volunteers in exactly the same way and in exactly the same time that we are going to train these so-called reserve officers? Why not; and will they not be just as good men and just as well trained when we get through training them, no matter which camp they come from?

It has been insisted that the experience of other countries proves the volunteer system a failure. I deny it. I dispute it. Take France. Let me say, first, about France that France has made a splendid showing in this war. In my opinion, it has borne the brunt of the contest in large measure. It has acted the heroic part in it. Certainly France and Great Britain together share the great bulk of the glory that comes to the allied side of this great contest. In France, I understand, they have something like a universal military system, something that approximates conscription, although I venture the statement in this presence and without fear of successful contradiction that it is not one-half as harsh as this proposition that we are proposing for our people as a first experience—"first aid to the injured."

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Has the Senator any information as to whether or not there has been any objection or any opposition in France to the enforcement of the conscription law? I have never heard any.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I do not think so, but——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think they have pretty universally acquiesced in it; in fact, volunteered with alacrity. Their homes are threatened with invasion, their firesides are about to be profaned by a cruel foe, and it is but natural that a brave man should offer his services and, if need be, his life in such a cause.

Mr. HARDWICK. But I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I can readily understand how the French nation, sleeping on its arms in close proximity to Germany, living over a smoldering volcano, would readily submit to the discomforts and to the deprivation of personal rights and personal liberty that were involved in this system in order that she might be able to meet the supreme test, as she has met it, during this war; and if the necessity were on this country, as it has been on France, if American soil were in danger of invasion, if American freemen were about to lose their lives and liberties and American homes to be desecrated, while there would not be any need for conscription, I would be willing to conscript every man in this country, from the cradle to the grave, white and black, brown and yellow.

Mr. VARDAMAN. You would not need it.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; we would not need it. The Senator is right; but if, perchance, we did need it, for one I would not hesitate to apply it.

So much for France. But England, our mother country, whose institutions are practically ours, of whom we are not only the eldest child but the prototype—what has been England's experience with this matter?

Conscription was finally forced in England, but a limited conscription, for unmarried men only, I think, and a conscription that did not come until after two years of the greatest war that this world has ever seen had thundered by within 50 miles of her doors; not until after she had sent, by her splendid voluntary offerings, 5,000,000 of her bravest and best men to the front; not without much division of opinion and much resentment at the political sacrifice involved at the giving up of ideals of English liberty that were at stake even in that great country. I read from the London Nation of March 25, 1916, one of the great London newspapers. This is a quotation from an editorial in that paper:

> It remains to be proved that compulsion will get for the British Army a larger number of men than it might obtain by volunteering, but it wants no further experience to show how gravely compulsion has in a few months qualified the spirit of patriotic self-sacrifice.

And yet England, with her very national life trembling in the balance, was within 50 miles of the war and had experienced two years of its tortures when this expression was made.

Again, an English publicist writing in the Atlantic Monthly in November, 1916, gave this opinion:

> How many conscientious objectors have come before the tribunals I can not discover.

Let me pause there to say that in England, at least, they have tribunals to settle questions raised by this draft business. So far as the Senate bill is concerned, not one is proposed here.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Not only tribunals but local tribunals.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir; and while the House of Representatives, in a new-found spirit of independence, did insist on putting in the remarkable right of an American citizen to have a writ of habeas corpus in the courts of the United States, that is the only provision that has been made in either House on that subject up to date. It is left, as everything else is, to the discretion of the President, without any local safeguards whatever in the Senate bill and very little better in the House bill, although I admit the House bill is some improvement.

Now, let us see. Mr. Nevinson continues:

> How many conscientious objectors have come before the tribunals I can not discover. About 25,000, including, presumably, a certain number of shirkers, is the average estimate; but of these nearly one-tenth have refused noncombatant or alternative service and have been arrested and handed over to the military authorities. The exact number on the date of writing—August 30—is 1,987. The great majority of them have been court-martialed under the army act for disobeying orders and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if it is not entirely possible under this act to create local tribunals all over the country for the selection and exclusion of those drafted under the act? And I am not at all sure but that I agree with him about the local tribunals.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is possible, but it is just the reverse of the fellow that was in jail when you could not put him there. It has not been done; and I do not see any prospect of getting it done. There is nothing in the bill that requires it. There is nothing in the bill that authorizes it. It is merely left to the discretion of the military authorities in this free country of ours—"The land of the free and the home of the brave."

Mr. KELLOGG. They would have the power to create local tribunals, would they not—civil tribunals?

Mr. HARDWICK. They would have the power?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly, under this act.

Mr. HARDWICK. Why, they could, I reckon, for their own advice. No; I take that back. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] suggests very aptly that it would be an unheard-of proposition that the military authorities should erect a civil court to enable them to transact their military duties.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is not that exactly what was done in England?

Mr. HARDWICK. No, sir; I do not think so.

Mr. KELLOGG. They have a civil court.

Mr. HARDWICK. By law, by statute passed by Parliament; and the very point I am making on this subject is that if you have any regard for the rights and liberties of the people, some local tribunal ought to be created by law to pass on these questions that may arise during the enforcement of these laws.

Mr. VARDAMAN and Mr. KELLOGG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield, and to whom?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to say anything derogatory to the Regular Army officer; he always performs well his proper function in the economy of our Government; but it is a well-known fact that there are few things for which he has as little respect as he has for civil authority. He never yields, concedes anything to a civilian that is not vouchsafed under the law; and the suggestion that the military authorities would establish a civil tribunal to pass upon the rights of the soldier is unheard-of in military procedure. The fact of the business is, I think I can see in this system for raising an army for use during the war a definite purpose to lay the foundation for a great military organization in this country after this emergency is over, and I view such a purpose with alarm. There will be no freedom in America when the professional soldier shall be allowed to determine the military policy of this Republic.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, one more warning from our cousins across the seas, and then I will come nearer home on this question.

In this same paper, the issue of March 18, 1916, is a rather timely observation, and since the fashion now is to call on our English cousins for advice about their experience we might get experience from both sides. This paper says:

> In fact, compulsion is found wanting whether we measure it by its contribution to our material strength or by its psychological effect on the national concord—the two prime factors in the conduct of the war—and we are not surprised at this result. In accepting compulsion we sacrificed one of the most deeply rooted principles of our national traditions. We hoped to reap a Prussian's reward, but to give up one's own strong points is no talisman for acquiring one's enemy's strong points.

Now, in Canada——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator say what newspaper that was?

Mr. HARDWICK. The London Nation.

In Canada what has happened? And I turn to Canada as an example; to Canada as an illustration; to Canada as an argument, with the profound belief that its example is the most valuable one to us that can be afforded of any country that has participated to any extent in this war. They are our next door neighbors, kin to us by ties of blood and marriage, a kindred people in a great many ways to our own, a similar country to ours in many respects; just about as far away both from Great Britain and from the scene of the conflict as we are; hardly more intimately connected even in a business way with England and English interests than we are, although, of course, tied to the mother country by the strongest political ties and by the strongest ties of love and affection. We have a written Constitution, and that is almost the single factor that makes a difference in the relative situation and in the positions of the two countries.

What has Canada done in this war, and how did Canada do it? Has Canada found it necessary in order to prosecute her part of it, in order to bear her adequate burden, to discard the standards and traditions of English liberty and to force compulsory military service across the seas upon her people? She has not.

Oh, but Americans say, who favor this un-American plan, that we will not get the necessary soldiers under this volunteer system. I say to you that Canada is as far away from this war as we are and is a party to it only by the tie of love and loyalty that has bound her to the mother country. Canada in three years, with a population of about 8,000,000, has sent to the battle fronts of Europe the very flower of her manhood. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] suggests 400,000. I think the Senator is mistaken. Is the Senator sure that he has investigated it carefully?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Four hundred thousand; and may I suggest to the Senator that that is a remarkable showing.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will excuse me——

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. I have understood that 400,000 have been raised in Canada and 300,000 have been sent.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that 350,000 men have been sent and 50,000 are waiting to go at any moment's notice. That I get from the Toronto Globe, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator may be correct, but I saw a statement which seemed to bear the impress of authenticity just a day or two ago to the effect that 300,000 had gone.

Mr. GALLINGER. I take it from the Toronto Globe, I will say to the Senator, and I think it is accurate.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from New York is right; 400,000 men from this nation of 8,000,000 population, and probably half a million when you consider the auxiliary people that in one way or another are connected with the service, although they may not be in the battle line. Shall we shame American manhood, shall we challenge American patriotism, shall we insult American patriotism by saying that we can not proportionately, if the necessity comes, raise just as many men to fight for our rights, to follow our flag, and to die if need be for the honor and glory of our country as Canada can?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. In this connection I think it is apposite to call the attention of the Senate to what seems to me to be the most remarkable contribution to the literature of this bill. It is a request by the president of the Army League—whatever that may be—Joseph Leiter, to Mr. Roosevelt to withdraw his proposal to raise a division by the volunteer system for service at the French front. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to read it in the RECORD just now.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very well.

Mr. THOMAS (reading)—

> I do not believe anyone questions your patriotism or your Americanism, yet I regret that in your efforts to put our flag on the firing line at the head of a force of volunteers you are giving aid and comfort to the enemy in Congress. The opposition to the principle of universal obligation to train in peace and serve in war are using your offer as an argument against the passage of the administration bill.

In other words, an ex-President of the United States, desirous of serving his country and raising a division, if he can, is giving aid and comfort to the enemy in Congress.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Who is Mr. Leiter?

Mr. THOMAS. He is a colonel, evidently.

Mr. HARDWICK. Joseph Leiter?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I suppose he once drew his sword at a raffle.

Mr. HARDWICK. The last I heard of his sword it was in the wheat pit of Chicago. I guess that possibly fitted him to tell Congress what to do about this military matter. He is the man who cornered the wheat market, unless I am mistaken.

Mr. THOMAS. He is the same man.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, I suppose he is cornering the military market.

Mr. STONE. He was finally beaten.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think he will be finally beaten in this one, too.

Now, let us see one other country's experience, and I am going to pass on to something else besides experience. You must remember now we are talking about our kinsfolk, the English-speaking people, the same blood that we have, people with the same devotion to the ideals of English liberty and American liberty that our people entertain.

Australia, with a population of something less than 5,000,000, sent practically 300,000 soldiers to the front under the volunteer system. That is a pretty good showing, is it not? How many could we send if our people are as patriotic as those of Australia, without destroying the standard and the ideals of American and English liberty in this country?

Ah, but there we had the same conscription element that we have here, and they got in the first part of the work just as they have done here, by getting the newspapers on their side, and they finally forced a conscription bill through the Australian parliament just as they are about to force this bill through the American Congress, by the weight of their ink.

But in Australia they have a provision that the people can have a referendum on these questions, and after the newspapers of Australia had forced conscription through an unwilling and halting parliament, it was referred to the people of Australia and to the soldiers in the trenches on the battle fields of Europe who came from Australia, and when the ballots were taken the people of Australia and the soldiers from Australia who were bleeding and dying for England and for England's glory and for Australia's glory rejected the conscription proposition by an overwhelming majority, and strange to remark, because these men are certainly not slackers and cowards and traitors, the majority in the trenches against this infamous proposition was greater than at home in Australia. And that is going to happen here. You gentlemen need not deceive yourselves. This bill is fundamentally subversive of American principles. Universal military training in defense of this country, universal military service from the cradle to the grave if need be to defend American soil from invasion, but never on this earth shall you force, with my vote at least, an American citizen into compulsory military service across the seas against his will.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying, and especially in that part of his speech which refers to patriotism. As I understand it, the highest form of patriotism is the willingness of a citizen to die, if need be, in war for his country. If all our people are to be divided into two classes, one those between 19 and 25 and who will have to go to war for their country whether they want to go or not, and all the rest of them are exempted from war, where will be the motive for this high form of patriotism in our land?

Mr. HARDWICK. I quite agree with the Senator, and I am going to try to elaborate that just a little later and tell the reason why. Australia rejected the draft system. These Senators and these newspapers, though I really ought to put the newspapers first, say you will not get the necessary volunteers for this war. I deny it. I dispute it. If we are going to assume that that is true, then we are forced to conclude that the war is unpopular and is unsupported by public sentiment, and I am unwilling to so concede. Just as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] did, the other day on this floor, I am willing to invite any Senator who wants to interrupt me, who does not believe that under the proper volunteer law his State will furnish its quota, to get up here and say it. I want to see where that State is located and what its name is. But the Senator got no response to a similar invitation, and no other Senator will.

I deny it. If it is true that the manhood of this country will not prosecute this war voluntarily, then we ought never to have declared it. For one, I can never concede that American manhood has sunk so low that it would submit to the murdering of peaceful and inoffensive American citizens on the high seas by the organized agencies of a government and not be willing to demand war against that country until reparation is made.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. The Senator a moment ago said that never with his vote would a law be passed under which an American citizen could be forced against his will into the military service that would carry him beyond the seas.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; for no campaign of conquest; but it does not make much difference. I think I have the Senator's idea.

Mr. STONE. "Foreign conquest?" This is not a war of conquest.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know what it is, and I do not think the Senator does either yet.

Mr. STONE. I do not. But without going into that, the President says, and it has been generally said, that we have gone into this war in the interest of democracy and humanity and liberty.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not concede that to be true. That is a pretty bald way to state it, but I do not believe that, and I did not support the declaration of war on that basis. I voted for it simply and solely because American citizens were being murdered on the high seas by established agencies of a government which professed to be at peace with us, and plainly so stated at the time I voted.

Mr. STONE. I did not vote for it at all, as the Senator knows. I voted against it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know that.

Mr. STONE. Now, whatever reasoning influenced the Senator from Georgia or any other Senator in voting for it, a very large majority of the Senate—by practically a unanimous vote—was in favor of the war, and likewise the vote in the House was of the same nature. The Senator, as I understand him, is for raising an army by volunteers or not at all. Hence he says he would not vote for the bill if it compelled a citizen to go abroad against his will.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the way I feel, Senator.

Mr. STONE. Now, I wish to ask the Senator, suppose we are not able to raise an army adequate to the great service lying before us to meet the tremendous exigency we are confronted with, are we to lay down and quit, or how are we to get the troops?

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator concede the proposition that we are obliged to send a million men or several million men over there? Is that one of the bases on which his question rests?

Mr. STONE. I said nothing about that, but I assert my attitude that since we are in this war we must send whatever force is necessary to win the war, whether it be 500,000 or 5,000,000 men.

Mr. HARDWICK. Precisely. I will answer the Senator then. I do not believe that there will be any difficulty in raising a sufficient force by the volunteer system to prosecute this war to the extent that the American people are bound to prosecute it and will prosecute it. I do not believe that there is any necessity for us to send 5,000,000 men. I do not believe that the circumstances are such that we are forced to uproot German power forever in order to get the proper revenge or the proper satisfaction for the wrong that has been done us. If we send our Navy there, our submarine destroyers, if we keep open the high seas and sink the German ships for the ships of ours that were sunk, and then if we give every reasonable proper and possible aid that our home people would freely give in blood and treasure to the allied powers I think we have done our duty.

I am not committed, nor do I regard the Senate as committed, nor do I think this Nation is committed to the idea that every wrong that is England's wrong is our wrong; that every wrong that is France's wrong is our wrong; that every wrong that is Italy's wrong is our wrong, but I want to redress American wrongs.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH The Senator will concede, I imagine, that in order to redress American wrongs Germany must be defeated?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will concede that Germany must be defeated to obtain full redress a hundredfold—aye, a thousandfold—for the American lives she has taken and for the wrongs she has done us.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator think Germany will make any such payment before she is defeated?

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope she will. I can not see why so many want 10,000,000 American citizens to be sent over there to her soil.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not discussing the question as to how Germany should be defeated. It is faintly, remotely possible that she may accept defeat by a show of force, although I have no confidence in that suggestion.

Mr. HARDWICK. Neither have I, certainly not so far as the allies are concerned.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But I do suggest to the Senator from Georgia we shall never receive reparation or apology or any satisfaction whatsoever from Germany for the wrongs that she has inflicted upon our people until she is defeated, and that it is the duty of the United States to do everything in its power to secure her defeat.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know whether the Senator from New York approaches this matter from the same point of view I do. If he supports it with the idea that that is going to carry the English cause or the French cause to final, ultimate, and complete triumph, regardless of whether sufficient reparation has been received by us for the wrong that has been done us and sufficient guarantees for the protection of American rights have been secured, then he approaches it in a different spirit from what I do. If the Senator approaches it with the idea that we are bound to guarantee the allied success to be final and complete, I can see how he arrives at that state of mind; but it is impossible for me to understand how he feels about it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not realize I was displaying the slightest state of mind.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, the Senator's demeanor is always agreeable to me, but the Senator's question indicated that he was rather excited about it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I know I am trespassing upon the Senator's time——

Mr. HARDWICK. Not at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I simply desire to direct the Senator's attention to a very practical aspect of the situation. The German Government has perpetrated these outrages upon our people through their submarine policy——

Mr. HARDWICK. They have sunk three or four of our ships, have they not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I forget the exact number they have sunk.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is three or four.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It makes no difference, to my mind, how many they have sunk. If they have sunk one the outrage is as great as though they had sunk many more.

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly. Let me ask the Senator from New York a question. He has asked me two or three, and he is speaking in my time. Suppose we sunk 40 German ships; suppose we did them infinitely more damage than they have done us; suppose we gave thousands of millions of dollars to their enemies and gave aid and comfort to them, when would the Senator believe that we had exacted sufficient reparation from Germany, and when would he be prepared to stop shedding American blood on account of it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I should not be prepared to cease warfare on Germany in this case until Germany was defeated.

Mr. HARDWICK. To what extent?

Mr. WADSWORTH. To the extent that she had given up the war.

Mr. HARDWICK. Even if she sought peace with America?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, that brings up the question for the future.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is a question we want to bring up. Even if Germany said, "We are sorry; you have exacted reparation from us a hundredfold"—I merely want to see how far the Senator from New York is going—"for every ship we have sunk you have sunk a hundred of ours; for every citizen of yours that we have killed you have killed a hundred of ours, and now we want to make peace"——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it very difficult to settle war by arithmetical ratios.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know the Senator's attitude; I think he does not want us to settle this war—I am going to speak to him frankly—and I do not think some of the other Senators in this Chamber do, until England gets every pound of flesh which she demands, and until France does the same thing. If that is true, the Senator occupies a different attitude from what I do about this matter, and we might just as well make it plain.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the trouble is that it is not true.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad to hear the Senator say so, and I entirely acquit him of such an idea. He says it is not true. Then I say the time may come when we will not have to sacrifice millions of American lives before we get the proper redress from Germany.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I certainly join in such a hope as that expressed in the last sentence of the Senator from Georgia. I am not seeking that the blood of millions of Americans shall be spilled upon the soil of Europe; but I do not think it quite an intelligent attitude to take, if I may say so, that we can go into this war, and, after having inflicted what we consider a sufficient amount of damages, say, "Well, now, we have done enough, and we guess we will get out."

Mr. HARDWICK. That was not my purpose. I asked, "Suppose Germany made that suggestion to us?"

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, we shall have to cross that bridge when we come to it.

Mr. HARDWICK. What I merely wanted to see was whether the Senator was willing to cross it when we got to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I certainly would not announce that as our policy at the inception of the war.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is not our policy; but I merely wanted to see how far some of us were prepared to go with this thing.

Now, certain Senators and certain newspapers claim that the volunteer system has already failed to furnish the men which the Army needs. I assert, in reply to that statement, that no true test of this question has yet been made. I assert that no war of any considerable size that ever was fought by the citizen soldiers of this Republic was every fought by volunteers who enlisted in the Regular Army units. If you tell me that the boys in Georgia, or in New York, or in New Hampshire, or in Colorado, or in Tennessee—the beloved old "volunteer" State—will not volunteer to go out under the Regular Army officers, away from their kith and kin, and not in the true Scotch-clan fashion, I tell you that is no true test of the question and is no real answer.

Mr. President, I am coming next to the hardest part of this argument; I am coming to the most difficult part of this situation to handle. It was the argument made very succinctly and very compactly and very persuasively on yesterday on this floor by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. The Senator from Montana in his argument voiced nearly all of the popular sentiment that there is in the country behind this proposition. He said the President of the United States, who is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy—I am quoting the Senator, of course, substantially only, and shall not stop to read his exact remarks—his Cabinet, the General Staff of the Army, the War College, the faculties at West Point and Annapolis—in other words, all the great military experts of the country tell us that this is the correct system and that we ought to follow their lead in this time of danger. That is the sole strength that is behind this propaganda. If the Senator is right about it, then those of us who differ are fundamentally and forever wrong; if he is right about it, there is no use to have a parliament of an English-speaking people, in war time at least; if he is right about it, we had just as well follow the fashion of the Roman Republic and declare a dictator when we declare war, suspend the Constitution, and abrogate the laws until peace is concluded.

Now, let us see. He says that the President and his Cabinet, the War College, and the General Staff, the military experts, the men whom we have paid and trained to know, tell us this is the way to do it. I want to reverse his order. Like a skillful debater, like the strong man that he is, the Senator from Montana puts first the man that he ought to put last. Because of the disposition of our people to rally, especially in times of danger, about the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, the Senator from Montana puts him in front.

The truth is that the order should be reversed. This whole thing comes from the Army experts, who have influenced the President, although they lost their battle not long ago when Hay and CHAMBERLAIN joined issue and Garrison retired from the Cabinet. They finally won their battle with the President, and with him, of course it goes without saying, they won the Cabinet. They have carried the President, the Cabinet, and the newspapers all along this line——

Mr. THOMAS. And even Col. Leiter.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; even Col. Leiter went along with them, too. Now, my own judgment is that the President of the United States does not know a great deal personally about this matter. My own judgment is that he is not better informed on this subject than the average Member of either House of Congress, although it may be considered almost treason to suggest it. My own judgment is that the War Colleges and General Staffs and experts told him what was the best thing to do, and he said, "All right; I will take it." I admit that when you are in war, to some extent you must wage that war under a responsible head. When it comes to a conduct of a campaign, when it comes to the preparation for hostilities, when it comes to the arming and disciplining of troops, when it comes to sanitation, when it comes to the outfitting, when it comes to any matter of pure technique, I say, "Yes; I will follow implicitly and without any doubt the advice of the experts, which is the best advice I can obtain." But how we shall raise an army is a different question, because, after all, the personnel is coming from the same folk, no matter about all this talk we hear concerning "slackers" and people who are not ready to volunteer.

The question of how the army should be raised is not a military question; it is a great civic, economic, industrial question; it is a great question, in which are bound up the rights and liberties of English-speaking people, and no War College, no General Staff, no military expert can bear the burden the 3,000,000 people in Georgia have put on my shoulders, to settle this thing for them and for the people of this country. How easy to dodge behind their skirts and say, "Yes; the President advises it; the Cabinet urges it; the War College approves it; the General Staff suggests it; the military experts of the country, the men who are paid to know, say it is best"—how easy to do that, and yet how wrong if, in doing it, you have sacrificed the dearest rights of an English-speaking people; if in doing it, you have given away the liberties that you were sent here to guard, protect, and defend.

Why, a distinguished member of another body, who is my warm personal friend through many years of close and intimate association, prayed the other day that God might deliver this country from settling military matters or naval matters according to the advice of laymen. Oh, how insidious was the plea; and yet, Senators, it was wrong, absolutely and fundamentally wrong, or this book, this instrument, discredited and sneered at, ridiculed and abused, as it has been, the Constitution of our fathers, to establish which Washington's "ragged Continentals" fought, bled, and died, amounts to nothing, because in that Constitution the provision is made that the power to raise armies shall vest, not in the Executive, not in the War College, not in Annapolis, not in West Point, not in military experts, but in the Congress of the United States. Why in the Congress? So that the rights and the liberties of the people might be in the hands of the representatives of the people themselves, so that, if their rights and liberties were sacrificed or disregarded or neglected, a speedy accounting might be had and a change be made. So the Constitution of the United States gives the power to raise armies, not to the Executive or to the General Staff, but to the Congress of our country.

Now let us see. They say that conscription makes for industrial efficiency. I thought they were supporting it because they were told to do so by the General Staff. They say that we ought to swallow it blind, because the General Staff says it is right; and then, in the next breath, they say that the real reason they are for it is because it makes for industrial efficiency. I say that the same industrial efficiency, the same industrial vitality can be just as well, and even better, promoted by applying the same principles of selection to a volunteer system as can be applied to this forced, un-American and un-English, draft.

They say conscription is democratic. God forgive them for the profanation of the word. They say a draft is American, just, fair, and equitable. Let us see. I am going to look at just a few provisions of the bill. In the first place, they fix the age limit arbitrarily at between 19 and 25. Is there any more patriotic obligation on a boy 19 years old than there is on a man of 26? Democracy is equality. "Oh," but they say, "we do not need them all." Why, then, do you not put all their names in the hat, and give them all the same chance? If it is democratic, if it is equality, if it proceeds on the theory that every man must "do his bit," whether in this country or on foreign soil, treat everybody alike that is subject to military duty and within military age, and make them all stand the same chance.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, what would the Senator fix as the maximum limit of age?

Mr. HARDWICK. I understand these experts—and I am willing to get behind them in this matter, because the age of service is an expert matter—claim that 18 and 45 years are about the extreme limits both ways. All I want to add is that, so far as I am concerned, I do not believe that until a boy gets grown you ought to force a draft on him anyhow, under any circumstances. Until the law recognizes him as a man, you ought not to treat him as a man; until the law gives him the right of manhood, you ought not to call him for the service of manhood; and so long as 21 is the age of majority in this country, I myself should never vote for a proposition to draft below the age of 21 under any circumstances. I am perfectly willing to take those boys, and I want to say that some of the very finest and best soldiers, and many of them, most of them in the War between the States, the contention has been made were under that age. But let us take them when they are willing and with the consent of their parents and guardians, if we take them at all when they are under age.

Now, I want to call your attention to a provision in this bill that confers more unlimited, more absolute, more despotic power on the present occupant of the White House than was ever conferred upon Lincoln when this whole Nation was ablaze and when our own people were at each other's throats in a death grapple. Nay, more than was ever conferred upon any German Hohenzollern, Russian Romanoff, or any Roman Cæsar, or any despot in the history of the world, where there was even a pretense or semblance of recognition of individual rights. After providing for this draft this bill from the General Staff provides the following:

SEC. 3. The Vice President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several States and Territories, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed; and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-organized religious sect or organization, at present organized and existing, whose creed forbids its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed of said religious organization; and the President—is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 thereof—

or to draft for partial military service only—

Now, that is not to excuse from a draft. That has no relation to the other drafts that Congress authorizes. That is the presidential draft for purposes only partially military, of a different and separate kind and character—or to draft for partial military service only, persons of the following classes: Customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mails; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate; pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries including agriculture found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.

So that the President, under this bill, is authorized not only to excuse from draft, if he wants to, the people of those classes, or as many of them as he thinks proper to excuse, and is given absolutely arbitrary and uncontrolled power upon that subject; but he can, if he elects, take every man in those classes, and the classification is so general that it includes 95 per cent of the population of the United States.

Persons engaged in industries including agriculture found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.

It includes every business and every enterprise in the country, and he can draft all these people, practically everybody in the country, for what is called "partial military service."

Mr. KING. Regardless of age.

Mr. HARDWICK. Regardless of age, beginning with the cradle and ending with the grave. He can draft them all. What can he do? He can say to the farmer in Georgia, if he wants to, "A, you plant cotton." He can say to the farmer in South Caroline, "B, you plant corn." He can say to your miner in the West, "You mine copper," or "You mine silver." He can say to anybody, "You do this, or you do that, or you do the other, because the national interest requires it," and there is none to say him nay. This is despotism, bold and unvarnished, and there is no national emergency to justify it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. As I understand the provisions of this measure, the draft for partial military service only is confined to the law which limits the draft. He can not go outside of the ages specified in the law to draft anybody to the Army or any other service, as I understand the bill. I may be mistaken, but I think "to draft for partial military service only" is of that particular class within the ages that are mentioned in the exclusions of the bill.

My interpretation of this particular section of the bill, "or to draft for partial military service only persons of the following classes," and so forth, is that it applies to those who could be, under the provisions of the exemption, used for one hour. For instance, a railroad engineer is exempt under this because he is necessary and more necessary in his position than he would be in the ranks; yet when Government supplies had to be moved, then, if this man refused to move them, he could be placed in the military service of the Government. It does not go outside of the exemption list and has no relation to anybody except those within the exemption; and when Senators interpret the draft "for partial military service only" to apply to all mankind, it is a forced interpretation of this bill. My idea is—and I should like to hear the Senator on it—that the only qualification of any draft outside of the statements of the bill is that the President may draft those exempted when they are absolutely necessary to the immediate performance of a duty incumbent upon them as a part of our Republic.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I think I understand the Senator's idea, and I wish he were right about it. I wish I could comfort myself with the thought that he might even possibly be right about it, because it would be a great comfort to be able to take that view of the situation. But the trouble about this thing—and I will go over it again for the benefit of my friend as well as of the Senate—is the way this language is drawn; and giving the language its ordinary and usual interpretation and construction, I do not believe it is possible for any other conclusion except the one I have stated to be arrived at about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of the contention—well founded, as I believe—that there is great danger of a real shortage of food, even for the people of our own country, does the Senator think that any man connected with agriculture in any form would be subject to draft under the exemption in that bill?

Mr. HARDWICK. To military draft, the Senator means? I think it would depend entirely upon the discretion of the President. I do not see how they can raise an army of any size in this country by exempting all the laboring men and all the farmers to start with.

Mr. GALLINGER. My question involves the proposition that it is contended—and, as I think, properly contended—that the great danger to our Nation, as well as to the warring nations of Europe, is a food shortage. If that be so, I do not see why the President would permit any man on a farm, or connected with farming operations in any form, to be drafted under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, of course, the Senator may be right. After all, it rests within the breast of one man, if we enact this law. I can not tell what he will do.

Now, let us see. Of course, the Senator from Arizona may be right in spite of my not thinking so, but I wish I could think that he is right; but here is the trouble about this thing:

The President is * * * authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft—

That is, the one first provided in this bill, the general selective draft—and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof—

or to draft—

Now, this is another draft; it does not refer to these other drafts. They call them "said drafts," but this is another draft, and it is not a military draft at all, but—to draft for partial military service only—

A different draft entirely. Now, then, when it goes on to describe the people in this draft, there is no limit at all about age, although there is in the other drafts. By what process of intellectual legerdemain the Senator from Arizona is able to transport age limitations about the purely military drafts into this section for the partial military draft, I do not know; but, as far as I am concerned, it does not comfort me.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia further yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator, of course.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will try to explain to the Senator that the fact that the particular clause is within the exemptions is the reason.

Mr. HARDWICK. That does not constitute any reason at all.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. To show the "intellectual legerdemain" through which I arrive at my conclusions, I should like to say to the Senator that the provision reads:

The President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft—

Meaning the other part of this bill——

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; that is true.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona (reading)—

And from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof—

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the militia draft?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is the militia draft.

Mr. HARDWICK. "Or to draft for partial military service."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Wait a minute, now—or to draft for partial military service only persons of the following classes—

Every one of whom is exempt.

Mr. HARDWICK. They are not exempt from this partial draft, though.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They are not exempt from this partial draft, and ought not to be.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, they are subject to it, and without any regard to age.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No, sir; there is nothing in this bill that fixes any power to draft except the age; and under the mere exclusion of those that need not be taken under the draft it is unfair, from my "intellectual legerdemain," to conclude that they are going to extend it to more than is ever mentioned in the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. The only trouble about it, if the Senator will permit me now to continue, is that we have done it. It is again a case of the fellow that is in jail. It ought not to be that way, of course, and I hope the committee will correct it before we get through with it. I do not believe anybody intended it, and I do not know how it was slipped in there in that way, and it certainly ought to be corrected, unless that is what you mean to do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to call to his attention——

Mr. HARDWICK. I will yield to my colleague, of course, with pleasure; but let me say first that I am convinced it is true, because that is practically what one of the great departments of this Government is asking now, backed by the administration, and I think they put this in there in exact support of and in accordance with that policy. Now I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to say to my colleague that I am thoroughly against this line that he is criticizing, and I agree with him in his construction of it, and I desire to eliminate it, because I expect to vote for the draft system. If he will turn to the first word in that paragraph, he will see that the Vice President is excepted.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If it is dealing simply with men under 25, why did we except the Vice President from it?

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We except Senators, we except Members of the House, specifically. It clearly deals, therefore, with men over 25.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, Mr. President, I am anxious to conclude. I have occupied the floor for some time, and I want to get through as quickly as I can, but of course I can not do it if I am very much interrupted.

I ask you, when you have fixed by law the ages of the men that you will select for this service, how is it to be decided who are to be chosen and who rejected? The bill itself is as silent as the tomb on that question except for one sentence, but that one sentence is all sufficient. It says, "The draft shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe."

Where is your provision about local tribunals? The House of Representatives in their bill at least permitted this much of a remnant to be left to the American citizen of his personal rights and his individual liberty. They left him the right of habeas corpus in the courts. Under this bill the findings of whatever military commission may be appointed are absolutely binding and final on all questions of fact. Is that in accordance with the spirit and principles of English liberty, of American liberty?

Ah, Mr. President, Members of both Houses of Congress who call at the War Department to inquire what this measure means are told how it is to be administered; and oh, the pitiable condition that forces us, the masters, to appeal to the servants to know what our law means, to know how our law is to be construed! We are told that if they get 5,000,000 men, we will say, for purposes of illustration, as a total out of this draft, after making the exemptions—and they want 500,000—that means that 1 out of 10 will be selected for this service; and how? By lot, they say; by gamble; by chance.

Ah, Senators, I would depict to you, in the words of another, the scenes that will occur throughout this country; words uttered more than a hundred years ago by the man who, in my judgment—and I say it although he was New England's son—is the greatest American Senator who ever sat in this Chamber—Daniel Webster.

What did Webster say in his speech delivered in this body on the 9th day of December 1814—and it must be remembered that at that time the Constitution was barely 25 years old and the men who wrote it and knew its spirit and meaning were alive and interpreted it—Mr. Webster said in that memorable speech, and I invite those who have not read it to do so, because it is a great argument on the great principles involved in this matter:

> Sir, I invite the supporters of the measures before you to look to their actual operations. Let the men who have so often pledged their own fortunes and their own lives to the support of this war look to the wanton sacrifice which they are about to make of their lives and fortunes. They may talk as they will about substitutes and compensation and exemptions.

Here let me interpolate: They tell all the farmers of my State that they are to be exempt. I know the sturdy farmers of Georgia are willing, yea, anxious, to contribute their full quota to the blood and treasure demanded by this great enterprise of the Nation.

Webster continues:

> It must come to the draft at last. If the Government can not hire men to voluntarily fight its battles, neither can individuals. If the war should continue, there will be no escape, and every man's fate and every man's life will come to depend on the issue of the military draft. Who shall describe to you the horror which your orders of conscription shall create in the once happy villages of this country? Who shall describe the anguish and distress which they will spread over those hills and valleys where men have heretofore been accustomed to labor and to rest in security and happiness? Anticipate the scene, sir, when the class shall assemble to stand its draft and to throw the dice for blood. What a group of wives and mothers and sisters, of helpless age and helpless infancy, shall gather round the theater of this horrible lottery, as if the strokes of death were to fall from Heaven before their eyes on a father, a brother, a son, or a husband. And in the majority of cases, sir, it will be the stroke of death. Under present prospects of a continuance of the war, not one-half of them on whom your conscription shall fall will ever return to tell the tale of their sufferings. They will perish of disease and pestilence, or they will leave their bones to whiten in fields beyond the frontier. Does the lot fall on the father of a family? His children, already orphans, shall see his face no more. When they behold him for the last time they shall see him lashed and fettered and dragged away from his own threshhold like a felon and an outlaw. Does it fall on a son, the hope and staff of aged parents? That hope shall fall them. On that staff they shall lean no longer. They shall not enjoy the happiness of dying before their children. They shall totter to their graves, bereft of their offspring and unwept by any who inherit their blood. Does it fall on a husband? The eyes which watch his parting steps may swim in tears forever. She is a wife no longer. There is no relation so tender or so sacred that, by these accursed measures, you do not propose to violate it. Into the paradise of domestic life you enter, not indeed by temptations and sorceries, but by open force and violence. * * * Nor is it, sir, for the defense of his own house and home that he who is subject to military draft is to perform the task allotted to him.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. For my information, will the Senator tell me the occasion of that great speech?

Mr. HARDWICK. When the proposition was defeated in this body in 1814 to force a draft on the people of the United States to prosecute the second war with Great Britain.

Senators, there are many other things I might say, but time presses and other gentlemen wish to speak. This is the beginning of a militarism from which we shall not soon escape, if once we hold our arms out for the manacles. It is the beginning of that militarism that has always proven fatal to the liberties of a republic and a free people. I deny the proposition that the patriotism, the loyalty, the manhood of this country will not prosecute this war just as adequately as it ought to be prosecuted. This bill is fundamentally wrong. It fails forever on one principle, if there were no other objection to it, and that is this: By standing for the principle for which it represents you surrender the fundamentals of American liberty.

Heretofore the citizen has been the uncrowned king of this Republic, towering above the White House in the majestic proportions of his free manhood, the glory and the boast of our land, the land of the free and the home of the brave.

In this bill, and by it, you treat him from a different standpoint and in a different way. For the first time in American history you treat him as a subject, not as a citizen; as a serf, not as a freeman. You exact of him, whether he will or whether he will not, military service. Military service of what character? To defend his own, to defend his native land, his home, to defend his soil from profanation? No such thing. As the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] well suggested, you will never need to exact that of the American manhood. But you exact of him compulsory service, involuntary service, against his will, to prosecute a foreign war 3,000 miles away from his own home. Senators, if that be American liberty, if that be to what the Republic has come, if no other course than that is open to enable us to prosecute this war, evil are the times upon which we have fallen. I do not believe it. American manhood can wage this war without any such enormous sacrifice as this from the sons of liberty, and it will wage it better, with sharper spirit, with keener blade, with louder trumpet than if you drag them to it in chains and against their will to fight it.

I would unhestitatingly vote, if it were ever necessary, and I do not believe it would ever be necessary, for conscription to the last man of this country to defend the soil of this country, but never will I be willing to vote to send free-born American citizens 3,000 miles across the seas to a foreign war, against their will and in chains as it were.

Senators, if I am wrong about that, if the heat of advocacy carries me too far, certainly we should not force men to go until those who are willing to go, go first.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is a strange doctrine.

Mr. HARDWICK. Ah, the doctrines of liberty are strange to some men nowadays. The President wills it, the press of the country praises it. Enact it; rest assured that when you do you have established autocracy in this country greater than that you have started out to demolish across the seas. When people say that it is Prussian militarism that they are fighting to uproot and destroy, let them pause and ask themselves if they have not established a worse militarism on American soil.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND) in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do.

Mr. WATSON. I simply want to offer an amendment to the pending bill to have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I voted for the resolution declaring that a state of war existed between the United States of America and the Imperial Government of Germany. Every dictate of justice and humanity, every consideration of my country's honor and safety impelled me to that action and inspires me now to full support of the present bill authorizing the selection of an adequate army to carry out the pledge contained in that resolution.

It is needless at this late day to state the causes which led to that declaration. When the Lusitania, on a lawful journey, peacefully proceeding on the high seas, with her precious cargo of human souls, was destroyed by an assassin's bomb launched by command of the Kaiser, a declaration of war against the United States, yea, a declaration of war against modern civilization, went forth from that imperial, brutal, inhuman command. The wandering graves of these innocent American mothers and their babies cry out to heaven against the deep damnation of their taking off. We should have accepted that challenge then. The enormity of that crime was such that doubts arose as to whether it was premeditated or was the result of some horrible misunderstanding of orders, or the willful, unauthorized act of a murderous assassin. The German Government has never to this day disclaimed responsibility. The patience of our people under such provocation is marvelous in the light of our own history. Other ships on lawful voyages, with American citizens aboard, without search and without warning, were sent to the bottom of the sea. In vain we protested, in the name of the law of nations, in the name of humanity and civilization, against this wanton murder of our people. The answer was the sinking of American ships flying the American flag.

When the marvelous patience of our President and his determination to keep the peace could no longer be indulged with honor to his country and the safety of its people, he sent his celebrated ultimatum to the Kaiser. The Imperial Government of Germany then solemnly promised she would desist from her inhuman submarine warfare and conduct her sea havoc under the rules of civilized warfare. This promise she soon violated as ruthlessly as she violated the treaty with Belgium, and drew a dead line around that part of the sea over which passed three-fourths of the world's ocean commerce. This line was drawn 600 miles from, yet all around, the English coast, and including nearly all the Mediterranean Sea, thus closing to our trade nearly every port with which we did a great or a profitable business, and sunk, without shame, every peaceful vessel that came within the prohibited zone. In this his assumed partnership with God Almighty found expression: "The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein. For He hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods."

Through that zone within one year $5,000,000,000 of the products of American farm and mine and factory had sailed. The order was tantamount to an edict declaring a blockade against every American port. It meant disaster to every enterprise in the United States. It meant closing our factories and putting honest labor everywhere on the tramp in vain search of work. To bear this insult longer was impossible. To submit to further national degradation was unthinkable. To protect the lives of our people on the sea and the property of our people at home no course was left open, with the decency and honor of our Nation preserved, except to declare the fact that Germany had made war upon us and proceed at once to proper and adequate preparation for the conflict. To that end Congress in one act appropriated seven thousand millions of dollars. The sum astounds the human understanding, yet there was not one vote in either House of Congress on the roll call cast against that measure. This was a true manifestation of the American spirit. I was thrilled as I heard every Member of this body answer "aye" when his name was called.

Mr. President, in this hurried review I have not taken the time to refer to the conspiracies hatched and the crimes committed by aliens on our soil against nations with whom we are at peace. I have not referred fully to those acts of the German Government in striving to win a war of her own making by means that barbarians would hesitate to use—holding in supreme contempt always the rights of all neutral nations. Nor will I now go into detail. The court records show the hideous crimes of Von Papen and Boy-Ed, or at least their guilty knowledge of the crimes committed while acting here as military and naval attachés of the German Government. Agents have been sent here with unlimited money to employ murderers to blow up our factories. Many explosions have occurred; many lives have been lost. Innocent laboring people, by daily toil providing for their needy families, have been sent unshriven to their graves. The inhuman scheme was devised of making chemical fire bombs and infernal machines to be placed on board ships leaving our harbors carrying passengers and supplies, with the deliberate purpose of sinking or by fire destroying them in mid-ocean, utterly regardless of the lives on board. Murder followed murder on the high seas, and at last we had notice that if we did not do as the Imperial German Government dictated that murder on a more colossal scale would result. They carried out that threat. Having thus heaped insult on insult; having blockaded our ports by sinking all vessels leaving them, even those bearing our flag, provided the line of their wide death zone on the high seas should be crossed; and having, by intercepted letters, been found enticing Mexico and Japan to declare war on the United States, what course was our independent and peace-loving Nation forced to take? War with all its horrors, its pain, and its sacrifice were far more agreeable. It was an absolute necessity. War was declared.

Mr. President, what I have so far said is only preliminary to a short discussion of the bill now under consideration, the purpose of which is to raise properly an adequate army to meet the present emergency.

I sometimes fear that our great country has lain so long in the lap of luxury and peace that it has nursed to sleep that virile, proud, militant patriotism which from the dawn of our history has been our glory and pride, our anchor and shield. Can we awaken that spirit by any call less than the thunder of guns at our gates? Must blood be spilt on our own soil by alien armies before we shake off this apathy? Must U boats destroy shipping in our own harbors, set fire to our cities, kill our women and children, even as such murders were done in Belgium, before we shall arouse ourselves to the duty we owe our country? Such will happen if we do not stop it. Our people have not been aroused to a just sense of the danger before us should Germany win this war. But for our own enforced entrance into it, the victory was by no means certain. Conditions in Russia are not satisfactory. Her collapse, should it come, will call on every energy of our people to secure the peace of the world against a monarchy that claims partnership with God Almighty in dispensing His burdens and favors among the nations of the earth. The world can have no peace until every pretension of Hohenzollern military rule shall have been swept from the experience of mankind. Nothing better could happen to the people of Germany than the utter destruction of the ambitious power that rules it. For the people of Germany Americans have only the kindest feelings; for the criminal Government of Germany we have nothing but utter loathing and unspeakable contempt.

Mr. President, we are in the war and must acquit ourselves as becomes the purpose and the history of our country. To do it, we must have an army and a navy. How are we to raise either? As I am no expert in military affairs, I must depend in a large measure on the advice of those who are trained to know, and almost entirely on such advice, except where I see it endangers or, in my judgment, may endanger the free institutions of my country in time of peace. I thank God I am no pessimist, I see the bright side of things. I have no doubt of the everlasting freedom of the citizen on our soil and under our institutions. I am not one so sensitive of the Constitution—while revering it as the paladium of our liberty—as to permit my countrymen to be murdered by foreign governmental edict and hesitate to resent the infamy on fear if I leave home to do it I may violate that sacred instrument. It never carried in it, by word or purpose, the repeal of the law of self-defense. Hence I have no sympathy and less patience with the quibble as to our right to send soldiers to any country in vindication of American honor and defense of American lives.

We must raise an army. This is no time to howl even for selfish or political effect. Our country calls for the best that is in us. Let us forget ourselves for the time and surrender all we have to a true and unselfish devotion to the great general good of our country. Why do we stand here and declaim about how an army should be raised? Every male citizen by law of the land able to bear arms and being between the ages of 18 and 45 years is a part of the army of the United States, whenever the country's necessity demands his service. Say there are 12,000,000 falling within the rule. The country demands 2,000,000. Suppose 6,000,000 should offer to volunteer? I can shed as many tears over the brave boy who was not permitted to serve—and just as sincere tears—as I find running down these aisles from about the form of the orator as he tells the awful hardship of forcing a strong, young, unhampered, healthy American boy into the service of his country at the time of his country's need. This is no time for such tears. How are we to get the army? My answer is that the only just, democratic, equalizing way of raising it is under the provisions of the pending bill. It would be unjust and cruel to call for volunteers and accept all those who came forward. I do not affirm, nor do I believe, that the first who offer are any more patriotic than many who do not come forward and join the Army at once. Temperament and one's own judgment as to whether the country needs him at this time will weigh heavily in his determination of his individual action. It is no test of patriotism in present circumstances, as much as a test of one's own particular idea of the necessity of his volunteering when he knows little of his country's peril.

Every man owes duty, allegiance, and service to his country. Each should be selected for the service he must perform. There is no means of raising, equipping, and sustaining a great army except in obedience to this rule of efficiency. There is no odium that can possibly attach to any citizen of this country by reason of his selection under this bill to serve in the capacity of a soldier.

The word "conscript" does not appear in the whole text. I am sorry that the word "draft" is used. It prejudices the case needlessly. Why does not the word "selective" appear instead of "draft"? That is the real intent and effect of this measure. We are selecting from the millions of our citizens a certain number to bear arms. We are excluding all those whose service in other fields would be more beneficial to our country in time of war. Honor should attend this selection for military service rather than the odium inseparably connected in the public mind with the word "draft." The democracy of the plan appeals. There can be no shirking. The millionaire's son can buy no substitute. He must serve beside the son of his butler or his bootblack on equal terms, and sleep, it may be, in the same tent. What a lesson this for our contemplation as citizens of a self-governed country, and for a restoration of that equality before the law which we have so loudly boasted and so silently ignored. One amazing feature of this debate displayed by the opponents of this bill is that they see, or seem to see, or pretend to see, some sort of relation to or a parallel with the volunteer soldier of our past armies with the requirement of a soldier in modern warfare. Is it not astonishing? We have in all our history fought no war of any moment with volunteers alone. And who, I ask, were we fighting?

I would not if I could take one leaf from the wreath that for days has been woven about the brows of the volunteer soldiers of this Republic. But that man is reduced to desperation who would cite Braddock's British soldiers fighting ambushed Indians and saved by volunteers in America, who knew the Indian and his mode of warfare, to sustain his opposition to this bill. Does not the red glare of battle along the lines in Europe, reenforced by every war device of modern times, the hand grenade, the poisoned gases, the machine guns sweeping the opposing field with streams of leaden death, before which a stalk of wheat would not be left standing in 10 acres, show these desperate debaters that the world moves and that we must adjust ourselves to present conditions? One would think from what I have heard on this floor that all we needed to win this war was to get some volunteers with smoothbore flint-lock guns and storm the German trenches, even as we stormed Stony Point and climbed to victory up the rugged sides of Chapultepec.

Yet we are, in effect, told—provided the soldiers are volunteers—that all we have to do is to give them a good drill at Valley Forge and see that their feet are bleeding freely and let the blood freeze quickly and turn them loose with smooth-bore guns of 200 yards' capacity and the German line will give way before this valorous onslaught of American volunteers.

Senators, we are at war with the greatest military power on earth. Let us acquit ourselves like men worthy of our sires, who founded this matchless Republic and preserved it through all these years at any cost of blood or treasure that its necessity demanded. In order to do this we must raise the most efficient army possible, and raise it in the justest and fairest and most democratic way possible. I think it can be done under the provisions of this bill. I know it can not be done under the old unequal and unjust volunteer system. This bill simply provides for a proper selection of those men between certain ages best fitted for war service, all of whom are by law already a part of our military force. Exemptions are made of those on whom the support of a family rests, as well as those engaged in certain callings where their services at home would better serve the great common welfare than enlistment in the Army. The patriotic duty is the same and equally necessary in any field selected for service. Modern wars are not won by armies alone, as the recent history of Europe shows. No man has a right to shirk any duty to his country. England had to send back to industrial pursuits thousands on thousands of her brave soldiers to supply in the factories and shops from which they came the requirements of their brothers in the battle line. So will it be with us if we do not make proper selection in the start. The modern experience of the world has discarded the volunteer system. Every man who fought under Lee at Gettysburg was in fact a conscript, and almost to a man a willing conscript. Every soldier of the Confederacy—than which no braver army ever faced a battle in all the history of the world—was in effect a conscript.

The act of April, 1862, of the Confederate Congress forced all able men of certain age into the service and kept all then in service, no matter what the term of enlistment had been. Every soldier in the German Army is in this sense a conscript. True also is it of France. A moral, if not a legal, conscript accounts for the army of Great Britain. Has the world ever seen such soldiers? It has surely seen no better. A man selected by his country for military service is not a conscript in the offensive sense attached to that word. He is, or should consider himself as, receiving a decoration of honor.

Dependence on the voluntary system is the most costly, dangerous, and inexcusable blunder possible to commit on our entrance into this mighty struggle.

If there were any evidence in history, any array of expert knowledge, or any plausible arguments, to justify reliance for the national defense in this titanic conflict upon the false, feeble, and futile principle of volunteer military service, there might be some excuse for this debate. But the whole record of the United States condemns the inefficiency of the system, while the entire experience of the present war proves it an infallible factor of defeat. Those of its advocates here indulge the incredible delusion that this is a struggle of armies, and that we need do nothing more than to gather a huge force of brave soldiers. On the contrary, this is a conflict of nations, of resources, of skill and determination in utilizing economic power as well as military strength. Then perforce proper selection must be made to fill the Army and keep those other equally necessary arms of the service—the factory, the field, and the mine—in efficient and full operation.

Mr. President, no man willing to serve his country has any fear of this bill. Any able-bodied man unwilling to serve his country has no claim on our consideration or on his country's protection. I feel assured that the State units will not be broken up after enrollment of the men. The soldier will fight beside his neighbor, and they will proudly bear together any hardship or danger at their country's demand. Our proud old flag that has never yet been furled in the face of an enemy on land or sea will wave over as brave and patriotic men called to the colors under this bill as ever defended it on any field of its glory.

Senators, we are in a war which, in my judgment, will try out our men and our resources. This is no time to play for popularity or appeal to prejudice when our country's fortune and honor are at stake. Our business is to preserve both at all hazard. To stop the shedding of blood we must raise and equip a great army. If we wish to bring peace nearer we must pass this bill and prove to the Hohenzollern and Hapsburg dynasty that they must meet the full power of American brains, wealth, energy, and courage if this war shall be prolonged. The swiftest possible preparation on the largest scale is the best contribution America can make to the cause of peace. Delay in this endangers victory and prolongs the awful war. Action, great, potent, virile action, is the need of the hour. Let us stimulate it rather than smother it by unnecessary dissensions in this forum. Let me, in conclusion, quote the last words of the war message of the President:

"But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free. To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace which she has treasured. God helping her, she can do no other."

KENNETH E. SCHWINN.

Mr. STERLING obtained the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me just for a moment? I desire to ask unanimous consent for the confirmation of the nomination of a young man who came up from the enlisted ranks and who has received a probationary appointment as a second lieutenant in the Marine Corps.

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. SWANSON. I merely want to make a statement, and then I will ask unanimous consent.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator——

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator will allow me to make a statement. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has yielded to me. A young man who had previously enlisted in the Navy stood the examination for appointment as a commissioned officer of the Marine Corps and received a probationary appointment for two years. On Sunday he will reach the age of 25. If his appointment is not confirmed and the commission is not issued to him by to-morrow midday, he can not secure his commission, and it will be utterly impossible for him to secure a commission thereafter. I simply desire to ask unanimous consent that the pending bill may be temporarily laid aside, and that, as in executive session, the appointment of this young man may be confirmed and the President notified.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am sorry, but I will have to object to that, because I made a promise to a number of Senators who have been compelled to leave the Chamber, and I would violate that promise if I should allow any business to be transacted. They asked me if anything except the pending measure was coming up, and I told them that I would object to any business being transacted.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator whether he thinks the Senators to whom he refers would object to the action which the Senator from Virginia seeks to have taken? The president of the University of California and the mayor of Berkeley, Cal., are interested in this young man, and they have sent a request to me concerning the matter. I presume the Senator from Virginia refers to Kenneth E. Schwinn.

Mr. SWANSON. That is the name of the young man.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment further, I desire to say that if the nomination of this young man is not confirmed—and it is the desire, I think, of all connected with the administration that he should be—he will reach the age on Sunday when the appointment will be void. That is the reason that the necessity presents itself at this time for immediate action. I hope it will be possible for the Senator to withdraw his objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, could the nomination not be confirmed to-morrow morning?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I will be satisfied if that will insure the confirmation in ample time, so that the young man will receive his commission.

Mr. SWANSON. I think that at 12 o'clock to-morrow his commission will be void. Of course if any Senator objects he has it in his power to prevent action at this time.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like to have the action taken the Senator desires, but as he knows under the unanimous-consent agreement we can not comply with his request without calling for a larger attendance of the Senate and getting another unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SWANSON. No; I think the Senator is mistaken as to that. If the Senator will permit me, I have read the unanimous-consent agreement, and I do not think the action which I have suggested would violate its terms. This matter has been brought to our attention by the Secretary of the Navy, and it has the approval of the President. It is different from other cases, because this probationary officer was an enlisted man. If he can receive his commission, of course, he will enter upon his life work. It seems to me it would work a great hardship if this young man should be denied, under the peculiar circumstances, the opportunity of securing his commission.

Mr. WARREN. We have had exactly the same condition to contend with heretofore. It is regrettable that the department do not get such matters to us in time; but heretofore such situations have been cured, as I believe this can be easily cured, by simply enacting a joint resolution—which I am sure can readily be done—waiving the age limit in the case of the young man referred to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if this matter can not be attended to to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know. The President has to be notified after the nomination is confirmed, and the commission has got to be issued.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I feel in duty bound to insist on my objection under my promise to several Senators that I would object to taking up any business without their consent. I have no objection in the world to the young man, but I feel under the promise I have made that I must object.

Mr. SWANSON. I hardly think any Senator had in mind objecting to business of this character, and I would not bring the matter before the Senate if it would interfere with the unfinished business or with the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will state that a Senator asked me if there would be any business in open or executive session, and I told him I did not know of anything. He did not want any business transacted during his absence.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May I inquire of the Senator from Oregon if it would be possible to accomplish the result by taking the matter up at 10 o'clock in the morning?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely; and I promise to do all I can to assist.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The memorandum that has been given to me indicates that that might be done. Secretary Tumulty says that the nomination must be approved by the Senate to-day or to-morrow. Mr. Schwinn becomes 25 years of age on Sunday, and thereby will pass beyond the age limit and his appointment will be void.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I can not conceive in my heart how any Senator can object to the consideration of this matter, which is so urgent. Here is a young man who has an opportunity to become an officer, and because of his years the action must be taken now. He wants to serve his country. I do not believe that any of the Senators who have gone away relying, as they had a right to rely, upon the assurance of the Senator from Oregon, would object under the circumstances to the consideration of this particular request. It appeals to me so much that I earnestly hope we may be permitted to confirm the nomination of this young man, to the end that he may secure the desired promotion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I think this matter can be arranged under the unanimous-consent agreement, if the Senator will permit me. I was here, of course, when the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into, and I think under its terms, with the assent of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], the whole matter can be arranged. If the Senator from South Dakota will simply state that he does not desire to address the Senate for two minutes, and no other Senator expresses a desire to address the Senate during those two minutes, the matter can be acted upon. I call the attention of Senators to the final clause of the unanimous-consent agreement, which reads:

> If any Senator announces his intention to speak upon the bill or any amendment thereto, no motion to take a recess, to adjourn, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, or to proceed to the consideration of any other business shall be entertained by the Chair.

I feel very sure that under the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement if the Senator from South Dakota announces that he does not care to proceed for two or three minutes we can attend to this business.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should feel like yielding to the judgment of the Senator from Oregon in regard to that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I dislike very much to be placed in the position of delaying this matter, but I have never violated a promise I have made to any Member of this body or to anybody else, and I would feel that I had violated my promise if I did not keep it in letter as well as in spirit.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from Colorado would not do it, either.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator permit me to say that I sympathize fully with his feeling; but I have a suggestion to make, that when we finally recess to-night, before the motion to recess is put, we take up the nomination of this young man and confirm it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But this matter can be attended to to-morrow morning just as well, and I will do anything I can to assist it in the morning.

Mr. SWANSON. Well, Mr. President, I am going to submit the request. I think the matter can be attended to without interfering at all with the unanimous-consent agreement. Then, if consent is granted and the nomination is confirmed, if any Senator should object later, the matter may be reconsidered to-morrow. I simply ask unanimous consent that the nomination may be considered as confirmed, but that the notice may not go to the President until to-morrow. That will give opportunity for any objection to be made to-morrow if any Senator should desire to object. Of course, if the nomination is not acted upon by to-morrow morning, it will be too late. I ask unanimous consent that the action I have suggested may be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator in insisting on that course treats me with fairness.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator must take his own responsibility. If he objects, the objection is his own. I will take my responsibility as to this matter, regardless of any foolish agreement which may have been entered into by the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator has his own conscience and his own responsibility.

Mr. SWANSON. I have; and I am acting under them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have mine; and I am not going to permit myself to violate a promise, no matter what happens here to-night. I am in sympathy with the proposition; I think what has been requested ought to be done; and if it could be done without violating a promise, I would not object. It can be done to-morrow, and, as I have said, I will do anything at that time I can to help along the matter.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I do not know that at this stage of the discussion I can say anything new, for the ground has already been pretty thoroughly covered, and it would seem that all the arguments pro and con of which the question is capable have been gone over; but I have some convictions in regard to the principle involved in this bill, and deem it in a way a duty to express them.

I can not share in the dread misgivings of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] in regard to the effect of selective conscription. I do not for a moment believe that it is antagonistic to our free institutions, nor to our democracy; but I admit at the outstart, Mr. President, that the word "conscription" has not always been pleasing to the American ear. Its almost invariable use has been in connection with Army service, and as there applied it means enforced service. The prevailing belief has been that a conscriptive military service is opposed to the spirit of democracy; that it would not be tolerable as a regular system, and was justifiable only as a last resort and when more men were needed than would volunteer to meet the necessities of the Nation in arms.

The shortcomings of the volunteer system have again and again been emphasized by military experts and those charged with the responsibility of conducting a campaign or a war to a successful conclusion, but with little or no avail. The general aversion to enforced service, together with many really great achievements of our Volunteer Armies, has hitherto meant a feeling approaching a conviction among the American people adverse to the creation of an army in the first instance by draft. It has been assumed that patriotism would always respond to the call to service; that a million men could be raised overnight to repel an army of invasion the next day; that out of the shops and stores and out of the soil, as it were, would spring ready for efficient service all the men needed on the instant for the defense of the Republic.

Plain common sense would have apparently dictated otherwise; that instead of men so trained and equipped being led to successful battle they would more likely be led to needless slaughter. If perchance through numbers or valor, or both, they won at all in those first sanguinary struggles, it would be at such cost in dead and wounded as to make it a victory too dearly won, and the Nation would have mourned the sacrifice of its bravest and best.

And yet that was just the way to do it, according to the opinions of men in every stage, walk, and condition in life, as shown by the letters of a couple of farmers, for example, who, in their zeal against preparedness and universal military training, were a little while ago ready to pledge the services of their two to five sons for any instant war need. And such, as I remember it, was in substance the pronouncement of that prince of pacifists, our late distinguished Secretary of State, not so very long ago.

Nor do I, Mr. President, absolve myself entirely from having shared in this sentiment. The volunteer armies of the United States have been made up of the very best talent and best blood of the Nation, and out of their experiences in these armies have been developed some of our ablest leaders both in military and civil life. Far be it from me to utter one word in detraction from the patriotism, the intelligence, or the glorious service rendered by our volunteer armies throughout our history from the days of Concord and Lexington down to San Juan.

But, Mr. President, I perceive now that we are confronted with new conditions, altogether different from anything this Nation has ever before experienced. Instead of battle upon American soil, our troops are more likely to be sent to foreign fields. Instead of a superior volunteer force led by commanders familiar with every foot of soil they traversed and capable of the infinite harassment of a trained but inferior force in point of numbers, as in the Revolution, we shall send our troops abroad to confront the greatest fighting machine in Europe on practically its own soil, on ground of its own choosing. We shall send them to hold the trenches to-day, to take the trenches to-morrow, while the artillery and machine guns on the ground below and the aeroplanes above work a devastation unfamiliar to the American soldier and without parallel in the history of warfare.

It behooves us therefore to have a care, to consider well the selection, the training, and equipment of the men we shall designate for such service.

In the war resolution adopted by such overwhelming vote a few days ago we pledged the Nation's resources to the conduct of the war to a successful termination. In furtherance of that pledge both Houses, without a dissenting voice, voted the enormous sum of $7,000,000,000 in aid of the allies and to finance our own preparations and part in the war. We have now come to the third step, and that involves the human element. We are to raise and equip an army of a million men, with a view to sending some hundreds of thousands of them abroad for the kind of work and the scenes and sounds I have described. How shall it be done? By permitting a rush pell mell of all the noble and the daring but undisciplined flower of our youth into the service at first call, without regard to other national needs or without regard to the good soldier stuff in the slacker left behind? Or shall our program be one of selection, whereunder all interests, all citizens, shall contribute their just share, and where they, in the interests of the general welfare and for the public good, shall not be allowed to contribute more. But, as I say, here in the raising of men is the human element. In relation to that we are charged with even a graver responsibility than in the pledge of the merely material resources of the Nation. To a large extent the issues of life or death are in our hands.

In addressing ourselves to this great task all sentiments of pride in what American volunteer armies have at last achieved on American soil, all fond traditions of the military prowess of the past must yield to the practical exigencies and demands of the hour. The question which should dominate all others should be not what men in their patriotism and enthusiasm would freely do and freely give, but how shall we pick them and drill them and thus attain the maximum of effectiveness, of achievement with the minimum of waste and sacrifice.

And who shall decide this fundamental question? The movements and operations of men in the field constitute but one phase of the question. Shall the achievements of volunteer armies in our various wars be our only guide? As to that let us not be deceived by the final successes of the American arms in either the War of the Revolution or that of 1812 or by the final success of the Union cause in the Civil War, in each of which conditions were altogether different from what our forces will find them in France, Belgium, or perhaps on the soil of Germany. In the Revolution England suffered first from a lack of competent generals. Again, the discipline, tactics, and equipment of the British forces, their adherence to the close-order system in battle were not suited to the irregular warfare to which they were subjected in a country where they found it impossible to employ troops in large masses. Washington's army suffered from defections due to the loose and uncertain volunteer system of the day. The Commander in Chief could not for any length of time reckon with certainty upon the number of troops he might have for campaign or battle. Out of this, of course, demoralization; out of this a prolonged and desultory war. But he could have his shifting bases of supplies and all the disadvantages under which Washington fought were more than offset by the difficulties under which the British labored with their unadaptable methods learned in Europe and with their base of supplies limited to one, and that the ocean.

Other things, including devotion to the cause, being equal it is easy to surmise the better results, the speedier termination of the war which might have followed from an enforced service for a definite period with the more rigid discipline and better order such a course would have implied. It is little short of the absurd to attribute the success of the Revolution to superiority of the volunteer system over the conscriptive system of enrollment in the service.

The many blunders of the War of 1812, as it was carried on on land, the defects of the militia system, the failure to fill the ranks or increase the Army to required strength under the call for volunteers were in part atoned for by the victory at New Orleans, fought after the treaty of Ghent had been signed. But the 6,000 Americans there were under a sagacious and intrepid leader. They were well entrenched. They were frontiersmen, skilled in marksmanship, who thought nothing of bringing down a squirrel from the top of the tallest tree. They were, as stated by Fiske, the descendants of the men who overwhelmed Ferguson at Kings Mountain, the sires of the men who came near vanquishing Grant at Shiloh.

Barring this one notable success, however, the land operations of the War of 1812 were nothing to be proud of and many were dismal failures.

And then, Mr. President, there is the War of the Rebellion. The history of that war contains its record of disasters due to untrained volunteers. Let the Battle of Bull Run, so disastrous for the North, speak; let the ineffectiveness of the volunteer system as it pertained to both sides during that fearful struggle tell how it was that within about a year after the breaking out of the Civil War the Confederacy was compelled to resort to conscription, and how in a year and a half after Sumter the North was compelled also to resort to that method of recruiting its armies. Each side was of course fighting in a cause it believed to be the most glorious ever fought for in the world, and yet early in the struggle the volunteer system had broken down or failed to furnish the volunteer enlistments to carry on the war on either side.

But, Mr. President, to whom shall we look for a guide, experiences in other wars on American soil failing us as guides? Much as I respect the opinions of Senators in regard to which is the better system of the two—the volunteer or the draft system—I am inclined to take as my guide the opinions of military experts, the opinions of the General Staff, of the War College, rather than the opinions of Senators whose only service to their country has been in their membership in one or the other or both Houses of Congress. I call attention to a few of these, apart from the opinions of the General Staff, whose bill this is supposed to be. I hold in my hand what is termed an Epitome of Upton's Military Policy of the United States. I think it is considered a great authority. He draws some lessons from the Revolutionary War. He summarizes them here. One is that when a nation attempts to combat disciplined troops with raw levies it must maintain an army of twice the size of that of the enemy, and even then will have no guaranty of success. Another principle laid down is that neither voluntary enlistments based on patriotism nor bounty can be relied upon to supply men for the army during a prolonged war; and another that the draft, connected or not connected with volunteer enlistments and bounties, is the only sure reliance of a government in time of war.

Again, that Regular troops engaged for the war are the only safe reliance of a government and are in every point of view the best and most economical.

I have another authority here which, I think, is worth considering. I hold in my hand a book entitled "West Point in Our Next War; the Only Way to Create and to Maintain an Army," by Gen. Maxwell Van Zandt Woodhull. He has a chapter devoted to conscription. I read two or three excerpts from that chapter. He says:

> The element of training must be considered in the discussion of volunteer armies. One of the chief lessons of the War of the Rebellion is that it takes a year to create a dependable army.

In that connection the inquiry at once arises as to when, within what time, will we have a volunteer army which will get the one year's training in order to make of it an effective army under the volunteer system.

I do not mean to say—

He says:

> that men gathered together in regiments and brigades almost directly from their homes have not made a gallant fight when thrust into battle. But, notwithstanding their gallantry and their success, they were not soldiers; they had not developed that coherency of organization, that calmness under relentless fire, that readiness to obey intelligently any order given to them; in a word, they had not developed morale, which is the soul of soldiers and which makes them almost as dangerous in defeat as in victory.

Further, he says, speaking of conscription:

> Conscription is the most democratic, the fairest, the most equal, and the only logical method of raising and maintaining modern armies. Our experience and the experience of England with the voluntary system of recruitment of armies bears out this statement conclusively.

This book was written in 1915. It does not cover all the experiences of England, nor does it give the expressions of opinion recently made by distinguished Englishmen, and which we have all read or heard.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STERLING. I do.

Mr. BORAH. That book is speaking of conscription which includes every man who is available for military service.

Mr. STERLING. Not necessarily.

Mr. BORAH. That is what the book speaks of; that is the principle upon which he is proceeding. He indorses there the conscript system of France which is based upon that proposition.

Mr. STERLING. That may be, Mr. President, and yet the same statement exactly made here with reference to conscription systems generally will apply particularly to the principle of selective conscription.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think that that would apply to a bill which takes a boy of 19 or 20 and leaves out the man of 26 or 27?

Mr. STERLING. I do. It is democratic.

Mr. BORAH. Is it democratic to put upon a boy of 19 or 20 the service for his country and to exempt a man who is physically fit and capable and happens to be 26?

Mr. STERLING. I think it is, Mr. President. Other things must be taken into consideration with reference to the ages between which selection will be made under a selective conscription bill. All within the age limits, the minimum and maximum ages, are treated in the same way. It is not with reference to age that the democratic principle is involved. It is with reference to class, condition, and occupation in life; and under the selective conscription feature it does apply, of course, within those particular ages to all classes, conditions of life. The rich and the poor, the educated and the uneducated are alike within those ages subject to conscription.

It further says:

> It is not only the best way of maintaining an army in time of war, through a steady stream of recruits passing from the great central depots to the colors, but it is the only, absolutely the only, way to create and to maintain an army in time of peace, ready to take the field the moment war shall break out.

I admit that that is speaking of conscription generally and not selective conscription there. But, as I contend, Mr. President, the same principle applies.

> Conscription is the only method of creating and maintaining an army at all times ready for war, because it is the only method which recognizes the element of time.

And—

> Conscription draws more equally and more evenly upon the manhood of the nation than the system of voluntary enlistment.

Conscription, Mr. President, will take and compel to serve what the volunteer system never would, and that is the slacker, the man who is without public spirit, who will not respond to his country's call, to whom the spirit of patriotism makes no appeal.

Here is one class of men described who would fall under the provisions of a conscription act. It is related of a certain New York lawyer that he made this declaration and he is so quoted in a New York newspaper:

> I think Germany's submarine policy is absolutely justified. I think Germany has a right to sink every vessel, neutral or otherwise, which carries ammunition to the allies. If the vessel carries neutral noncombatants, not without warning, of course; but after the warning, blow them to hell, every damn ship of them.
> International law, bosh! Who gives a rap about international law? Germany doesn't. Germany is making international law.

The man who made those unfaithful, disloyal, and unpatriotic utterances would, if of proper age, be subject to conscription; and if he did not serve, having been drafted, he might have to take the military consequences.

Mr. President, I said that the word conscription is not a pleasing one to the American ear, or has not been in the past, but I know something of the change of sentiment in regard to some of the things we have been considering here during the last few months. I have seen if not a revolution a very rapid evolution in the public sentiment, especially of my own State, and I think the same thing pertains to a great part of the great new Central West. The term "military preparedness," as it meant extensive additions to Army and Navy equipment, was not very long ago a term almost equally as obnoxious, especially to the people of the great interior, as the term conscription has ever been. There was the admonition, "go slow on preparedness," and we were advised by high authority not to be hysterical in regard to preparedness less than two years ago.

But what is the present sentiment? The provisions of the Army reorganization bill and the great naval bill had not been enacted until there was universal acceptance, and no complaint from any source throughout the length and the breadth of the land that Congress had done too much in those two great bills for the national defense.

Then there was universal military training. Nine months ago it was suffering like opposition to that which military preparedness had suffered earlier. It was discussed at the time of the national conventions last June, but neither party, although discussed with that end in view, dared to put a plank in the platform favoring universal military training.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think that either party will put a plank in the platform indorsing conscription in the next national convention?

Mr. STERLING. Indorsing conscription? By the time of the next national conventions I shall not be surprised if such a plank will be indorsed by either or both parties.

Mr. BORAH. I hope one party will indorse it.

Mr. STERLING. I think the Senator knows something about the growth of sentiment in favor of conscription, and I do not see why he has any ground to express surprise that one or both of the great conventions of 1920 should favor conscription as a means of raising armies.

I say universal military training was discussed, but neither party dared to declare for the adoption of a platform embodying the proposition. But where is the opposition to universal military training now? My estimate of it is this, that aside from the war measure already passed no measure considered at this great session of Congress will meet with greater popular approval than Senate bill 1, the bill providing for universal military training.

I might ask the Senator from Idaho what the sentiment was a year ago or two years ago in his own State in regard to universal military training. It could not have been much different from what it was in another great interior State—my own, for example—or than it was in Montana or Utah. But what is it now? And so it has been, first in regard to preparedness, next in regard to universal military training; and now we witness a like change or growth in sentiment in regard to conscription. I have wondered the Senators have not read some of the things from home in regard to it.

Mr. BORAH. I have read them all.

Mr. STERLING. It may be that you have, but you have not put them in the RECORD.

Mr. BORAH. No; I will not put them in the RECORD. I could not put them all in the RECORD.

Mr. STERLING. I want to read a few. I understood the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to express the opinion that conscription was unpopular in his State. From what I know and believe I know in regard to the sentiment in my own State, I am at a loss to conceive why in the neighboring State of Iowa the sentiment is at this time against the provisions of this bill providing selective conscription. They might desire to see it modified in some respects. I will say frankly I will not object to seeing it modified with reference to the age and seeing the minimum age 21 and the maximum age 30 or 35. I will vote for an amendment which would so provide. But here is a telegram from the city of Yankton, S. Dak.—the commercial association there:

Hon. THOMAS STERLING,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned citizens of Yankton, feeling that the proper support of the President in the prosecution of the war against Germany demands the use of conscription to raise a proper military establishment, do respectfully petition and request you to cast your ballot in favor of universal selective military service.

Here is one from one of the schools. It is addressed to the South Dakota congressional delegation, in my care:

BROOKINGS, S. DAK., April 25, 1917.

Fifty-six members of faculty and large number students of South Dakota State College sign petition urging Congress to adopt the plan of selective conscription in preference to the volunteer system. Copies follow by mail.

G. L. BROWN, Dean.

Here is another signed by 9 citizens of the town of Beresford and 50 others:

BERESFORD, S. DAK., April 22, 1917.

Senator THOMAS STERLING or SOUTH DAKOTA REPRESENTATIVES.
Washington, D. C.:

We believe that the selective-draft bill now pending is the best remedy at this time of war, as volunteering does not seem to meet the demands. We believe that the passage of this measure will meet with the approval of most of your constituents.

These come from all walks of life—merchants, professional men, farmers. Then another—

Please support the President's conscription bill.

I read this from a letter received from a gentleman living in the largest town in our State—the town of Sioux Falls—a man who has lived there a great many years and is one of the members of one of the most prominent law firms. Among other things, he says:

I have taken pains to talk with a goodly number of people, women as well as men, on this question, and much to my surprise, as well as gratification, I am able to say that I have as yet found no one who favors the volunteer system as against the conscription or draft system, and there seems to be a general feeling that the plan proposed by the General Staff of the Army is the right plan to adopt, and that it should be taken by Congress practically without any change.

I read another, which, while a little strong in some of its expressions, yet voices the sentiments of the writer in favor of the principle of selective conscription. He says:

When citizens become patriotic enough to volunteer to pay their just share of taxes, when people arrive at the point of volunteering to pay their rents, store bills, and in fact all other things that are required now, then it will be safe and businesslike to depend on defending our country in this day and age by the old-fashioned volunteer army.

Our good President—and I voted for Hughes—is right when he says the Government is the best judge of whom shall fight and whom shall serve best by staying in field, shop, and factory.

That writer states the principle involved in the selective conscription bill before us. Who is best qualified and who can best be spared to serve in the Army? Who is most needed to serve his country at home on the farm, or in the shop, or in the laboratory? That is what is meant by selective conscription.

Mr. President, the one important thing to be remembered throughout all this discussion is that now, of all other times, is the time when great industries need the best men, and their services in those industries will be the best service they can render the Nation. Loyalty, patriotism, and the welfare of the Nation would dictate that such men should remain in that service, while others can be spared for active service in the field. Here is an extract from another letter:

Universal military training in times of peace and universal (selective) military service in times of necessity surely is the only fair and effective way for this Nation to protect itself now and in the future from the selfish desires of European and Asian Kings, Emperors, Kaisers.

That was from a gentleman out in Mitchell, S. Dak. Here is another from Watertown, S. Dak. Among other things the writer says:

I have read something in the papers to the effect that you have indorsed the principle of universal service—

I think what he means is not "universal service," but conscription. He has in mind the bill now before the Senate—

I believe that is a patriotic and broad-gauged view of the situation. I also think that the advocates of that system are gaining in strength and numbers out this way. Personally I hope that the General Staff Army bill, as approved by the President, will pass.

From another at Aberdeen—our second largest city—I read this:

The selective idea is, of course, all right, for many men would be of more value in the laboratory or in the field than behind the gun, and every man should be used where his ability will make him of the most value.

And in that expression he strikes at the very kernel of this system. He says further:

I do not believe, however, that any class in the country should be exempt from doing their part for the public service, and the sooner we can cut out this volunteer proposition and get down to a uniform service basis the sooner we will be in shape to hold our own.

That is from a gentleman who was for a long time an esteemed officer in the National Guard service—a major, I think; but at least the commander of a company—in South Dakota.

So, Mr. President, in addition to the experts, in addition to the General Staff, in addition to the army writers of history, in addition to the experience of England, as voiced by Gen. Bridges just a few days ago, and, I will further say, in addition even to the experience of Canada, we have now, I think, the consensus of opinion among the people of this country in favor of selective conscription.

Mr. President, as I have said, I do not share in the misgivings and fears expressed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. He talks as though it were depriving a man of his individual rights to compel him to enter the military service of the United States; as though a constitutional guaranty would be violated. What does that mean at bottom? That a man can deny his liabiliy to serve, notwithstanding the principle of universal liability to serve, and that he can say, "I will not volunteer to serve my country in time of war, and there exists no right to compel me to serve." Such is the principle, in the main, advanced and contended for by the Senator from Georgia—"I will serve if I please."

Mr. President, no army could be created or maintained under that principle. There is the principle of universal liability, and selective conscription follows as a logical consequence of that principle.

I was struck with a further statement made by the Senator from Georgia. Why, he said, the bravest and the best would go, of course, and those were the men who were needed; those were the men who won battles—the bravest and best who volunteered. That is true; but it has been true only after needless sacrifice of treasure and of life as well. It does not follow, Mr President, that because all the bravest and best are not permitted to enlist the Army will be made up of weak men, of vicious men, or of unpatriotic men; but the men physically and mentally fit, who are not the most patriotic, who are not of the bravest and best, but who owe a like duty to their country, will be compelled to perform it; and some of the bravest and the best will serve their country in the shop, in the laboratory, or on the farm, where, in this crisis, there is for them the greatest need.

Mr. President, instead of this being contrary to the principles of democracy and free institutions, I say it is an achievement, a triumph of democracy. It has been supposed that the test of a democracy often comes in its foreign relations, and especially when we are involved in war with a foreign nation. Why? Because under the governmental machinery of a democracy, under the spirit of a democracy, there can not be that prompt, that decisive action that is required and necessary in time of danger and stress like this. But when a democracy, under the principle of universal liability to military service, takes it in hand for the welfare of the country and the best welfare of all the interests of the country, to conscript by selection the men necessary to make an army, leaving others to peaceful pursuits necessary for the national welfare—when it can do that, it shows democracy triumphant, and its action is not for a moment antagonistic to a democracy or to any of its ideals.

I remember, Mr. President, some words of Mr. Bryce, and I conclude by calling attention to them. They are found in the introduction to his American Commonwealth. Speaking of the United States, he says:

> They represent an experiment in the rule of the multitude, tried on a scale unprecedentedly vast and the results of which everyone is concerned to watch; and yet they are something more than an experiment, for they are believed to disclose and display the type of institutions toward which, as by a law of fate, the rest of civilized mankind are forced to move, some with swifter, others with slower, but all with unresting feet.

I heartily believe in those words of Mr. Bryce. They seem to me to epitomize the fruits and the proofs of a century of democracy, and they are full of assurance for all. They all but deny that this great experiment in the rule of the multitude is a failure, and they import that the great Republic of the West has become the light of the world.

Mr. President, our place and our part in this war now, this revival of our interest and sympathy in the cause of freedom throughout the world, will further stimulate and accelerate the movement of peoples under other forms of government toward institutions like our own.

I can not help but allude to a statement made in a colloquy between the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. The question involved was when will we make peace; what will satisfy us; as if Germany might at some time propose terms of peace we would accept independently of those who are now our allies. I would respond in one way, as did the Senator from New York, that we will cross that bridge when we get to it.

Mr. President, we are in a war with the allies, and we are in it because their cause is our cause. It is the cause of civilization, of liberty, of humanity, and we are in it, not alone because of the national injury we have sustained, but because it is the cause of democracy, the cause of humanity, the cause of free institutions, and because we would rid ourselves and the world of a power, a spirit which if left to rule will be a menace to all the future. That is why we are in this war. And we shall not now enter upon any calculations as to when we would be willing to conclude terms of peace with Germany, the common enemy. We will cross that bridge when we get to it. We ourselves will have a part in the negotiations, and we will be able to advise and suggest as to what are proper and just and fair terms of peace; and our influence as the great Republic of the West will then and there be exercised on the side of justice to all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, when the bill now under discussion was placed before the Senate I undertook as best I could to make an analysis of it, and stated then that possibly I might have something to say a little later on. I had hoped, however, that it might not be necessary for me to enter into any general discussion of the bill at all; but so many things have been said which in my opinion do not accord with the true history of our military legislation that I feel it my duty, and I perform it reluctantly, to say something before the bill is finally submitted.

I know that we are not speaking to convince anybody here. The minds of all of us have long since been made up, and each knows exactly how he proposes to vote on each one of the amendments, as well as on the bill itself. But I feel that I ought to place my views in the RECORD, even if nobody is to be convinced by them, in order that the things which transpire here when this all-important piece of legislation is before the Senate may be before the country now and for all time, as well as before the Senators who honor me by their presence.

Mr. President, the principal question discussed here has been as to the relative merits of a proposed selective draft and the volunteer system. It has been insisted on the one hand that the volunteer system ought not to be abandoned; that to abandon it would be to violate one of the oldest traditions of this and other countries. The discussion, however, has assumed a broader scope, and it is being insisted, unjustly, as it seems to me, that the courage and the patriotism of the volunteers in the distant past and those of recent years have been called in question, and it has been insisted that those of us who advocate the drafting of men into the Army at this time are challenging the patriotism and courage of the men who have fought the battles of this country in the years gone by.

Mr. President, nobody challenges the courage or the patriotism of the volunteers in any of the wars of this country. The challenge has been directed by the advocates of the pending measure, rather to the system which has in the past made the volunteer the chief reliance of his country in time of war.

It is easy, Mr. President and Senators, as was done the other day, to indulge in oratorical flights on the valor of the volunteer and to challenge any Senator to publicly say that his State could not raise its quota of men under the volunteer system. It goes without saying, I believe, that any State in this Union could raise its quota now. But there comes a time, as there has come a time in nearly every war, not only in this country but in every other, when it has been necessary to apply the draft because the volunteer system has broken down.

Mr. President, it is very natural for our friends here who have never participated in any campaign and who do not lay claim to expert knowledge to speak of the volunteer system as the only proper one and as the one under which we have won all the wars of this Republic; but I am going to attempt to show, at the expense of wearying this already too tired Senate, that their opinions are at variance with those of some of our greatest military experts and leaders, men who have in emergency rendered conspicuous and gallant service on many a battle field.

I think it is safe to say that no one man's opinion as to the merits of the volunteer system is entitled to more weight and to more serious consideration than that of Gen. George Washington in our Revolutionary struggle. His was the dominating figure in that sanguinary and titanic war that brought success to our arms and achieved victory in the face of what seemed to be almost certain defeat.

Mr. President, I have sometimes wondered how that great and patriotic man ever found time to organize an army, much less to maintain one, or to fight the battles which finally resulted in wresting the colonies from the British yoke, because from the commencement of his memorable campaigns until the Revolution ended, in 1783, judging from the mass of correspondence that he was inditing to the Continental Congress and to others, he was spending much of his time in addressing a Congress and other officials deaf to his appeals, just as this Congress seems disposed to turn listless ears to our distinguished President now, when the very life of the Republic may be hanging in the balance.

Let me call attention to a few of the utterances of Washington, which appear to me to be pertinent to the discussion here today, and which do not accord with the statements of some of our friends who are declaiming upon the beauty as well as the efficiency of the volunteer system.

On February 9, 1776, he wrote:

> To expect the same service from raw and undisciplined recruits as from veteran soldiers is to expect what never did and perhaps never will happen.

And on December 20, 1776:

> Short enlistments, and a mistaken dependence upon militia, have been the origin of all our misfortune and the great accumulation of our debt.

And on August 20, 1780:

Had we formed a permanent army in the beginning, * * * we never should have had to retreat with a handfull of men across the Delaware in 1776, trembling for the fate of America; * * * we should not have been the greatest part of the war inferior to the enemy, indebted for our safety to their inactivity, enduring frequently the mortification of seeing inviting opportunities to ruin them pass unimproved for want of a force which the country was completely able to afford, and of seeing the country ravaged, our towns burnt, the inhabitants plundered, abused, murdered with impunity, from the same cause.

September 15, 1780:

Regular troops are alone equal to the exigencies of modern war, as well for defense as offense, and whenever a substitute is attempted it must prove illusory and ruinous.

And again on September 24, 1776, in a letter to the President of the Continental Congress he said, amongst other things:

To place any dependence upon militia is assuredly resting upon a broken staff. Men just dragged from the tender scenes of domestic life, unaccustomed to the din of arms, totally unacquainted with every kind of military skill (which is followed by want of confidence in themselves, when opposed to troops regularly trained, disciplined, and appointed, superior in knowledge and superior in arms), are timid and ready to fly from their own shadows. Besides, the sudden change in their manner of living, particularly in their lodging, brings on sickness in many, impatience in all, and, such an unconquerable desire of returning to their respective homes that it not only produces shameful and scandalous desertions among themselves, but infuses the like spirit in others. Again, men accustomed to unbounded freedom and no control can not brook the restraint which is indispensably necessary to the good order and government of the army, without which licentiousness and every kind of disorder triumphantly reins. To bring men to a proper degree of subordination is not the work of a day, a month, or even a year; and, unhappily for us and the cause we are engaged in, the little discipline I have been laboring to establish in the army under my immediate command is in a manner done away by having such a mixture of troops as have been called together within these few months.

Again, in the same letter, he says—and I read this because the argument has been made that the American people would not stand for a permanent Army:

The jealousy of a standing army and the evils to be apprehended from one are remote, and, in my judgment, situated and circumstanced as we are, not at all to be dreaded; but the consequence of wanting one, according to my ideas formed from the present view of things, is certain and inevitable ruin.

Now, note this, Mr. President:

For if I was called upon to declare upon oath whether the militia have been most serviceable or hurtful upon the whole, I should subscribe to the latter. I do not mean by this, however, to arraign the conduct of Congress; in so doing I should equally condemn my own measures if I did not my judgment; but experience, which is the best criterion to work by, so fully, clearly, decisively reprobates the practice of trusting to militia, that no man who regards order, regularity, and economy, or who has any regard for his own honor, character, or peace of mind will risk them upon this issue.

And again in a letter to the President of the Congress under date of December 5, 1776, he said:

When I reflect on the losses we have sustained for want of good troops the certainty of this is placed beyond a doubt in my mind. In such a case the militia, who have been harassed and tired by repeated calls upon them, and farming and manufactures in a manner suspended, would, upon any pressing emergency, have run with alacrity to arms, whereas the cry now is, "They may be as well ruined in one way as another," and with difficulty they are obtained. I mention these things to show that, in my opinion, if any dependence is placed in the militia another year Congress will be deceived. When danger is a little removed from them they will not turn out at all. When it comes home to them the well affected, instead of flying to arms to defend themselves, are busily employed in removing their families and effects, while the disaffected are concerting measures to make their submission and spread terror and dismay all around to induce others to follow their example. Daily experience and abundant proofs warrant this information.

And in a letter to the same person under date of December 20, 1776, he said:

It is needless to add that short enlistments and a mistaken dependence upon militia have been the origin of all our misfortunes and the great accumulation of our debt. We find, sir, that the enemy are daily gathering strength from the disaffected. This strength, like a snowball by rolling, will increase unless some means can be devised to check effectually the progress of the enemy's arms. Militia may possibly do for it for a little while, but in a little while also the militia of those States which have been frequently called upon will not turn out at all; or if they do, it will be with so much reluctance and sloth as to amount to the same thing. Instance New Jersey! Witness Pennsylvania! Could anything but the River Delaware have saved Philadelphia?

So, Mr. President, if Washington knew what he was talking about, the militia was not a dependable force in the American Revolution.

I want to call attention to just a few statements that have been made by military historians and others upon the weakness of the volunteer system during the Revolution. It is not popular to mention these things, but for the sake of history I am going to put this matter into the RECORD, even if I am challenged for lack of patriotism. The remarkable claims about the success of the volunteer system in the Revolution made by the opponents of this bill compel me to do so.

In our school histories we read of one victory after another accomplished by our troops in the Revolutionary War; and when we laid our school books aside we had it thoroughly instilled in us that our armies in the Revolution were not only courageous and patriotic but they were absolutely invincible. We read about the victories, we read about the minutemen at Lexington and the gallantry of our troops at Yorktown; but we did not see much, if anything, in the histories that we studied when we were children that reflected upon the lack of discipline, courage, and patriotism of our troops under the militia laws or the volunteer system. In view of the fact that some of our friends have been insisting that the volunteer armies at all times had all of the virtues, all of the courage, and all of the patriotism, and accomplished nothing but victory, I am going to show a few cases where the system as well as the courage and discipline failed them.

I think I may do this with propriety, because one ancestor of mine was the Secretary of the Continental Congress during the whole of the Revolutionary period, and his picture occupies a place in the Rotunda of the Capitol now, and another ancestor raised a regiment in the Revolutionary War. I can, then, speak of these things as an American and from the American standpoint without undertaking to discredit the individual courage of anybody in the Revolutionary War and without having my Americanism called in question.

In his work, The Military Unpreparedness of the United States, Huidekoper has collected and published the instances in which the militia ran away or deserted in some of the wars of this country. He gives the sources of his information, and I am justified in assuming the entire correctness of his statements. The cases where the militia or part of them ran away or deserted are as follows:

Long Island, August 27, 1776; evacuation of New York, September 15, 1776; Brandywine, September 11, 1777; Guilford Court House, N. C., March 15, 1781; Burwells Ferry, Va., April 19, 1781; Williamsburg, Va., April 20, 1781; Indian village near Fort Wayne, Ind., October 22, 1790; Darke County, Ohio, November 4, 1791; Frenchtown and Raisin River, Mich., January 18–22, 1813; Sacketts Harbor, N. Y., May 29, 1813; French Creek, N. Y., November 1–2, 1813, Chrystlers Fields, Canada, November 11, 1813; Burning of Buffalo, Lewistown, and other towns in northern New York, December 30, 1813; New Orleans, La., January 8, 1815; Lake Okeechobee, Fla., December 25, 1837; Bull Run, Va., July 21, 1861.

Following are instances where they or part of them mutinied:

Morristown, N. J., January 1, 1781; Pompton, N. J., January 24–28, 1781; Lancaster, Pa., June, 1783; on the march from Urbana, Ohio, to Detroit, Mich., June, 1812; Detroit, Mich., July, 1812; on the march from Fort Harrison, Ind., to the Wabash and Illinois Rivers, October 19, 1812; en route to the rapids of the Maumee River, October, 1812; Battle of Queenstown, Ontario, October 13, 1812; en route from Plattsburg, N. Y., to Canada, November, 1812; Fort Strother, Fla., November, 1813; retreat to Buffalo, N. Y., after the evacuation of Fort George, December, 1813; Withlacoochee River, Fla., December 31, 1835; Charlestown, W. Va., July 16–18, 1861.

Not only did Washington have to contend with these difficulties, but some of the States defied the Congress by refusing to furnish their quota of troops, and I am going to ask to put that in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Massachusetts, April, 1812; Connecticut, April, 1812; Vermont, November 10, 1813; Vermont, September, 1814; Virginia, April 16, 1861; North Carolina, April 15, 1861; Kentucky, April 15, 1861; Tennessee, April 17, 1861; Missouri, April 22, 1861; Arkansas, April 22, 1861.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I dislike to do this, but the truth of history requires it, in view of the statements that have been made here on the floor of the Senate that would hold out to the country the idea that the militia was absolutely a dependable force in every emergency. There were in many instances troops far outnumbering the British in an engagement, deserting or mutinying in the face of the enemy, showing their heels whenever they got into dangerous quarters; not that the men in all instances were cowards, but rather because the system was not dependable, and the troops could not be expected to be better than the system which produced them.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Surely.

Mr. KING. In the light of the fact that this debate will not conclude until 1 o'clock to-morrow, would not the Senator prefer speaking to-morrow, when there are more Senators present?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, Mr. President; I should like to go ahead and finish to-night, late as it is. I thank the Senator just the same.

Mr. KING. I want to say to the Senator that before he concludes, and at an appropriate place, I desire to propound a few questions to him, but will refrain from doing so until it suits his pleasure and convenience.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I shall be glad if the Senator will.

Mr. President, the number of militia furnished by the several States during the Revolutionary War, according to the returns and conjectural estimates of the Secretary of War, was only 164,087. That was the militia. The total of Continentals and militia furnished in the war was 395,858. The Continentals were the Regular Army as we understand the Regular Army to-day. Mr. Upton, in his Military Policy, says:

Looking back at the whole Revolutionary struggle, notwithstanding our employment from first to last of almost 400,000 men, we find that but two military events had a direct bearing upon the expulsion of the British. One of these was the capture of Burgoyne, the other that of Cornwallis—an event which was only made possible by the cooperation of a French army and a French fleet.

Now, Mr. President, I call attention to the number of troops involved, because there has not been a suggestion at any time here that I have heard that there were any employed on the American side during the Revolution except volunteers, and that every victory accomplished was due to the volunteer. In the sense that the regular enlisted man is a volunteer, all were volunteers. But the volunteers in the war, coming into the service as militia, were volunteers as distinguished from the Continentals or Regulars. No one seems to recognize the fact or to give credit to the enlisted man for being a volunteer. He is absolutely eliminated from these discussions so far as the United States Army is or has ever been concerned.

So we see, Mr. President, that the major portion of the men who were engaged in the Revolutionary struggle were not volunteers entirely.

What has been said of the Revolution is true, also, Mr. President, of the War of 1812. I am going to call the Senate's attention to the condition of the troops at that time. It has been claimed here that the War of 1812 was won by volunteers, and in doing this I am going to give the figures by comparison so that it may all be in the RECORD.

The population of the United States in 1775 was 3,000,000; the same in 1812 was 7,500,000. The total number of Regulars during the Revolution was 231,771; the same during the War of 1812 was approximately 150,000. The total number of militia of the Revolution was 164,087; the same including volunteers and rangers in 1812 was 471,622. The largest force of Regulars and militia employed in one year of the Revolution was 89,651; the same in the year 1812 was 235,839. The number of British regulars opposed to the Continentals and militia in 1776 exceeded 20,000; the same in 1812 did not exceed 5,000. The largest force of British regulars in the United States and Canada in any one year during the Revolution was 41,586; the same during the War of 1812 was 16,500. The total number of troops of the United States employed during the Revolution was 395,858; the same in the War of 1812 was 527,654.

Mr. President, it will be seen, therefore, that the Volunteers were not entirely responsible for the War of 1812 as has been asserted. Our friends seem to forget entirely that the War of 1812 had practically ended disastrously to the United States troops, so disastrously that the treaty of Ghent was signed, a humiliating confession by the United States that its troops had not been victorious; but after that had been accomplished, without settling any of the differences between the two Governments of Great Britain and America, Jackson with his gallant men at New Orleans settled the controversy after the treaty had been executed and defeat acknowledged.

This campaign opened and closed with the only brilliant victory of the war won at the Battle of New Orleans on the 8th of January, two weeks after the conclusion of the treaty of peace. The British loss was about 2,000 killed and wounded; our own was 7 killed and 6 wounded.

Greene, in his History of the Revolutionary War, says that our troops there were commanded by graduates of West Point, and he attributes the victory to that fact. They were men who had been trained and knew how to command and knew how to discipline men. The same author says that the Battle of New Orleans illustrated the effectiveness of trained men and compared it with Bunker Hill, where trained officers were in command of the American forces and prevailed.

Now, Mr. President, take the War with Mexico. The same condition prevailed. The number of officers and men embraced in the army of occupation on the frontiers of Texas in May, 1846, was only about 3,554, when he ought to have had and would have had more but for faulty legislation.

Upton, speaking of this, says:

While these figures are interesting as showing that the needless exposure of our little Army had its origin in faulty legislation, the weakness of its numbers in no way daunted its commander. He knew that four-fifths of his officers had received the benefits of professional training at the Military Academy or in the Florida War. Beyond this, he was conscious that the discipline and esprit de corps of his troops had been brought to the highest point by six months of training in the camp of instruction at Corpus Christi. With this preparation and, as has been observed, with practically no authority to increase his force till an invasion should actually take place, the commander was soon destined to confront a large and well-organized Mexican Army.

The whole force involved in this war, exclusive of the army of occupation, 3,554 and 548 marines, was 104,454. Of these 31,024 were Regulars and marines, not all Volunteers, as some of the opponents of this bill would have us believe.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. REED. We all understand the value of training. I want to ask the Senator, the chairman of the committee, if it is not his understanding that the men who are now to be gathered together will be put in training camps and trained?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The bill provides for that.

Mr. REED. Whether they are enlisted or whether they are brought in from the militia or whether they are drafted, they will be put in the camps and trained?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true.

Mr. REED. Now, one word further. Will not the President have substantially the same authority with reference to the selection of officers if the volunteer bill is put into effect as he will with reference to the selection of officers if the draft bill is put into effect?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true.

Mr. REED. So that so far as training is concerned, so far as officers are concerned the men, whether drafted or volunteering, would have the same opportunity or could have the same opportunity if the President saw fit to exercise his authority?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true.

Mr. REED. I just wanted to get that point clear.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no disagreement between us, Mr, President, on that subject. Here is where the Senator and I separate. As I said a while ago, the history of every war has proven that the volunteer system at some point failed. The history of the Revolution proves that the volunteer system, not as a rule the men's courage, but the volunteer system itself failed.

The European war has shown that the volunteer system failed on the battle fields of France. The reason for that is not that the volunteer would not receive the same amount of training up to a certain point as the Regulars receive, as the drafted men receive, not that he is lacking in courage at all, but there comes a time in every bitter and protracted war when the men at home who have not volunteered say: "There is nothing more here for me to fight for. I do not propose to risk my life and go down to a bloody grave as my predecessors who have volunteered have done." That is the way it failed in the Revolutionary period, and history discloses that it was nothing in the world but Washington's personal influence over the people of this country and his personal appeal that kept the Volunteer Army filled with sufficient men.

Mr. REED. I do not want to constantly interrupt the chairman of the committee, but I think we have arrived at a point in this debate where a few questions can be asked and answered, and it may illuminate this whole question. I know the chairman of the committee will answer me candidly. He has already done so, and we have cleared up one question here that has been somewhat beclouded. Therefore I want to ask him another question or two if he will permit me.

The Senator states that the volunteer system broke down in our Civil War. Is it not a fact that upon the Federal side all but a little over 2 per cent of the men who fought that war were volunteers?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true, I think.

Mr. REED. Is it not true that great trouble and difficulty arose over the matter of conscription or drafting?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true, but I will say to the Senator——

Mr. REED. Is it not true that the draft broke down and failed a good deal worse in the Civil War than the volunteering?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is partially true. More men were had under volunteering than under the draft, which in the North was not tried until 1863.

Mr. REED. Now, is it not true that the draft broke down and failed early in the Revolutionary War?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true, because the Continental Congress had no power to enforce it.

Mr. REED. The draft was not tried in the Spanish War and in the Mexican War at all, was it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Mr. REED. Was it tried in the War of 1812?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was recommended, but Congress, as usual, failed to act or to listen to the suggestion.

Mr. REED. I think it was not tried at all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator puts questions and does not wait for an answer to any of them.

Mr. REED. I am getting an answer right along.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But I want to add some qualifications to most of my answers, and that is what I do not want to forget in the multitude and diversity of the Senator's questions.

Mr. President, let us take that up in the way the Senator has asked the questions. The draft fell down in the Revolutionary period simply because Congress had not the power to enforce it. They had a Confederation of Colonies, and no law passed by the Continental Congress could be enforced unless the States were willing to enforce it. So much for the draft in the Revolution. Somebody has said here that the draft was not tried in the Revolution. It was tried.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It failed simply because the States refused to obey it and did not have to obey it. Further than that Washington, because of the difficulty he was having with the Continental troops and with the militia of Revolutionary days, recommended the draft three times, and the Continental Congress finally undertook to enact a draft law.

Mr. REED. And it failed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Surely it failed. Why should it not fail? It was simply a matter of the Colonies or States sustaining the action of the Continental Congress, and they did not sustain it either by undertaking to carry out the law or by undertaking to come to the front and answering Washington's appeal to assist him in the war that was then waged.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Permit me to answer the questions already asked.

Mr. REED. You get so many qualifications.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am qualifying my answers in accordance with the history of this country.

Mr. REED. I know you mean to do that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am doing it.

Mr. REED. I think there are other qualifications that qualify the matter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator has had an opportunity to go into that side of it, and I am trying to answer some of his arguments heretofore made in this body.

Mr. REED. I am interested in going on with this colloquy. The Senator is making his explanation. The point I am driving at and what I wanted to ask the Senator is if any nation has ever won a war yet with drafted men?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think not; that is, not in modern times, because the draft was not sought to be applied until near the end of the wars and when volunteering had failed.

Mr. REED. Then if no nation has ever won a war with drafted men in modern times it must have won with regulars or with volunteers.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, the Regulars are volunteers. Regulars in this country are volunteers.

Mr. REED. With Regular troops or volunteers? There is a distinction.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Prior to 1798 Napoleon found it necessary to fill the ranks of his army, and the question of raising an army to do this was referred to the experts of the army. Gen. Jourdain prepared and recommended the first conscript law, and under that law, which was adopted in the year named, Napoleon was able to expend 30,000 men a month, as he tersely expressed it. He could not have done that under the volunteer system. He could not have kept his army filled.

Mr. REED. And he went to St. Helena with the bayonets of volunteers at his back.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He failed at the Battle of Waterloo, as we all know.

Mr. REED. Now, let me ask about the Revolutionary War this question.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Senator has not given me at opportunity yet to answer his questions.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am prepared to answer all of them.

Mr. President, if the draft had been applied early in 1861—although Greene in his Revolutionary history puts a question mark after it—I think it is very generally conceded that the Civil War could have been ended in a very much shorter period. The remarkable feature about the Civil War was that we witnessed two armies of the bravest men the sun ever shone on joined in mortal and fratricidal conflict training to fight and to kill each other while they were confronting each other and actually engaged in war. No such spectacle has ever before been seen. When these two armies were disbanded they constituted the strongest the world ever saw, but with what a sacrifice in blood and slaughter, because Congress failed to do its duty in the outset, making the same blunder as to a volunteer system that is being insisted upon to-day.

Witness the first Battle of Bull Run. The same condition prevailed there that has always prevailed whenever a volunteer force is depended on in an emergency, rather than upon a permanent force such as Washington and all military experts recommend. The governors of the States when the Civil War began were appointing staff and line officers for political purposes, and the President of the United States himself could not resist the temptation to do the same thing. Prominent politicians from different sections of the country were sent to the front without any experience to command men who had never had any training. Some of the officers as well as enlisted men had never seen a gun, and they went down to Bull Run to battle with untrained men, under the leadership of many West Pointers who understood, at least, the art of war.

Mr. President, if anyone thinks I have overdrawn this condition all he has to do is to refer to any history of the Civil War. It was a perfect rout for the Union Army. Members of Congress went down from Washington to watch the fun from the adjacent hills. The suttler with his stores, the butcher with his herd of cattle were there to sell their wares and their meats to the soldiers when the fight was over. But it was not very long before these untrained men in charge of untrained officers, political accidents many of them, were retreating toward Washington with the highways blockaded with caravans and wagons of all kinds, some of them, as Hon S. S. Cox said in his remarkable description of the Battle of Bull Run, in order to get away as quickly as possible were hanging on to the tails of the cattle as they too were stampeding toward Washington.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me finish the answer.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask one question. Who commanded the Federal forces at Bull Run?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. McDowell. He was a good man.

Mr. REED. Was he a West Pointer?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know but he was.

Mr. THOMAS. He was.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think probably he was.

Mr. REED. Is it not a fact that there were more West Pointers in command of the Federals at Bull Run than in the command of the Confederates?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have not made any careful examination as to that.

Mr. REED. There were politicians, as many Congressmen and as many men of that kind on the southern side as there were on the Federal side.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not relying on my own memory in what I am saying. Let me see what Mr. Henry Villard had to say about it in his memoirs. He was a reporter for some one or more of the prominent journals of the country, and he went down there in that capacity. He was one of the gentlemen who joined the retreat toward Washington, according to his own story. I am not criticizing the valor of those men; I want that distinctly understood. This is not any criticism of the volunteer himself. There were men there who would have faced any foe on earth; but it was the failure of a system, with untrained officers and untrained men, going out to battle with fancy cockades and plumes and zouave uniforms, and everything on earth but knowledge to properly care for themselves in battle. That was the trouble.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wanted to ask the Senator if the force which was defeated at Bull Run had been drafted, instead of volunteered, would there have been a different result?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Probably not. I am going to answer the Senator frankly about these things; I have no disposition to conceal anything that is within my knowledge.

Mr. THOMAS. I am satisfied of that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I know the Senator is satisfied, because he feels that what I have said answers the whole proposition.

Mr. THOMAS. No; I do not; but I am satisfied the Senator will answer everything very frankly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am sure I will try to do that. It is not that the draft is absolutely necessary in the beginning of any war, as I have said. It is later on, when the volunteer system fails, as it failed during the Civil War, that the draft becomes necessary; there is not any question about that. Hence the draft law of 1863.

Mr. President, the draft law of the Southern Confederacy was adopted a year earlier than the draft law in the North, and see what it did. It filled up the depleted ranks of the Southern Confederacy, which had many less men than the North during the whole of the Civil War, and we find those gallant fellows without money, compelled to manufacture into cannon the church bells, and the brass door knobs, and utilizing everything, without any manufacturing establishments to speak of, offering a resistance that has astounded the whole world. The campaigns of "Stonewall" Jackson—the religious fanatic, as he was sometimes called down in Lexington, Va.—are to-day the textbooks of the German armies and of the other great armies in Europe.

The volunteer system did not fail at first, but it began to fail in the Civil War, and it would have failed absolutely if the war had been continued a year or two longer; there is no question about that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator not agree that, in all probability, whereas the Confederates were victorious at the battle of Bull Run, if they had had trained soldiers they would have been able to follow up the victory, and that, for lack of that training, they lost the advantage?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They lost the advantage that they had gained, as the Senator suggests. It was the most fortunate thing that ever happened to the North, and, so far as the forces were concerned, the most unfortunate thing that could have happened to the South, but it was a fortunate thing for the whole country that the first battle of Bull Run was lost, for the simple reason that it taught the North that the men from the South could and would fight, and it gave the soldiers of the South such confidence in themselves that they neglected to make preparation for future campaigns, with the result that it did not take long for the tide to begin to turn.

Mr. President, my authority for saying that the volunteering was beginning to fail in the Civil War is Mr. Lincoln's course. Mr. Lincoln urged the draft. Naturally there were "copperheads" then, Mr. President, as there are in some sections of our country to-day; and the great reason why the draft was not at first a success was that there were men in pretty nearly every State in this Union who were putting every obstacle in the way of the success of the Federal forces. Gov. Seymour has been quoted here, and what he said in opposition to the draft has been quoted. Admiring him, as I did, as a great Democrat and a great man, I must say there was not a single obstacle that he did not place in the way of President Lincoln in the enforcement of the draft in New York. If he had done his duty—and I appeal to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who participated in the Civil War, for the truth of what I say—if Gov. Seymour had done his whole duty, and had assisted in carrying out the legislation of Congress, there is no question but that there would have been few, if any, draft riots in New York.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not at all agree that the Revolutionary War was not fought by enlisted men under the leadership of men like John Stark, who won the Battle of Bennington. The Senator from Oregon will remember that it was said concerning that battle—I have the words here—by Washington himself, who said, "One more such stroke and we shall have no great cause for anxiety as to the future designs of Britain." It was not long after that that the surrender of Cornwallis came, and that our independence was gained.

I do not suppose the Senator from Oregon desires to underestimate the value of the services that were rendered by the enlisted men in that great conflict.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator, as I understand him, pays a tribute to the enlisted man as well as to the conscripted man; that they both did the best they could under the circumstances, and they both did their "bit" wonderfully well.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some battles were doubtless lost because the troops had not the requisite training. In the nature of things, they could not get that requisite training before the great conflict was in force. When Sumter was fired upon the North had not trained men; neither had the South to any great extent. The issue was instantly joined, and it had to be fought out by untrained men.

Now, I will ask the Senator, in all sincerity, if the proposition that is now made that we shall have a volunteer army of 500,000 raised under a different system from that which is now in vogue, added to which shall be a conscripted army, will not meet the present requirements better than to reject the proposition to allow the patriotic men of this country to enlist? That is all that we contend for, insisting that we ought to join the two.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I can see the viewpoint of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, but it is unjust to the volunteers, it is unjust to the country, to put forward the men who are patriotic enough to go to the front and leave behind the men who are not willing to go.

Mr. GALLINGER. There comes the trouble with your system as you have worked it out in this bill; that you narrow conscription to such an extent that you are going to have very few men that you will conscript, except the boys in the schools and colleges and counting rooms. When you get your exemptions all in operation under this proposed law that is exactly what will happen. You will get the very best blood, which you make a point against doing in connection with the volunteer system.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We shall get good men; I have not any fear about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we shall get the very best, but the conscription list will be so narrow as to be utterly unequal and unjust, probably including not more than 15 per cent of those liable to military service.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We will get just as good men and just as brave men as we get through volunteering, and assuming that they are of equal patriotism and of equal courage, there is no reason why the volunteers should go to the front to be killed as they were in Britain, and the others who are not willing to volunteer should stay behind simply because they do not feel like going to the front, a duty incumbent upon all of military age when their services are needed.

Mr. GALLINGER. The British people volunteered very freely. Five millions of them volunteered with enthusiasm.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, there is not any doubt about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. They volunteered very freely, as they have also done in the colonies.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I think the example that Britain has set has been a most wonderful one. I do not know when it has ever been equalled except on a smaller scale during the Civil War in this country: but they reached a point after a while when they could not fill the depleted ranks by volunteering.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is not any question but that during our Civil War volunteers enlisted very freely up to a point when it became necessary, because of the exigencies that were upon us, to get troops more rapidly than we could with the volunteer system, and so conscription was resorted to, which was proper and right.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think so, too.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is exactly what I want to have done in this war, if we ever get into it to the extent of sending our military forces abroad. I do not know whether we shall do that or not; personally I hope that necessity may not arise, but if it does the response will not disappoint the patriotic sentiment of our country.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The only trouble about the volunteer system, taken as a whole, is that in a long, difficult, and protracted war it fails. The history of the world shows that it falls down; and when it does, it is necessary to adopt the draft, which makes the new system more unpopular than it would have been if it had been adopted in the first instance. Furthermore, you must keep the units of the Army filled at all times during any war, and this can only be done by having recruiting and training units at home or in the rear to furnish men to take the places of those killed, wounded, or missing.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, you can not keep the ranks full if the conscripts desert at the rate they did toward the close of the Civil War. I was in consultation to-day with a very distinguished officer, who said that the conscripts under his command were practically good for nothing; that they deserted just as rapidly as they could.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I presume that some of them were no account. Let me tell you why. I almost forgot it, and I am glad the Senator has called my attention to it. The conscript law of 1863 provided that a man could buy his way out by giving the Government $300.

Mr. WARREN. That is it exactly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the proposition. Then it provided for substitutes. A man subject to military duty could excuse himself by paying another to take his place. The States put up hundreds of millions of dollars in the way of bounty to induce men to enlist. My friend the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] declined to accept a bounty and refused to enlist at all if the condition was imposed that he should accept a bounty. That was the way with a great many; but thousands and hundreds of thousands of them accepted the bounty that was given by the States. On the other hand, the Government of the United States also paid immense sums in bounties to induce enlistment. Cities and municipalities supplemented the bounties that were given by the States and the Federal Government to induce men to do a patriotic duty.

Mr. GALLINGER. That they had to pay bounties would be an argument to me that the conscript system was not popular.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLINGER. They had to pay money to get men.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That may be true, Mr. President, but it made it unpopular with the men who were at the front doing the fighting and who had gone in under the volunteer system. We have eliminated all that from this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Daniel Webster in 1814 delivered a great speech in the House of Representatives when he represented a district in my own State, and called attention very pointedly to the fact that you never could hold conscripts together and fight a war with them; that men who were forced into war against their will would not fight; that they would be worthless. I do not know whether Webster was wise or not when he said that, but he said it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have greater respect for his oratorical ability than I have confidence in his military judgment.

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be so; and yet, if the Senator will read the great speech Webster delivered in 1814 against conscription, which was undertaken to be forced in the War of 1812, I think he will have a great deal of confidence in Webster's judgment as well as in his oratorical ability.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He helped defeat safe and sane legislation then, just as eloquent men have done in every Congress since. Congress has never enacted the legislation needed and recommended by military experts to make a perfectly dependable military force.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me a moment before we leave the subject now under discussion?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say in reply to the intimation of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] that it was necessary to offer money because of the draft; that bounties were offered long before there was any draft—one year previous to that time, in fact.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was so in the State in which the Senator from Wyoming then lived, was it not?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; and in all the States of New England, I think.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. And the Congress of the United States has refunded many of the bounties paid by the States to troops.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was about to propound to the Senator from New Hampshire a question, and will do so if the Senator from Oregon will permit.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. KING. The Senator from New Hampshire has quoted, apparently with a great deal of pleasure, the speech of Daniel Webster against conscription. I do not think the Senator meant by that that the question was concluded because Daniel Webster had spoken against conscription. I might call the Senator's attention to the fact that Daniel Webster made one of the very best arguments that ever was made in favor of free trade or a very low tariff, and then, when the Nation demanded, he changed his opinion and made one of the strongest arguments in favor of the protective system. So, I have no doubt that Mr. Webster would have made with equal facility an argument opposite from that to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I can not agree to that proposition at all. Mr. Webster was a reasonably consistent statesman, but he lived in an age when men were not different from what they are now; and men sometimes change their opinions. Mr. Webster's last speech was an unfortunate one. It controverted most of the doctrines for which he had contended during his lifetime, but he made it because of his love for the Union and his great desire to save the Union.

Mr. Webster, in his speech in 1814, started out with the proposition that conscription was unconstitutional, and argued it with great force. I am not able to say whether or not his contention on that point was sound, not being a lawyer, and especially not a constitutional lawyer. Then Mr. Webster followed it up with another suggestion to the effect that a conscripted army can not be held together to fight the battles of the country, because of the fact that they are forced into the service contrary to their will; that young men and boys are taken without the consent of their parents, which is true. Whether Mr. Webster was consistent or sound I shall not undertake to say; but I have read that speech with a great deal of pleasure and obtained a great deal of information from it, and I commend it to my friend from Utah. If he will read it with equal care, I think he will conclude that Mr. Webster was reasonably wise in 1814, as he proved himself to be in his great controversies over the Constitution in later years. However, that he was entirely consistent, I presume, is not true. I never in all my life knew a man who was altogether consistent. I know I am not, and none of us are entirely consistent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon pardon me for just one moment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to proceed, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I have read the speech to which the Senator from New Hampshire refers with a great deal of profit and a great deal of pleasure; but, apropos of the fallibility of the judgment of Mr. Webster and his lack of forward vision, some of us from the West remember the strong manner in which he denounced the plains and alkali deserts of the West and predicted that that country was valueless and was absolutely of no worth to the Nation; so that I am afraid that any judgment Mr. Webster expressed upon this question might be subject to the same criticism which might be made with respect to the prophecies he made in regard to the West.

Mr. GALLINGER. Webster was fallible, undoubtedly, as also was Mr. Webster's colleague, John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, when he declared that because of climatic conditions cotton cloth could not be manufactured in this country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would like to proceed. I have not answered the Senator's questions yet. He keeps interrupting before I have had a chance to answer them all.

Mr. REED. I should just like to read a bit of history, which may help to clear up the matter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is probably a history that differs from one I have had access to, so that we will never get anywhere.

Mr. REED. But there has been a great deal said about the Confederates winning whatever they did win with conscripts, and the impression has been given that they relied very largely upon them. Now, I have Nicolay and Hay's History of Abraham Lincoln, and I desire to read just a sentence of two from that work.

Quoting from the book to which I have referred, it is said:

The limit of age—

That is, in the Confederacy—

was constantly extended. In September, 1862, an act of the Confederate Congress authorized the President to call into service all white men resident in the Confederate States between the ages of 18 and 45; and in February, 1864, another law included all between 17 and 50, which gave occasion to Grant for his celebrated mot—afterwards credited by him to Gen. Butler—that the Confederates were "robbing both the cradle and the grave" to fill their armies.

Severe and drastic as were these laws and unrelenting as was the insurrectionary government in their execution, they were not carried out with anything like the system and thoroughness which characterized the action of the national authorities. The Confederate generals were constantly complaining that they got no recruits, or not enough to supply the waste of campaigns. On the 30th of April, 1864, the chief of the bureau of conscription at Richmond made a report to the Secretary of War, painting in the darkest colors the difficulties encountered by him in getting soldiers into the ranks, though he had all the laws and regulations he needed and there were men enough in the country. He said—and in these words confessed that the system had failed and that the defeat of the revolt was now but a question of time: "The result indicates this grave consideration for the Government, that fresh material for the armies can no longer be estimated as an element of future calculation for their increase, and that necessity demands the invention of devices for keeping in the ranks the men now borne on the rolls. The stern revocation of all details, an appeal to the patriotism of the States claiming large numbers of able-bodied men, and the accretions by age are now almost the only unexhausted sources of supply. For conscription from the general population the functions of this bureau may cease with the termination of the year 1864."

A demonstration again that conscription failed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, as a demonstration that it did not fail I call the attention of the Senator to what Gen. Grant had to say about it. Now, Mr. President, it will be remembered that the Southern Confederacy adopted a draft system in 1862, and they operated under it until the war closed. Now, here is what Gen. Grant said about it in his Memoirs:

The cause—

That is, the southern cause—was popular and was enthusiastically supported by the young men. The conscription took all of them.

This is what Grant says. He ought to know. He was there:

Before the war was over further conscriptions took those between 14 and 18 years of age as junior reserves, and those between 45 and 60 as senior reserves.

Mind you, all of them. Grant says:

It would have been an offense, directly after the war, and perhaps it would be now, to ask any able-bodied men in the South who was between the ages of 14 and 60 at any time during the war whether he had been in the Confederate Army. He would assert that he had, or account for his absence from the ranks. Under such circumstances it is hard to conceive how the North showed such a superiority of force in every battle fought.

There is the keynote of the whole situation. It was a call of country as the South needed it, whether you call it a draft or a conscription or a volunteer system. These young men of the South did not object to it. I had a brother who was not old enough even to be drafted, and though I was but a child I can see him now riding off to join the Confederate Army. He thought, as did other boys in the South, that he was doing a patriotic duty. The cause was popular with these young fellows, and it mattered not to them whether they were drafted or whether they volunteered. They were proud of their country and their cause. How can you expect men to be proud of our country or our cause when we have distinguished Senators here on the floor of the Senate denouncing the Regular Army, denouncing any sane effort to raise an army here, when the country faces a crisis such as it never before faced in its history?

Mr. President, I think there is method in the Senator's madness. He is tolling me away from his original proposition. I stated a while ago that politics prevailed in the Civil War, and I rather thought my statement about that was challenged. Well, now, we will see.

Mr. Villard, to whom I referred a while ago, says:

Commissions of line officers were also systematically distributed among favorites. I had a curious personal experience in this respect. I was myself offered a commission as captain in the Regular Army by Secretary Chase—by way of compliment to the Cincinnati Commercial, an offer which, I am free to say, sorely tempted me.

Mind you—

Was there any politics in that?

Mr. REED. That was the Regular Army.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, to be sure, that is the Senator's claim. I am talking about the part that politics has played not only in the Regular Army on occasion, I am sorry to say, but more particularly during the Civil War. And the Senator claims the Civil War was fought by volunteers.

About the same time I was induced to interest myself in the application for a commission as lieutenant of a young German doctor from Buffalo who was anxious to exchange the scalpel for the sword. I spoke to Mr. Chase regarding him, and a few days later he received, to his intense surprise, a commission as a captain of Infantry. I am sorry to say that my protégé did not do honor to my recommendation, being dismissed for cowardice on the battle field before he had served a year.

Those were not isolated cases. They happened right along. Why, it took a year or a year and a half to weed out the incompetents from the commissioned personnel of the Army during the Civil War—men that had come in with these militia forces from the different States of the Union.

I want to call attention to a right amusing statement by Mr. Villard. He was describing the retreat from the first Battle of Bull Run. Now, mind, you, I want the Senator from Missouri to understand that I am not questioning the individual courage of these volunteers. I am still talking about a system that has been ingrafted upon our military legislation. Speaking of it, he says:

About daybreak I passed the camp of a regiment of Pennsylvania three-months' men whose term of service had expired the day before and who had insisted on marching away from the front to the very sound of the battle. So little martial spirit had been developed in a good portion of the Army! A little while later I heard the clatter of hoofs behind me and, looking back—and, looking back, perceived a mounted officer approaching at full speed. As he came nearer I saw he wore nothing on his head and was very bald. I soon recognized in him Col. Ambrose E. Burnside, of the First Regiment of Rhode Island Volunteers, who had commanded a brigade under Heintzelman in the battle. There he was, hatless, swordless, and all alone, making the best of time on his fine black charger. I had made his acquaintaince in camp at Washington, and hence spoke to him as he hastened by. He did not stop to talk, but merely exclaimed, "I am hurrying ahead to get rations for my command."

He was evidently going, too—going some!—

That is just one case, and there were others like it—where they were retreating in complete disorder. I have been told that some of them did not stop until they got up to New England and were surprised when they were halted even at that distance from the scene of battle.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me ask if Gen. Burnside was a West Pointer?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know, and I do not care. I am just talking about the efforts to make an army out of an undisciplined mob.

Mr. REED. Oh, well, if this man was in retreat, it is interesting to know whether he was a politician or an Army man.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, this thing of running away from an enemy is infectious. If you have a body of men who are too undisciplined to fight, and they start to run, the whole bunch goes like a band of sheep; but the Senator knows by experience that in order to train a regiment of troops you have got to leaven the undisciplined by putting with them a few of the Regulars that have had training. They did not have many of these down there.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just one question, and then I will desist. Supposing those troops had all been drafted at the beginning of the war instead of being volunteers; did we have officers that we could have placed over them, except by appointing the best men we could find in the different communities?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think so, Mr. President; but we would have had some West Pointers—not many.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that it would have been about the same condition.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now the Senator proposes a bill that I want to help him pass, and I hope he will urge it as strenuously as he is urging this bill, and that is for universal military training.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I thank the Senator and promise him I will do my best.

Mr. GALLINGER. If we get that, some time in the future, we will have men who will be soldiers; but at the beginning of the Civil War, of course, we could not have anybody but raw recruits as volunteers. In the very nature of things there was not any time to train them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will not the Senator, in the interest of history, let me read another line about Gen. Burnside?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think, Mr. President, that I had better proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not like to be disobliging, but I can find some histories that will meet probably everything the Senator finds in some other history.

Mr. REED. This is just about Burnside. He was appointed to the United States Military Academy and graduated in 1847.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We have had men from the Military Academy who would run once in a while. There is no question about that.

Mr. REED. And the Senator does not mean to say, and the man who wrote that book ought not to have said, that Burnside was not a brave man.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He did not say so.

Mr. REED. Well, he indicated that he was running away.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He indicated it. The Senator indicates by suggestion that he was a West Point man, that West Point men are apt to run away.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, yes. The Senator has just as much right to draw that inference from what I said as I have to draw it from what he said.

Mr. REED. I simply indicated, if the Senator will pardon me, that the imputation that the Battle of Bull Run was lost by volunteers is not borne out by a statement that Burnside ran away, particularly when it is shown that Burnside was a West Pointer.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I say that the running-away habit was infectious at Bull Run because they had untrained, undisciplined militia, that had just been brought into the service, and had not had an opportunity for training. I do not claim—I am not fool enough to claim—that if these men had been drafted into the service, and had gone to battle under the same circumstances, they would have been any better trained. I do not claim any such thing as that. What I am claiming against the volunteer system is that in every serious war—and this is a serious war—there comes a time when the volunteer system fails, and I am opposed to trying a system for three years, having it fail, and then taking up another system, just as Great Britain has been compelled to do, and undertaking to raise an army by that method.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator; but as he has been discussing the relative merits of the volunteer system and the conscript system, I have before me Pollard's "Lost Cause," which gives his estimate of the effect of the conscript system in the South. I shall not take the time to read it, unless the Senator desires it, now. I will present it later.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would a little rather the Senator would.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I appreciate the reference, and I hope the Senator will do so.

Mr. President, right in this connection there has been a great deal said here about Canada and her volunteers and their gallantry. Now, there will come a time, if it has not come already, when the Canadian volunteer system is going to fall down. Her ranks are being depleted. Possibly it may be saved, because the depleted ranks may be filled by men who are drafted into the service in Great Britain; but there is bound to come a time when it will fail. Now, what are they going to do about it?

Canada has been drained of her best blood. They have gone to the front, and, like all Americans, they have shown themselves possessed of a valor which has astounded the world. There is no doubt as to that; but how are they going to fill up their depleted ranks? They can not do it. They are trying to do it now.

I have in my hand a statement which I think probably has been sent to other Senators here that was prepared by a man named Lorne Mulloy, and it was mailed to me, showing the objections to the volunteer system. He lives at Toronto, Canada. He volunteered to serve his country, and in an engagement lost or partially lost his sight; at least, this is the information I get, and I had a friend telegraph up to find out, because I did not want to quote anything from a man who did not know what he was talking about. After being wounded he was detailed to recruiting duty in Canada. I am going to ask leave to print in the RECORD, without reading it, his views on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

OBJECTIONS TO THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM.

The following conclusions have been arrived at after careful study of the experience gained by more than a year's work in recruiting men:

1. THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM IS NEITHER BRITISH NOR FRENCH.

(a) The French method, commonly known as conscription, is better described as democratic compulsion or the subordination of each to the expressed will of all. In other words, it is the same form of compulsion as that which compels us here in Canada to pay our self-imposed taxes and to obey our self-made laws.

(b) The British method of raising men has always been by the employment of the compulsory militia levy, including the militia ballot. Under this system each parish, town, and county was required to furnish its just quota. From the eligibles of a certain class, aggregating many times the number of the quota, exemptions were made in the cases of those men considered to be indispensable to the carrying on of business at home, while from the names of the remainder the necessary number was balloted.

(c) With the exception of two or three companies of Royal Garrison Artillery, volunteer units were unknown in the British Army until the middle of the eighteenth century. Upon the outbreak of the Seven Years' War national unpreparedness was so marked and popular, fear of invasion so great, that the Government in 1757 was compelled by act of Parliament to recognize and regularize volunteer units and to include volunteer units in the armed forces of the Crown. The volunteer movement, however, by no means displaced the compulsory militia levy, which was used freely throughout the Napoleonic struggle, but took its place alongside as an adjunct.

As it was in the Army so it was in the manning of the British Fleet, and the great majority of the men who built up the splendid traditions of the British Navy were men who were sent to sea under compulsion. In fact, excluding punitive expeditions and the South African war, which was, in the main, guerilla warfare, the only war in British history in which the compulsory levy was not used to raise the required number of men was in the Crimean War, in which, though the militia act was suspended, it remained a convincing instrument, ready to be put into effect at an hour's notice.

2. THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM IS NOT RELIABLE.

History, ancient or modern, of all nations and all peoples does not record a single instance in which the voluntary system stood the test of a real war. Whenever the struggle was of such proportions as to require approximately the whole effort of a nation some form of compulsion was found necessary. This is so because the volunteer system is haphazard in its methods, uncertain in its results, and incapable of supplying the steady, uniform stream of recruits necessary to create and fight an army.

3. THE VOLUNTEER SYSTEM IS A CONTRADICTION OF THE NECESSARILY FUNDAMENTAL RELATIONSHIP EXISTING BETWEEN THE CITIZEN AND THE STATE.

(a) The State is an organized society of human beings, associated, presumably, for their own welfare, the members of which possess a community of race, language, or ideals. Whether in its inception—the family, in the family enlarged, the tribe, or in the tribe expanded into the nation—its citizens possess rights paralleled by responsibilities, and in the constitution of all States which have existed from the twilight of ancient civilization until to-day the primary responsibility upon which all citizens' rights are in common founded is the obligation to defend the State when at war. When the constitution is unwritten it is basic, underlying, and understood—in time of war the eligible male citizen must fight.

(b) Since the basis of voluntary offering is the right to refuse, it follows that when the Government of a country at war calls for volunteers to fight it is tantamount to stating openly that each eligible male citizen is at liberty to adopt whatever attitude he pleases toward the struggle, and no moral obloquy can be attached to the man who decides that the adventure is no concern of his. In other words, a call for volunteers not only gives a legal justification to the man who will not go, but it is a confession to the world that the nation is not wholeheartedly committed to the struggle, for the world knows that this method can not call forth one-half of the nation's whole effort.

4. THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM IS A VIOLATION OF THE PRINCIPLES OF DEMOCRACY.

The fundamental principle of democracy is the equality of all citizens before the law or from the standpoint of the State, and any burden imposed by the State must be evenly and equitably distributed over the whole citizen body. A tax of 25 mills is not laid upon one man and 10 mills upon his neighbor, and the customs duty is strictly impartial, affecting rich and poor alike. The voluntary system, however, discriminates drastically and flagrantly against the unselfish and patriotic citizen and in favor of the selfish man, the unpatriotic, the lover of his own ease, and of him who desires to remain at home and get gain. If it is a true democratic principle that in the raising of taxes—a mere matter of dollars and cents—the burden should be evenly and equitably distributed upon the whole body of citizens, is it not truer democracy to observe the same equity and equality when the toll to be exacted is hardship, suffering, and death?

5. THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM CREATES THE MAXIMUM OF INDUSTRIAL DERANGEMENT.

It is axiomatic that in war the maintenance by a State of an effective army in the field depends upon the husbanding of the economic resources at home and the conservation of the nation's industrial or wealth-producing power. In other words, only a small percentage—say, 10 per cent of the people—can actually go to war. The ultimate base of that national army, whether it fights on the frontier or 10,000 miles distant, must be the economic resources of the home land and the wealth-producing power of the 90 per cent who can not go.

This power of wealth production, therefore, must be as jealously guarded as the strength and composition of the combatant force, and on no account should we take from the former men who are indispensable from the industrial standpoint.

The captain of industry, the skilled mechanic, and the rising artisan are men of trained and disciplined minds. They know the meaning of self-discipline, regularity of habits, long hours, night study, and concentration of purpose. While these are precisely the benefits which military training holds out to the undisciplined mind, it is beyond controversy that a nation's appeal for men to fight goes straight home to the mind of the disciplined man, while it slips lightly off the man to whom military training would be a boon. This explains the universal complaint of manufacturers that the appeals of recruiting officers constantly and invariably take from them the men who are indispensable to the proper conduct of their business, while for each one taken there are five unskilled men left whose places, were they to go, could be easily filled.

The voluntary system, while discriminating between men by drawing largely from the more efficient and those the country can least afford to spare, is nondiscriminating as between industries, drawing alike from the munition plant and from the distillery and frequently hitting more heavily those industries most indispensable to the nation's economic welfare.

6. THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM IS PRODIGALLY WASTEFUL AND RIOTOUSLY EXTRAVAGANT.

(a) Throughout central Canada the time taken to raise local battalions has been found to be between four and seven months, and this is probably true of the whole of Canada. As against a compulsory system, which would raise a regiment in two weeks, there is, therefore, loss in time of at least five months in bringing each battalion up to the stage of mobilization, at which point the real training only begins. Moreover, since the authorized full complement of officers and noncommissioned officers is on pay practically from the beginning, and since the heaviest enlistment occurs in the first two months, it is a conservative estimate that the loss in money—that is, the avoidable expenditure incurred—can not be less than the pay and upkeep of the full battalion for a period of from three to four months. As this equals $75,000 per month, it is evident that with the exception of the first hundred thousand, men who came forward eagerly, every thousand men raised by the voluntary method has cost the Canadian taxpayer $250,000 of unnecessary expense. In other words, the 260,000 men thus raised have, as contrasted with any sane system of levying troops, cost the Canadian taxpayer $65,000,000, for which his only return has been the privilege of being five months late in turning out each battalion as a full unit ready to commence its training.

(b) Another cause of unnecessary expense is the large number of married men enlisting, 90 per cent of whom would be refused by any system of selection which calls the unmarried man first to the colors. The reason for the large proportion of married men enlisting lies in the fact that the married man is older, more thoughtful by reason of his greater responsibilities, and has undoubtedly a greater stake in the war. The proportion in some battalions is as low as 30 per cent, and in many others reaches 50 and even 5 per cent. Taking the low average of 425 married men per 1,000 enlisted, we are paying in separation allowances alone $3,000,000 per month, or $36,000,000 per annum, as long as the man remains under arms.

(c) In connection with the enlistment of married men there are also to be considered patriotic funds, pensions to the widows, and the financial obligation of the State in reference to the children of such men who may be killed in action or totally disabled. These children must be reared to the age of 18, and we are therefore obligating ourselves for the future expenditure of many millions, reaching forward over a period of from 1 to 18 years.

(d) In addition to this there is the not inconsiderable expense of so-called whirlwind recruiting campaigns being conducted spasmodically in every part of the Dominion of Canada. Speakers, bands, and escorts must be transported; press, bills, and bunting must be used in abundance; clerical work, halls, motor cars, liveries, speakers' hotel expenses—returned soldiers are frequently on salary—must all be provided for, and the people pay. In fact, it is a safe estimate that the man power and the money now used in the undignified attempt to raise men would, if properly controlled, raise, equip, and maintain another division on the firing line.

7. THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM PRODUCES THE MAXIMUM OF INEFFECTIVES.

Since youth is an idealist and maturity is thoughtful, appeals from the platform and the press are being daily responded to by boys of 16 and 17 and men between 50 and 60 years of age, both classes, in their desire to serve, adjusting their ages to meet the requirements of enlistment.

Commanding officers of many local battalions inform me that these classes aggregate as high as 10 per cent of the total enlistment, and by some they are placed at 20 per cent. The inevitable results of this will be the weeding out later of thousands of men and boys who will prove physically incapable of standing the strain of thorough camp training, but who, nevertheless, have been in the pay of the country for from 5 to 10 months.

RECAPITULATING.

The so-called volunteer system—it is the precise antithesis of system—is neither British nor French; it is not reliable; it is a denial of the basic responsibilities of citizenship; it is undemocratic; it creates the maximum of industrial arrangement; it is wasteful and extravagant; it results in the minimum of effectives and the maximum waste of valuable time. These things being so—and these things ought not so to be—it seems to me that to continue on these lines is an evidence of moral weakness and insincerity on our part, and it is little short of sheer hyprocisy on the part of our press and our public men to proclaim to the world that we are in this struggle to the last man and the last dollar, when the world knows and we ourselves know that the first step in a sincere attempt to put even half our strength into the struggle would be a classification of our industries and registration of our man power. Some form of authoritative selection is necessary, not for the purpose of dragnetting the country for men to fight, but for the purpose of conserving our wealth-producing powers and putting into the field in the most expeditious manner the most effective force compatible with this main object.

LORNE MULLOY.

MARCH 4, 1916.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, right in this connection it has been stated here on the floor of the Senate that Australia had tried the compulsory military system and had abandoned it. Well, that is partially true, but it is not entirely true. The fact is, Australia still has the compulsory system of military service, but it only applies to her own country. It never has been objected to; there never has been any attempt to repeal it. This is what was done in Australia after Australia had sent forth her volunteers to the Continent of Europe to assist the mother country in her struggle for existence. Then the question came up of filling her depleted ranks. The question was, Shall we draft men to go to the Continent of Europe to fight? A referendum was had, and with over 2,000,000 votes cast there were only about 60,000 majority who voted against a compulsory system for raising troops to send to Europe to fill the depleted ranks of their brothers on the Continent. It was a magnificent showing.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. WOLCOTT. For the purpose of clarity I would like to ask a question.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Very well.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand the Senator to be arguing against the volunteer system as a means of filling the depleted ranks. I would like to ask him how that is a pertinent question under this bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, it is a pertinent question in this way: Assuming that we are really in war and that we are going to have a serious one of five or six years duration, and that we will have to send men over to Europe, and the ranks are depleted by shrapnel and by poisonous gases, how are you going to get men there to fill up the depleted ranks? By a volunteer system?

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I may be permitted, the bill under the volunteer amendment provides that however the first increment of 500,000 men shall be raised thereafter in the outside limit is 90 days, all the deficiencies, whether occasioned by want of sufficient men to volunteer or by loss, the depletions shall be filled by draft. So why is it pertinent to discuss the feasibility of the volunteer system to fill up depleted ranks under this bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am undertaking, in my humble way, to answer the arguments which have been made by many distinguished Senators who have been advocating the volunteer system. I am trying to show why it is an unreliable system.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I mean with respect to the men to fill up the depleted ranks.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This bill provides for filling them, I will say to the Senator, and I am glad he called my attention to it. It provides for recruiting battalions where men are to be trained to take the places of the men killed, wounded, or missing in the battalion or regiment or brigade to which they happen to be attached. In other words, they are training men all the time who can be filled into these regiments under the draft system.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I may be permitted again, the opponents of the bill recommended by the majority of the committee have been declaiming very strongly against the volunteer system. Yet is it not true that they propose in their bill to fill all the depletions in the ranks not by the volunteer system but by the draft system, which they condemn?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Probably that is true.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is true, I think.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. STONE. My friend made a statement which mystifies me.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am surprised at that.

Mr. STONE. I was surprised at it, too; and that is why I ventured to interrupt the Senator. In his answer to the Senator from Delaware he expressed the hope that we may not have to send soldiers to the battle fronts of Europe, and he expressed that hope in terms which seemed to warrant the impression that he believed we would not have to do it. Does the Senator really think we are not going to furnish troops to go into this war?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator did not hear me say we would not. I said that I hoped we would not. I meant by that that I hoped the emergency would not require troops to be sent.

Mr. STONE. The emergency is upon us.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not so sure about that. Our allies have not asked us for men. They have asked us for subsistence and general supplies.

Mr. STONE. Gen. Joffre stated that of all things they wanted the American flag on the battle front.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that that statement has not been officially made to the Senate of the United States; but if it is made officially and through the proper channels, I would say, send them.

Mr. STONE. If we do not intend to send them, what is the use of making all this provision?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I believe that if those people over there say they need American soldiers on the battle line we ought to get behind them and send them all they want. [Applause.]

Mr. President, France sent her men over here when America needed them, and, as Upton says in his Military Policy of the United States, that was probably the deciding factor of the war. If need be, let America be the deciding factor in the European war.

Mr. STONE. I supposed that is what we are raising this army for, to be sent over there.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We are raising an army to train them to be sent there if necessary, and the sooner we get through here and put those men in training camps the sooner we will be able to help the allies if they need help, and God knows, it seems to me, they need it now.

I think, Mr. President, the hardest blow ought to be struck first. It is with nations and with armies as it is with the prize fighter, the one who hits the first blow usually wins.

Mr. REED. It is the fellow that hits the last blow.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, Mr. President, I do not think anybody will ever accuse me of being very strongly pro-British. I guess I have said as much against Great Britain as anybody. It is not that I dislike the British people as individuals. I think a great deal of them individually and collectively, but I have never been a great admirer of their Government. But in this crisis the fight of Great Britain and the allies is the fight of the United States, and any differences I may have had are buried, and it ought to be so with all of us. We ought to be willing to give up not only our property but our lives in order that in this great contest, the greatest that was ever waged on this planet, America's voice may be heard at the council board of the nations when the terms of peace come to be settled.

Mr. President, let us not haggle here about the volunteer system or the compulsory system. Let us take that system which the world has taught us in the last analysis must be adopted in order to win the fight. It is the cause of democracy against autocracy. It is a fight for the government of the people, by the people, and for the people against despotic power. If this war has done nothing else, it has made one of the despotic thrones of Europe totter to its foundations; and, if we are to believe what we see in the press to-day another is tottering on its base. I hope the time is not far distant when the people of Germany and her allies will understand that they are now fighting against their own liberties, while the fight of America and her allies is their fight as well as their own.

Mr. President, when we start out on this let us select that method of maintaining an army which is best of all and which the history of the ages has shown is the only one that can last through a prolonged struggle.

To adopt the draft system, it is urged, is a violation of the traditions of this country. The distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] this afternoon made that statement more than once, and I have heard others make it. Mr. President, it is in line with the traditions of this country, not in violation of them. I have shown that Washington recommended it three times and that the Continental Congress adopted it; and, unless my statement about it may be questioned, I call the attention of the Senate to the statement of Dr. Chaney, of the University of Pennsylvania, who is a pacifist and a Quaker and a teacher of history in the University of Pennsylvania. In his testimony before the House Committee on Military Affairs he admitted that Washington had recommended the draft three times. Not only that, but it has been tried in nearly every State in this Union.

Thirty-eight States have legislation which authorizes the draft. The military act of 1909 of Tennessee has this stringent draft provision:

SEC. 6. That when it is necessary to call out any portion of the reserve militia for active duty the governor shall direct his order to the sheriff of the county, who shall forthwith by written order or oral notice to each individual, or by proclamation, appoint a time and place for the assembling of the reserve militia at the county seat, and shall then and there draft as many thereof or accept as many volunteers as are required by the order of the Commander in Chief, and shall forthwith forward to him a list of the persons so drafted or accepted as volunteers.

Can it be possible that the General Staff of the Army and the War College, when the pending bill was prepared by them, had the Tennessee act before them, or did they have the act of some other State?

Mr. BRADY and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. All we are asking is for the privilege of volunteering, and in the very bill the Senator read——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The privilege is given here for 600,000 to volunteer if they desire.

Mr. REED. Give a man a chance to volunteer under the volunteer system.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. You will find that the man who is insisting on the volunteer system ordinarily is the man who does not want to volunteer or fight. I do not refer to the Senator, of course. I am speaking of the slackers on the street who are continually denouncing the draft system. They do not want to fight, and consequently will not volunteer.

Mr. BRADY. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was reading from the Tennessee act of 1909, chapter 400, page 1410, and following. Some good Tennesseean felt impelled to assure me that the pending bill did not violate the traditions of Tennessee. Yet I think the distinguished Senator from Tennessee was rather disposed to feel that it is violating the traditions. The draft provision here is not very much stricter than that in Tennessee. If they did not have the draft system, they could not get along in some of these States.

Now let us go further. Let us see if the selective draft violates the traditions of this country.

Washington, in a letter to the President of the Continental Congress, when he was thoroughly impressed by actual experience with the undependability of the volunteer system, said:

It is the true policy of America not to content herself with temporary expedients, but to endeavor, if possible, to give consistency and solidity to her measures. An essential step to this will be immediately to devise a plan and put it in execution for providing men in time to replace those who will leave us at the end of the year and for subsisting the officers and soldiers and making them a reasonable allowance. The plan for this purpose ought to be of general operation and such as will execute itself. Experience has shown that a peremptory draft will be the only effectual one. If a draft for the war or for three years can be effected, it ought to be made on every account. A shorter period than a year is inadmissible. To one who has been witness to the evils brought upon us by short enlistments, the system appears to have been pernicious beyond description, and a crowd of motives present themselves to dictate a change. It may easily be shown that all the misfortunes we have met with in the military line are to be attributed to this cause.

Nor have the ill effects been confined to the military line. A great part of the embarrassments in the civil departments flow from the same source. The derangement of our finances is essentially to be ascribed to it. The expenses of the war and the paper emissions have been greatly multiplied by it. We have had, a great part of the time, two sets of men to feed and pay—the discharged men going home and the levies coming in. This was more remarkably the case in 1775 and 1776. The difficulty and cost of engaging men have increased at every successive attempt, till among the present levies we find there are some who have received $150 in specie for five months' service, while our officers are reduced to the disagreeable necessity of performing the duties of drill sergeants to them, with this mortifying reflection annexed to the business, that by the time they have taught those men the rudiments of a soldier's duty their services will have expired and the work recommenced with a new set. The consumption of provisions, arms, accouterments, and stores of every kind has been doubled in spite of every precaution I could use, not only from the cause just mentioned, but from the carelessness and licentiousness incident to militia and irregular troops. Our discipline also has been much hurt, if not ruined.

And, again, in a letter dated November 18, 1779, to the President of the Congress he said:

In the more early stages of the contest, when men might have enlisted for the war, no man, as my whole conduct and the uniform tenor of my letters will evince, was ever more opposed to short enlistments than I was, and while there remained a prospect of obtaining recruits upon a permanent footing in the first instance, as far as duty and a regard to my station would permit, I urged my sentiments in favor of it. But the prospect of keeping up an army by voluntary enlistments being changed, or at least standing on too precarious and uncertain a footing to depend on for the exigency of our affairs, I took the liberty in February, 1778, in a particular manner to lay before the Committee of Arrangement, then with the Army at Valley Forge, a plan for an annual draft as the surest and most certain, if not the only means left us of maintaining the Army on a proper and respectable ground. And, more and more confirmed in propriety of this opinion by the intervention of a variety of circumstances unnecessary to detail, I again took the freedom of urging the plan to the committee of conference in January last; and, having reviewed it in every point of light and found it right, or at least the best that has occurred to me, I hope I shall be excused by Congress for offering it to them, and in time for carrying it into execution for the next year, if they should conceive it necessary for the States to complete their quotas of troops.

The plan I would propose is that each State be informed by Congress annually of the real deficiency of its troops, and called upon to make up, or such less specific number as Congress may think proper, by a draft; that the men drafted join the Army by the 1st of January and serve until the 1st of January in the succeeding year; that from the time the drafts join the Army the officers of the States from which they come be authorized and directed to use their endeavors to enlist them for the war under the bounties to the officers themselves and the recruits granted by the act of the 23d of January last, namely, $10 to the officers for each recruit and $200 to the recruits themselves; that all State, county, and town bounties to drafts, if practicable, be entirely abolished, on account of the uneasiness and disorders they create among the soldiers, the desertions they produce, and for other reasons which will readily occur; that on or before the 1st of October annually an abstract or return similar to the present one be transmitted to Congress, to enable them to make their requisitions to each State with certainty and precision.

These statements of Washington were made, it will be observed, near the close of the war and at a time when he had come to the sad realization of the fact that it was impossible for him to maintain a dependable force without some sort of compulsion. Nothing is more prominent in all of his letters to the Continental Congress than this fact, and all of his letters indulge in criticism of the system then in vogue for maintaining an army in the field.

Mr. President, that is what we are pleading for here. Let us begin by creating in this emergency an army which can be made permanent, as Washington so forcefully suggested.

No man knows, Mr. President, what the morrow may bring forth. The war now waging broke out in the still watches of a night, and the whole world has been aflame ever since. Europe and other parts of the civilized world have been reddened by the blood of men as brave as any who ever faced each other in mortal combat.

Talk about our isolation protecting us, Mr. President, and the impossibility of transporting troops to our shores. It took longer in the Civil War to transport a few regiments of Infantry from here to Fredericksburg than it now takes to bring a vessel carrying three to five thousand men from Europe to America. We are not living in the past. We are living in the progressive to-day; and there is no friend outside of the allies in Europe upon whom America can rely in time of emergency.

Now, let me call attention to the reason which induced the Continental Congress to resort to the draft. Greene, in his History of the American Revolution, says on page 290:

The States were "required forthwith to fill up by drafts, from their militia or in any other way that shall be effectual, their respective battalions of Continental troops." Having no power to enforce its decree, this resolution of Congress had no more effect than its predecessors, but Washington's personal appeals, combined with the news of the French alliance, succeeded in bringing out enough men to carry on the war.

Now note this:

It continued in this way to the end, Congress passing futile resolutions and Washington raising men and carrying on the war by the mere strength of his personal character.

Where were your volunteers who were willing to come to the front to save their country from the British yoke?

Mr. REED. Where were your conscripts?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We did not have any. Washington asked for them and the Continental Congress attempted to give them. The States had draft laws, and with all this legislation and with all the resources at hand for getting these gentlemen into the ranks, Washington could not keep up his depleted columns. The partial failure of the draft was due to the fact that the Continental Congress had no power to legislate so as to enforce it.

What was suggested in lieu of an effective draft law? Why the usual inefficient bounty system to induce volunteering?

The States paid bounties; the Government was promising volunteers land—100 acres to each man and more than that to the officers—to get both officers and men to stay in the ranks. Even that failed to accomplish the purpose.

Washington, in one of these letters, calls attention to the fact of the weakness of militia; and my distinguished friend from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who lives very close to the point, will remember that when Montgomery and his men were about to assault Quebec, the period of the enlistment of Montgomery's army was soon to expire. He knew from the experience which he had had with the troops in the United States that if he tried to hold his men after their enlistment expired not a single man would stay with him. He was forced, therefore, to make the attack before he was fully prepared to do so. Washington has told us that the vicious system then in force for maintaining an army not only cost us the life of the brave Montgomery but the loss of Canada as well. Washington ought to be pretty good authority, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator is relating some interesting history, but there is one chapter of history on which I love to dwell and which I should like to repeat in a few words.

When Washington was in the sorest possible straits; when it was deemed very probable that we would lose the contest with Great Britain, John Langdon, of Portsmouth, N. H., a merchant, then the speaker of the New Hampshire House of Representatives and, by the way, the first President pro tempore of this body, gave all his money, all his plate, and the contents of his cellar to the cause of the Colonies upon condition that John Stark should be called upon to rally the militia of the State and proceed to Bennington to save the valuable military stores that were there collected.

John Stark undertook the task. He started across the fields and through the woods of New Hampshire; he called around him 1,200 volunteers on his way to Bennington. With those 1,200 volunteers he fought that great battle, won the victory, saved the military stores of Bennington, and paved the way for the surrender of Cornwallis, which came not long afterwards.

Mr. President, I think the Senator from Oregon means to do exact justice to the volunteers in the Revolutionary War. While Washington undoubtedly did deem it necessary, or thought it was necessary, to advise conscription, the volunteers at Lexington, at Concord, at Bennington, at Trenton, at Saratoga, and in all those contests that took place during the Revolutionary War acquitted themselves with a valor that was the admiration of the world then, and is the admiration of the world now.

When we remember that John Stark said to his volunteers that he had gathered up as he traveled from his sawmill on the banks of the Merrimack River, in Manchester, N. H., to Bennington, as tradition says he did, "See, there are the redcoats! Before night they are ours, or Molly Stark is a widow." Responding to the call of their brave commander, they went at the British troops and defeated them gloriously. Surely we ought to pay tribute to those men, and not have it made to appear that we could then have had a better army, for we certainly could not have had a better army under the conditions that then existed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I tried to state at the outset that I did not question the patriotism of the volunteer, and I do not question the fact that there were some of the most brilliant battles in history fought by volunteers during the Revolution. Ordinarily I do not like to refer to these things, and I would not refer to them in this RECORD to-day but for the fact that it is sought to be made to appear here that the Revolution was entirely won by the volunteer system. I am talking about the system, rather than the individuals who go to make it up. This was the system at Quebec. Think of the cost of it there—the life of one of Washington's most gallant generals, in his own language, and the loss of Canada to the United States. The Senator from New Hampshire, I presume, would not question that at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. No.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If Washington is to be trusted, that was the system in use. I am not questioning the gallantry of the men.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I want to say that we could not, under those conditions, have had any different system.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, yes. I will say to the Senator that Washington tried to have a different system created, but they would not let him have his way.

Mr. GALLINGER. He tried to have conscription, but that would not have secured better soldiers than the volunteers. Whether they were conscripts or volunteers, they would have equally been untrained men.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He tried to get that system. Washington said he did not know how long the war might be prolonged, and he wanted to get an army that he could depend on if it was to be prolonged.

I know how unpopular it is to talk thus about our ancestors in the Revolution and to intimate a doubt as to either the gallantry of the men or the weakness of the volunteer system, and I do it reluctantly.

Here, Mr. President, we are confronting a crisis that demands that Congress shall do its best to provide for an army, not a temporary one, but for an army that shall be a permanent one so long as this war lasts. We could not train this army under six months or a year. The crack regiments of Canada went into British training camps and trained for eight months before Lord Kitchener would let them go across the English Channel. Why? Mr. President, it would simply have meant what Gen. Lee, of Revolutionary fame, said, that to undertake to take an army of untrained men against regular forces simply meant murder. It would have been criminal. Kitchener knew that better than anybody else.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield first to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. For the purpose of the RECORD, I want to ask one question of the Senator from Oregon. During the debate this evening the Senator made one observation that I think he probably would not have made if he had dwelt upon it a little while, because it was an echo of what certain newspapers are saying, that there are obstructive tactics in the Senate, and that this bill is being held back by men who really do not want to see an army established.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire, I am sure, will acquit me of ever making such a suggestion as that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator made it in a very veiled way.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not mean to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. But if the Senator will look at his speech in the RECORD to-morrow morning he will see that he did make an observation of that kind.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not mean to do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply want that the country may know the facts; that is all the purpose I have about it. I want to say to the Senator that this bill was reported only eight days ago from his committee; one Sunday has intervened, and the bill has been debated seven days. The Senator would not say to me, to the Senate, or to the country that that is an unusual length of time to debate an important bill like this.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. And those of us who have been contending for a volunteer army, as the Senator knows, some of us at least, have been very anxious to get this bill to a vote; and I am one of them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have taken very little time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire and to the country that there has not been any disposition at any time on either side of the Chamber to filibuster against this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or to unduly delay it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Or to unduly delay it. I know it is not in the heart of a single Senator on either side of this Chamber to do anything that would cripple the good right arm of the President of the United States in this emergency, and I want to commend my friends on the other side for the fact that there has not been a single display of politics or partisanship in any part of this discussion.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, can we not go a step further and have an understanding that we all want a permanent army during the war, and that the sole matter of dispute between us is whether the best way to get that army is by volunteers, and if volunteers fail then to resort to conscription, or whether it is better to resort to conscription at first? That is the sole difference between the two sides.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the issue. Those of us who take the side I do feel that the best way to get an army for an emergency such as this is to start out, as Washington said, to get a permanent army right in the beginning, and not to wait for one system to break down and then to start out to create a permanent army. Senators on the other side say that they can do that by first giving men an opportunity to volunteer. That is the question. I am the last man in the world, Mr. President, to suggest that we have not the same purpose in view, which is to do what is best for our country. The Senators who disagree with me have the same motives and their hearts beat with the same patriotic impulses as mine. I know that, and I shall never let an occasion pass to deny the charge against my colleagues in the Senate when it is made against them that they are undertaking to hinder or defeat this legislation.

Mr. President, getting back to the draft again, I am calling attention to these things because I want to show that my friends are in error when they talk about the draft being contrary to the traditions of our Republic.

In the War of 1812 the Legislature of Kentucky, another great Southern Commonwealth, adopted a resolution prior to the declaration of war appealing to Congress to enact a draft law. Ah, Mr. President, it was in the course of the discussion at that time that Webster made his great speech, and I have not any doubt that his eloquence and his magnificent appearance had much to do with defeating legislation which would have ended that war very much sooner, according to every military historian whom I have been able to read. The eloquence of Webster and those who stood by him in his opposition to the draft law prolonged the war. With thousands of troops far outnumbering the British troops at all times, it took us a long while to settle the controversy at the sacrifice of millions in blood and treasure. But Kentucky did not think that it was contrary to the traditions of the country. We have 48 States now. Here is one which took action before the War of 1812, and in all 38 States out of 48 have draft laws on their statute books at this time.

I stated, in a colloquy with my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. REED] the other day in this Chamber, that I was not standing on Garrison soil, but rather on Jefferson soil when I said that Jefferson rather favored the draft. In order to show what that statement was based on, I call attention to a letter from Jefferson to Secretary of War Dearborn, dated September 21, 1805. In reading this I want the Senate to bear in mind that, with this letter to the Secretary of War, he inclosed a proposed law for compulsory service both as to the Navy and as to the Army. So that, taking the two together, we must conclude, with some other utterances of Jefferson, that he favored compulsory service. Now note what he said:

> Considering that the important thing is to keep the militia classes so that we may get at the young for a year's service at a time, and that training may be supplied after they are all called out, I think we may give up every part of the bill which respects training and arming. Let us once get possession of the principle, and future Congresses will train and arm. In this way we get rid of all those enemies to the bill to whom different details would be objectionable. I send to you the bill thus modified and I have thrown in a few words in the clause beginning with the words "The junior class shall be liable," etc., in order that the law may execute itself without waiting for any legislature. Will you be so good as to communicate it to Gen. Varnum and Mr. Bidwell? The sooner the better.

Two acts, one affecting the Navy and the other affecting the Army, are set out in the work of Jefferson, and I challenge anybody to say that they do not involve the principles for which we are contending here. Jefferson realized the situation, Mr. President. In his message to Congress he was calling attention to the conditions that existed, which were almost exactly like the conditions which exist to-day. There were pirates on the sea; Spain and Great Britain and other powers were destroying our commerce. If it was not so late, I would call attention to his message. He called attention to conditions that were almost parallel with the conditions which confront us now, with the single exception that the conditions of to-day are not only destroying our commerce, but they are destroying our lives. That is the difference; and yet Jefferson, with the same strong arm that President Wilson has been using in this struggle, was reaching out to see to it that our country should be protected as well as the lives of our citizens. He was proposing to do just what Mr. Wilson is proposing to do now, and that is to have a bill enacted into law that would create what Washington demanded and what every military expert since the Revolution has demanded, and that is a bill that would create a permanent Army to be used—I do not mean a large standing Army; I mean a permanent system. Now, look at his message.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Of course the Senator from Oregon will not claim that the pending measure creates in any sense a permanent system?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, no.

Mr. WATSON. I honor the Senator from Oregon for the very great, effective, and consistent work he has accomplished in favor of a permanent system; but, of course, this bill does not pretend to provide for a permanent system.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not at all; it only makes provision during this war.

Mr. WATSON. That must come later, if it is ever to be provided.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Jefferson, in his message to Congress on December 3, 1805, after reciting the outrages that were being perpetrated against our shipping and against our country as well, and to which I will not call attention, said:

> Whether it will be necessary to augment our land forces will be decided by occurrences probably in the course of your session.

That is what is happening here. Two epochs in history could hardly be more alike than the epoch of 1805 and the present one, and the actions of the two great Presidents more alike than those of any other two men that this Republic ever produced.

> In the meantime you will consider whether it would not be expedient for a state of peace as well as of war so to organize or class the militia as would enable us on any sudden emergency to call for the services of the younger portions, unencumbered with the old and those having families.

Then he goes on and cites how many men are liable to service. Mr. President, that is exactly what this bill does. It takes the young men between 19 and 25 and undertakes to do for them just exactly what Jefferson did, so as to have a force that we may call on in time of emergency. The only difference between that time and this is that we were not then engaged in war, and I think Jefferson's prompt action had much to do with staying the ravages of war.

President Lincoln, great and patriotic man that he was, did not entertain any fear that a draft law would violate the traditions of his country. When he fully realized, as did Washington, by actual experience that the volunteer method of recruiting the Army was sure to fail if the war was prolonged he advocated and urged the enactment of a draft law. When this law was enacted and opposition to its enforcement developed he prepared an address to the American people which was never published because he questioned the propriety of so reaching the people, but it has been preserved and presented by Nicolay and Hay in their "Life of Lincoln" as having been copied from Lincoln's own manuscript. He advocated the draft both from principle and from expediency as the fairest and most equitable method of creating an army. I quote an extract from it and beg that all he had to say upon the subject might be read by the American people in the emergency which confronts them. He said amongst other things:

> It is at all times proper that misunderstanding between the public and the public servant should be avoided; and this is far more important now than in times of peace and tranquillity. I therefore address you without searching for a precedent upon which to do so. Some of you are sincerely devoted to the republican institutions and territorial integrity of our country, and yet are opposed to what is called the draft, or conscription.
> At the beginning of the war, and ever since, a variety of motives, pressing, some in one direction and some in the other, would be presented to the mind of each man physically fit for a soldier, upon the combined effect of which motives he would, or would not, voluntarily enter the service. Among these motives would be patriotism, political bias, ambition, personal courage, love of adventure, want of employment, and convenience, or the opposite of some of these. We already have, and have had, in the service, as appears, substantially all that can be obtained upon this voluntary weighing of motives. And yet we must somehow obtain more, or relinquish the original object of the contest, together with all the blood and treasure already expended in the effort to secure it. To meet this necessity the law for the draft has been enacted. You who do not wish to be soldiers do not like this law. This is natural; nor does it imply want of patriotism. Nothing can be so just and necessary as to make us like it if it is disagreeable to us. We are prone, too, to find false arguments with which to excuse ourselves for opposing such disagreeable things. In this case, those who desire the rebellion to succeed, and others who seek reward in a different way, are very active in accommodating us with this class of arguments. * * *
> The republican institutions and territorial integrity of our country can not be maintained without the further raising and supporting of armies. There can be no army without men. Men can be had only voluntarily or involuntarily. We have ceased to obtain them voluntarily, and to obtain them involuntarily is the draft—the conscription. If you dispute this fact and declare that men can still be had voluntarily in sufficient numbers, prove the assertion by yourselves volunteering in such numbers, and I shall gladly give up the draft. Or if not a sufficient number, but any one of you will volunteer, he for his single self will escape all the horrors of the draft, and will thereby do only what each one of at least a million of his manly brethren have already done. Their toil and blood have been given as much for you as for themselves. Shall it all be lost rather than that you, too, will bear your part?

I do not say that all who would avoid serving in the war are unpatriotic; but I do think every patriot should willingly take his chance under a law, made with great care, in order to secure entire fairness. This law was considered, discussed, modified, and amended by Congress at great length, and with much labor, and was finally passed by both branches with a near approach to unanimity. At last, it may not be exactly such as any one man out of Congress, or even in Congress, would have made it. It has been said, and I believe truly, that the Constitution itself is not altogether such as any one of its framers would have preferred. It was the joint work of all, and certainly the better that it was so. * * *

The principle of draft, which simply is involuntary or enforced service, is not new. It has been practiced in all ages of the world. It was well known to the framers of our Constitution as one of the modes of raising armies at the time they placed in that instrument the provision that "the Congress shall have power to raise and support armies." It had been used just before in establishing our independence, and it was also used under the Constitution in 1812. Wherein is the peculiar hardship now? Shall we shrink from the necessary means to maintain our free Government which our grandfathers employed to establish it and our own fathers have already employed once to maintain it? Are we degenerate? Has the manhood of our race run out?

Again, a law may be both constitutional and expedient, and yet may be administered in an unjust and unfair way. This law belongs to a class, which class is composed of those laws whose object is to distribute burdens or benefits on the principle of equality. No one of these laws can ever be practically administered with that exactness which can be conceived of in the mind. A tax law, the principle of which is that each owner shall pay in proportion to the value of his property, will be a dead letter if no one can be compelled to pay until it can be shown that every other one will pay in precisely the same proportion, according to value; nay, even it will be a dead letter if no one can be compelled to pay until it is certain that every other one will pay at all—even in unequal proportion. Again, the United States House of Representatives is constituted on the principle that each Member is sent by the same number of people that each other is sent by; and yet, in practice, no two of the whole number, much less the whole number, are ever sent by precisely the same number of constituents. The districts can not be made precisely equal in population at first, and if they could they would become unequal in a single day, and much more so in the 10 years which the districts, once made, are to continue. They can not be remodeled every day, nor, without too much expense and labor, even every year.

This sort of difficulty applies in full force to the practical administration of the draft law. In fact, the difficulty is greater in the case of the draft law. First, it starts with all the inequality of the congressional districts; but these are based on entire population, while the draft is based on those only who are fit for soldiers and such may not bear the same proportion to the whole in one district that they do in another. Again, the facts must be ascertained and credit given for the unequal numbers of soldiers which have already gone from the several districts. In all of these points errors will occur in spite of the utmost fidelity. The Government is bound to administer the law with such an approach to exactness as is usual in analogous cases and as entire good faith and fidelity will reach. If so great departures as to be inconsistent with such good faith and fidelity, or great departures occurring in any way, be pointed out, they shall be corrected; and any agent shown to have caused such departures intentionally shall be dismissed.

With these views and on these principles I feel bound to tell you it is my purpose to see the draft law faithfully executed.

Now, Mr. President, let us see what Gen. Grant says about this. He ought to be pretty good authority. I call attention to his Memoirs, at page 547. We can all think of him now, suffering the pangs of an incurable disease that was culminating rapidly, while his brain was undertaking to leave a memorial to the people and to his country, and at the same time to provide for the support of his family as well as liquidate obligations he had incurred—brave and courageous in death, just as he had been in life, fearless and truthful under all circumstances, and doing what he deemed to be best for his country and his kind. Says Gen. Grant:

To maintain peace in the future it is necessary to be prepared for war. There can scarcely be a possible chance of a conflict such as the last one occurring among our own people again; but, growing as we are in population, wealth, and military power, we may become the envy of nations which led us in all these particulars only a few years ago; and unless we are prepared for it we may be in danger of a combined movement being some day made to crush us out. Now, scarcely 20 years after the war, we seem to have forgotten the lessons it taught and are going on as if in the greatest security, without the power to resist an invasion by the fleets of fourth-rate European powers for a time until we could prepare for them.

Think of it! He could not have predicted more truthfully the condition of to-day than he has outlined it in that concluding paragraph of his Memoirs. So we are to-day, Mr. President, doing just exactly what he speaks of, amongst nations who may envy our wealth in this emergency and who may combine to destroy us; and we are moving along with a feeling of perfect security as though nothing was likely to happen and nothing ever could happen.

Mr. President, the map of the world may be changed in the twinkling of an eye. In my opinion, those against whom we are pitted would not hesitate a moment to take America, if they win out in this controversy, and parcel it out among themselves, as they proposed to parcel it out to the neighbors on the southern border a short while ago, and thus recuperate and indemnify themselves for the losses they have sustained in this conflict. Where else shall they look for so magnificent a prize? The countries with whom they are now engaged are so depleted in their resources that they can not expect indemnity from them, and the taking possession of the empires ranged against them would not compensate them for the losses they have sustained.

Mr. President, is the fact of compulsion against our system? I asked the distinguished Ambassador of the Argentine Republic some time ago what they thought of universal military training and service in his country, and he said to me, "We look upon three things as the basis of our prosperity and of our liberty—that is, compulsory education, compulsory military training and service, and compulsory voting." They have a progressive and patriotic people in Argentina; and the time ought to come here when we will follow their example and have not only compulsory education and compulsory military training, but compulsory voting. I have had men come to me and denounce officials that had been elected to office; business men, lawyers, bankers, denouncing the lack of intelligence upon the part of the people because they had elected this man or that man to office; and 99 times out of 100, if you will ask them if they voted, they will say "No." Now, if there is rascality and scoundrelism in office, it is due to these business men who do not go to the polls and vote, and they ought to be compelled to vote. It is a duty that they owe to their country just as well as the duty of serving in the Army.

But that is a digression. We have compulsory education. I can remember that when it began to be discussed in this country it was just as bitterly assailed as compulsory service, absolutely. Men would go on the street corners and row about it, and it was not very hard to get up a gun fight in some parts of the West when they talked about taking their children out of their homes by force and crowding these children into the public schools. But now who would abandon it? Who would abandon it?

I predict, Mr. President, that if we adopt universal military service this country never will abandon it, for the reason that it will strengthen the young men, teach them discipline that they know nothing about now, and inspire a love of country which has almost departed from the young men to-day.

Violate traditions? Why, we are violating them all the time, Mr. President. Since I have been in this distinguished body I have heard men say that we should never depart from the pathway blazed by the fathers of the Republic; and yet we find those pathways abandoned as conditions change and as our people desire changes in governmental life.

I remember how the election of Senators by direct vote of the people was opposed. Did that violate the traditions of the fathers? Some distinguished men said so.

Why, Mr. President, they talk about prohibition. I can remember the time that if one dared talk about prohibiting the sale of liquor in a town or in a county or in a State you were charged with "violating the rights of a freeman. A freeman ought to be permitted to drink whenever he pleased, where he pleased, and what he pleased. Nobody had any right to pass any sumptuary law that would control him." That was a tradition that was handed down to us not only from the other side of the water but on this side. But we have departed from that tradition, Mr. President, and they are regulating the liquor traffic, and not only regulating it—that was the first step—but now they have begun to prohibit its manufacture or sale, and the people found out that it was necessary to violate a tradition in order to protect our country. One State after another has fallen into the prohibition column. You bring up the prohibition amendment here, and when my friend, the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], gets it up you will hear men talking about violating the rights of the people and trespassing upon the liberty of the citizen; but, while I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, I predict that in the lifetime of most of us here present national prohibition will be the law of this land.

Oh, yes; it is all right to talk about violating traditions. Here is another proposition. I can remember 40 years ago, when as a young man, I was talking for woman suffrage—why, that was revolutionary. "Why, the constitutions of the land and its traditions do not allow women any voice in the affairs of this Government." Gradually the States commenced to give woman her rights. Finally they gave her the same rights of property that men had and the same rights of contract. For a long time the husband and wife were one, as Blackstone defined the relationship, and the husband was the one. [Laughter.] They gradually got away from that. Now they have so far departed from the tradition that they are still one, but the woman is the one. [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, one State after another has forgotten these old constitutional landmarks, and now we find that nearly all the States are adopting woman suffrage; and I say again that while I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet I predict that the time is not far distant, and it will probably be in the lifetime of some of us here now, when woman suffrage will be adopted as a national proposition rather than as a State proposition.

Why, I could call attention to a great many traditions from which we have departed, and always with changing conditions and in the interest of the American people.

Mr. President, I am taking more time than I intended to take, but there are one or two things that I can not resist the temptation to speak about.

It has been the custom of our friends here, some of them, to denounce the Regular Army. Is there any wonder that the uniform of our country is not respected by the men on the street? Can you wonder that when one of these brave boys, with his country's uniform, goes into a theater or into a café insult is offered him when you find in the Senate Chamber here men who are denouncing the Army? It must not be forgotten that the Regular Army of the United States at all times, in peace and in war, is a volunteer army, under strict rules and regulations, of course, and under strict discipline and conditions that you can not get in militia forces as a rule. Not only are these enlisted men sometimes denounced and insulted when they go out in uniform, but I have heard men say that the Army officers themselves were all autocratic martinets and upstarts. Was there ever a more unjust charge than that?

Why, Mr. President, West Point has, as officers in the Regular Army, a little more than 50 per cent, and, mind you, these officers that graduate at West Point are young fellows that come from the factory and from the farm and from behind the counter. One of the brightest boys who ever went from my State and graduated from West Point was the son of a poor locksmith. Others have come from the farm, and nearly all of them are poor, but patriotic young follows. They are of the same blood as you and I, American boys. Why should they lose their Americanism when they go into the West Point Academy? And then the half of the commissioned personnel of the United States Army that did not come from West Point—where did they come from? They came from your little community and mine. They came off the farm; they came from the same places as these boys that go into West Point and graduate; and yet we find men here denouncing them as holding themselves above the enlisted men whom they control.

Mr. President, it ought not to be true. It is not true. I saw a young fellow passing through the lobby here the other day in a private's uniform and I could not resist the temptation to put my hand on his shoulder and tell him I was glad to see him in his country's uniform.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. WATSON. I have heard the most of the speeches that have been made during this debate, and I have not heard anybody denounce the Regular Army or anybody connected with it. Is the Senator quite sure that anybody on the floor has denounced them?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know that I have heard it to-day, but I have heard it. I have heard it on the floor of the Senate, and I have heard it in the cloakroom.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. During this debate I have heard it in the cloakroom; and if the Senator will sit out here at almost any time he can hear criticisms of the Army, officers, and enlisted men that are wholly unjustified by the facts.

Mr. WATSON. I have listened to this debate, and I have not heard at any time anything but praise of the Army. Of course I have not been over in the cloakroom of our friends; but so far as our cloakroom is concerned I have heard nothing of that kind, publicly or privately, spoken at any time by anybody, under any circumstances.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Why, I do not know that I have heard it to-day, but I have heard very unkind things said about them all.

Mr. WATSON. Of course, I accept what the Senator says, because he tells the truth. I was wondering who had said it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Whenever I am in doubt, I tell the truth. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. I have no doubt of that, or that the Senator will do so whether he is in doubt or not. Perhaps the Senator may not often be in doubt. [Laughter.]

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I remind the Senator from Oregon that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], in the very able speech which he made this afternoon, adverted to the caste, as I understood him, that existed in the Army, and gave some personal illustrations; notably, one in which officers of the Army had refused at a hotel to have privates seated at the same hotel and insisted that if they were permitted to partake of the hospitality of the hotel in the same room screens should be erected to separate the officers from the soldiers.

Mr. WATSON. I think that in his remarks the Senator from New Mexico animadverted somewhat upon that idea of caste manifested at times in the Army. He said he had seen that; but there was no attempt, I think, on his part to criticize in anywise the Regular Army or anybody connected with it, and I was just wondering where the Senator had heard the remarks.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, I have heard them many times. I have heard them in public addresses; and while I do not recall any particular instances of such suggestion made right in this debate, I have heard them frequently.

I have heard the integrity of officers of the Army called in question more than once, in private conversation with men who ought not to have done so; but I call attention to the fact that no body of men in the United States of equal number have so honestly conducted the business of the Government as they. I remember now only one case of a defalcation that amounted to anything, and that one man was prosecuted and sent to prison. It speaks well for the Army that since the birth of the Republic they have maintained a record for faithful, efficient, and honest service. They spend millions and millions of dollars of the people's money every year and faithfully account for every cent. They have been taken from the Army and detailed for civilian duties in Cuba, in the Philippines, in Panama, in Porto Rico, and in far-away places to take charge of and establish civil governments, and we never have had anything but the best account of them.

One of the Senators said the other day, "It is getting so that you have to salute a military uniform." I hope the time will come, when we see our boys marching along the street, that no good American will hesitate for a minute to take off his hat to the young fellow that is in uniform. I am not afraid of militarism in this country, where those who are voting for the expenditure of the people's money have to go to the people every two years and where Congress is restrained by the Constitution from appropriating money for a longer time than two years. If we become a militaristic power, then it will be because the people of America have decided to change their form of government.

The Declaration of Independence recognizes the right of a people, whenever they see fit to do so, to change their form of government; but I have no fears of the American people. After the Civil War the finest body of men that ever were gotten together to fight returned to their homes and were absorbed by the communities to which they severally belonged, and nobody could have told, except in cases where there was destruction and devastation and suffering as the result of war, that these men ever had worn a uniform. This was in some part due to the splendid example set by Gen. Lee on the one side and the generous magnanimity of Gen. Grant on the other. Who can forget the lesson of Appomattox when Lee surrendered his sword to Grant and had it tendered back to him by the conquering hero with a dignity and grace that won for him the plaudits of the world? Who does not remember how the men of the Confederate Army were permitted to retain their horses in order that they might go back to their farms to be absorbed by the communities that they had left, and which had become devasted and ruined?

Ah! Mr. President, with such a people as that there is no danger of militarism. We find here in the Senate, as there may be found in the House of Representatives and as there may be found in every branch of the Government service, men who 50 years ago were pitted against each other in deadly strife now sitting shoulder to shoulder, endeavoring to give the best and most patriotic service that is in them to their country and to the maintenance of its honor and integrity, those who participated on the northern side vying with those who participated on the southern side in an effort to do, under all circumstances, what is best to be done in every emergency.

Now, it is said that the General Staff comes here every year and undertakes to get Congress to reverse itself because, as it is charged, the General Staff has reversed itself. Mr. President, if a man gets sick and wants somebody to help him, does he send for a blacksmith or a carpenter? When our country becomes involved in dangers and in war do we go to the statesman or to the politician or to the man in civil life to ask him what ought to be done where, as in this case, our Government is in danger of destruction? Oh, no; we go to the men who have made a study of war and the massing and mobilization of troops their life work.

The General Staff, through the proper channels, presents its recommendations to Congress. The Congress refuses to adopt them, and either so modifies the recommendations as to fail to accomplish what is proposed or refuses to act at all. Then the General Staff comes at the next session to Congress and proposes to conform to recommendations which will make a consistent military plan. The Congress again fails to adopt their recommendations. The result is that no consistent plan is ever adopted; and now it is charged the General Staff does not know what it wants. The fact is, Congress does not know what legislation will best create an efficient army. Can the General Staff therefore be charged with reversing itself, as has been charged on the floor of the Senate, because it raps at the door of Congress in order to best serve its country? This is not only the situation now, but it has been since the days of Washington.

Now, as evidence of what I have said, I do not have to go back very far into our military history. In 1876 to 1878 successive committees of Congress undertook the subject of the reorganization of the Army, and much testimony was taken.

In 1878 a committee was formed composed of three Senators and five Representatives to consider the whole subject of the reorganization of the Army. All of its members had served in the Civil War. Gen. Burnside and Gen. M. C. Butler were two of the members of the Senate committee, and Gen. Garfield was one of the members of the House committee. Such generals as Hancock, McDowell, McClellan, Terry, Pope, Ord, Hazen, and Hunt were called upon to submit their views together with a draft of a bill to carry them into effect. The chiefs of staff departments were likewise distinguished officers of the Army and submitted their views, but as had been the case before that time, with a voluminous report and forms of bills submitted to them, Congress took no steps to carry out the views of these distinguished officers.

If Senators are interested in reading a condensed history of the war, and what is necessary to an army, they ought to read the report of that committee, replete in recommendations from these Regular and Volunteer officers who had been through the Civil War and knew whereof they spoke.

I will not refer to the intervening reports, but coming down to 1912, which brings us nearer home, the General Staff worked out a plan of Army reorganization at great length, fortified by facts as they saw them. What did Congress do? Nothing. They followed the proverbial policy of doing nothing.

Then again a report was presented by the General Staff in 1915 formulating legislation and suggesting conditions and needs. What did Congress do? They took it up for consideration, but the legislation that they suggested was not enacted. The then Secretary of War did not recommend it, but something different. I can not say why, but it was not done. The then Secretary of War came up before the Committee on Military Affairs and proposed a different plan, and what did Congress do? They did not take the General Staff plan; they did not take the plan of the Secretary of War, but enacted a sort of military coat of many colors, and crystallized it into a statute. The result is that we have a law now which is the best statute we ever had as affecting the Regular Army, but it is not what it ought to be, and it is not what either the General Staff or the War College or the War Department have wanted from time to time.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator tell us briefly in what respect it did not comply with the recommendation of the War Department?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. One very important and essential thing the Secretary of War recommended was the Continental Army scheme. The General Staff did not recommend anything of the kind.

Mr. REED. I am speaking about the bill that was passed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, so far as the Regular Army is concerned, it is a pretty good bill. It is the best bill, taken altogether, we ever had up to that date. I will say to the Senator what I said the other day: It is not what it ought to be and it was not what the General Staff recommended.

Mr. REED. Both those bills were substantially what the General Staff recommended?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Mr. REED. That is what I am asking.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN Let me call attention to it. I have been a pretty faithful attendant upon the Military Affairs Committee. If the Senator had been there as often and as long as I, probably he would know that the militia end of the national-defense act of June 3, 1916, was formulated by the National Guard themselves.

Mr. REED. That was simply an addition put onto the plan of the Army officers, but did not interfere with their plan. I want simply to get that plain. They got their plan, but Congress had the temerity to still preserve the militia and to insist on writing into the Army board's plan a little of their own ideas by providing for a militia.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator and I had that out here when the national-defense act was up. The Senator has a very much higher opinion of the National Guard than I. I am not questioning the patriotism or courage of the National Guard, but the Senator has more confidence in the system than ever I had. I have been a part of it and I know whereof I speak.

Mr. REED. So have I.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I know it, but the Senator and I formed entirely different conclusions about the effectiveness of the National Guard as a second line of defense. The Senator will remember that we tried to put the very bill that he is insisting on now so strenuously and so eloquently and so ably as a part of the national-defense act of 1916, and the Senator voted against it twice.

Mr. REED. This question was never discussed at that time——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Senator——

Mr. REED. In the light that we are discussing it now. I never voted against a call for volunteers at least in war—never in my life.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that the volunteer act of 1914 to raise volunteers was only applicable and could only be made available by a declaration of Congress after war had been inaugurated. When the continental army scheme came up, Mr. Garrison seemed to be very much wedded to it. It did not seem practical to many of the military experts and we tried to substitute what was known as section 56 of the then pending bill—act June 3, 1916—which very briefly proposed that the volunteer act of 1914 should be utilized in times of war. It was to make available for the purpose of volunteers the very act the Senator wants now.

Mr. REED. That is a different question.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. The Senator says I voted against the volunteer act.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. You voted against making it a part of the national-defense act of June 3, 1916.

Mr. REED. You now say I voted against giving the President authority in the time of profound peace to call out 500,000 volunteers. I plead guilty to that. That is a different kind of a case.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator has a right to change his mind.

Mr. REED. I have not changed it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then you ought to do it.

Mr. REED. Not at all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator, I changed my mind. I have changed my mind about the Army situation a good many times. The Senator is on the committee now, and if the Senator will attend it he will change his mind quite often, too.

Mr. REED. I may change my mind. It is said that nobody but a fool always maintains the exact opinion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I apologize for having taken up so much time. My only excuse for it is because I was subjected to so many interruptions.

I think I have said all I wanted to say, Mr. President, and I yield the floor, expressing the earnest hope that the bill as it has been reported to the Senate, with as few amendments as possible, may be adopted by the Senate, and that we shall do what Washington and every military expert since his day has insisted ought to be done, and that is create a permanent force for the safety of the Republic when it is in danger.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, we all know that an army must be raised, an army sufficient for our needs and commensurate with the man power of the Nation, and we hope to raise it by such methods as will bring the men to the firing line in the best possible condition of mind and body for the performance of effective service.

I am going to discuss this measure as I see it, as it really is here, and not as it has been proclaimed to be throughout this country—deliberately and designedly in a misleading way.

All the papers are saying, "Let us have this universal military service because it is the only system of equality and democracy."

* * * * * * *

"Same obligation rests on all men of military age. * * * Universal service must come without another instant of delay."

* * * * * * *

That is the sort of misleading, false impression that has been designedly created by the lying press; and for what purpose? To compel such Members as desire to think for themselves to support a measure here that has no element of universal service in it and that ought to be defeated.

Now, as to the universal-service proposition. This bill only proposes that boys between the ages of 19 and 25 shall be subjected to this conscript system, this selective-draft system, and it excludes all men from 25 up to 45, the legal age, from military service. That is the universal military service that you talk about requiring by passing this bill.

In the United States there are about 6,000,000 boys between those ages. I say it is undemocratic and unfair and unjust that we should place this burden on those boys at this time and in this way, from the democratic standpoint of equality of right and privilege to all and of special privilege to none. One-fourth of those boys have never been allowed to vote, and "all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." The other three-fourths are between 21 and 25 years of age. How much have they had an opportunity to do in this world of ours? Ah, how much of the blessings of good government and peace have they enjoyed up to now? Every mothers' son of them, all put together, have not 5 cents direct interest in our overseas commerce, which this war is primarily waged to protect and promote. Not one in five hundred has a dollar in the bank, and not one in ten thousand of whom owns an acre or a foot of land in this country, whose battles they only are compelled to fight. It proves the old complaint of "A rich man's war and a poor man's fight." This is the most flagrant and iniquitous class legislation that I have seen in the whole course of my life. You propose to excuse all men above 25 years of age and on up to 45 and disguise the injustice under the false claim that it is democratic; men who have lived in the greatest country on earth, under the best conditions that ever man has brought to bear in the development of civilization; the strong, the rich, the powerful, the great, men who have been allowed to enjoy happiness, to follow unrestricted their own pursuits of industry and improvement, to build up their homes and acquire their fortunes; not one of these men can be compelled to go into the Army under this bill, or is even permitted to do so, and to conscript these boys, one-fourth of whom can not even make a legal contract, and the others who have not yet found out where they are going. Oh, no; they are no good for anything else, the Secretary of War says. Let us see if I can find that. Yes; here it is:

Men are not deemed skilled workers and indispensable in industry until they are of greater maturity than that.

Well, they are not regarded as necessary to the industrial conditions, not having made a place there. That is the real condition. That is the reason I am talking along that line to-night. No Senator here will dispute that proposition or contend that the true condition has not been correctly stated by me.

Mr. President, it is charged by the advocates of this bill that the volunteer system is a failure; that conscription must be resorted to for raising an army. It is charged that the volunteer system is retained in the bill, and claimed that the Regular Army and the National Guard may still continue to be filled by voluntary enlistment. I deny and challenge the truth of all these statements. Not one single one of them is true.

Now, I say that there is no wide field left open for volunteering if this bill is passed; there is in effect no place for volunteering after it is passed.

It is said that there are now 500,000 men necessary to fill up the National Guard and the Regular Army to war strength, and claimed that under the provisions of this bill it may be done after the bill is passed. Let us see. On page 4, section 2, beginning in line 23, the bill reads:

SEC. 2. The enlisted men required to raise and maintain the organizations of the Regular Army and to complete and maintain the organizations embodying the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States at the maximum legal strength as by this act provided, shall be raised by voluntary enlistment, or if and whenever the President decides that they can not effectually be so raised or maintained, then by selective draft; and all other forces hereby authorized shall be raised and maintained by selective draft exclusively. Such draft shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 19 and 25 years, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act.

What will be the effect if this bill passes? The War Department has already declared that volunteering is a failure, has discouraged volunteering in the National Guard, and declared that there shall be no more volunteering. This bill is conclusive evidence of that fact, along with the statements made by the Secretary of War in the Military Committee. When this bill is passed what would be the incentive for a man over 25 years of age to go and enlist in the Regular Army or in the National Guard, when he knows that if he does not volunteer he can not be put into the service by the conscript system at all, because the men who are to be put in under the law, when the President concludes that volunteering is a failure, must be selected from those between the ages of 19 and 25. That is the condition you are going to have. You are going to exclude every man from 25 to 45 years of age in this country from service in the Army. It is wrong; it ought not to be done.

There would be fairness in this if equality of service of all men now subject to military duty, from 18 to 45 years of age, or, rather, from 21 years of age, when a man is allowed to vote, up to 45 years of age, was required, and I shall vote for that. Men are good soldiers at that age and so recognized. There would be a strong element of fairness about that and of equality and democracy.

I am a believer in the volunteer system. I believe that it is the best that we can have for American purposes under the conditions as they now exist. When the Army appropriation bill was pending in the Senate, immediately after war was declared, I introduced an amendment to that bill authorizing the President to call for volunteers, in lots of 500,000 at a time, for the term of the war, and for continuing the call until a sufficient number were enlisted to bring the war to a successful conclusion. That amendment was defeated on a technical point. War had been declared, and yet no call has gone out for volunteers.

Immediately after that failed I introduced in the Senate a bill authorizing the President to raise an army of volunteers. I will read the bill here—Senate bill 1807:

SEC. 1. That war having been declared, the President is hereby authorized to call for volunteers for service in the Regular Army, for the term of the war, in numbers of 500,000, until as many men are enlisted in the Regular Army as are deemed necessary to bring the war to a successful conclusion.

I supported the McKellar amendment in the Military Affairs Committee, although I am not in favor of it in principle. I believe that the volunteer system should obtain to the exclusion of the selective-draft proposition. I am going to support the Trammell amendment, which proposes to strike out the selective draft or conscript feature of this bill, and authorize a call for volunteers to continue until enough are enlisted to bring the war to a successful end.

Let us discuss briefly this volunteer system. I am not going to talk about the untrained raw militiaman, as the chairman of the committee has done, but I am going to talk about the volunteer system, the volunteer soldier, and I am going to talk about it from our own experience in the past, in this last great war, in the War between the States, that cemented forever indissoluble the bonds of this great Union, in the anguish and suffering and blood of our people, and from out the baptismal fire of which our Government emerged pure gold, with all the dross of sectionalism and division burned away.

What was the result of conscription in the North? It was a costly failure, this system that you hug to your bosoms here and say is the best that has been devised by mortal man. What was the effect of it in the North? I read a few statistics and excerpts:

At the beginning of 1862, when recruiting was discontinued by the Secretary of War, there were 637,000 volunteers under arms, the surplus being turned away without record or pledge. The number of men raised in the North under act of March, 1863, was 1,369,343, but of these there were 1,076,558 volunteers under this enrollment act. The number of voluntary substitutes was 144,012, the number who escaped service by paying a fee was 86,724, and the number who were compelled personally to serve was 61,947. But 2.3 per cent of the total number of troops raised in the North from the beginning to the end of the war was raised by draft or conscription. (See Report of Secretary of War, 1865.)

I want to call your attention to what occurred in the Empire State of New York:

The number of volunteers enlisted January, 1863, to January, 1864, was 56,156; the total number of conscripts who were delivered at military stations was 2,575. (Governor's message, Jan. 5, 1864.)

That was the experience with conscription in the North. What was the experience of the South? We do not know exactly; but according to the statement that I have here, a careful examination by the Confederate Bureau of Conscription shows that more men came in irregularly than came through the conscription bureaus or came in irregularly and volunteered than came in the other way—conscripts. That is the experience of that time.

Experience is a wonderful teacher; it is the greatest and best teacher that has been vouchsafed to mortal man. In the history of the past that was our experience with conscripts, and yet the great war resulted in the preservation of this Union, and the volunteer system then employed was a glorious success. That was our experience along that line; and I say to you it is well for us to heed the voice of experience, our own experience, as the voice of wisdom from experience.

What thine experience teaches true,
To that give willing heed;
The wisdom that we suffer to
Is better than a creed.

Now, let us review the experience of other nations. Yonder in England, in this great war, they have raised over 5,000,000 volunteers. A little closer analysis shows that England did not have more than 6,500,000 male population between the ages of 18 and 35, and yet she raised something like 5,000,000 volunteers. Up in Canada—and Canada has less population than the Empire State of New York, less population than Pennsylvania—Canada has sent 400,000 volunteers into this war. Yonder, far across the ocean, is Australia, smaller than the State of Illinois in population, and yet Australia has sent up to February, 1917, 285,809 volunteers, 12,000 miles from home, to fight the battles of the mother country. Australia refused on a referendum vote to adopt conscription, but she raised that army of volunteers.

How many men do we need? How many men do we propose to raise? Five hundred thousand. When do we need them? The War Department states they can not be equipped, can not be furnished uniforms and rifles before August 1. I say to you here and now that if the President will issue a call for volunteers we would have a million and a half men recruited before August the 1st, more men than could be taken care of.

We can not train but 500,000 at a time. We could raise the other contingent in the same way. It has been shown, demonstrated clearly, by the testimony of the adjutant general of every State, that the National Guard can be raised to its maximum war strength before the Government is able to take care of them. We need, as I have said, only 500,000 men out of 21,000,000 of service age; and Canada raised 400,000; Australia, 285,809; and England, with the small population she has, raised something like 5,000,000 under the volunteer system.

Now, I speak of the volunteer soldier. I am not talking about an untrained raw recruit being as good as a trained soldier, but I do maintain that the volunteer soldier, with the enthusiasm and conviction of a free man, when properly trained, is the best soldier in the world. We propose to let these men volunteer; we propose to train them in camps until they are fit; and they are not expected to be sent to the firing line for one whole year from now. That is the condition as it really is. Then, why all this haste about the adoption of the selective-conscription system? It ought not to be adopted.

Mr. President, let us see what the effect of this conscript system will be. It tends to destroy the sympathy and the good feeling existing between the individual, the citizen, and his Government. We do not want that feeling destroyed in a time of war. If you adopt the system that is proposed here, or make such regulations as that the individual man will think an injustice has been done him, then he will feel indignant; he will feel that he has not been fairly treated, and he is likely to become sullen and resentful. Here is a statement of its effect away back yonder—and I quote from the record:

The failure of conscription in comparison with volunteering is shown by results in this State (New York).

Like results are conspicuous in all parts of our State and in all sections of the country—in New England, Pennsylvania, and the West. The attempt to fill our armies by drafting was abortive. While it gave no useful result, it disturbed the public mind, it carried anxiety and perplexity into the workshops, the fields, and the homes of our citizens. It not only fails to fill our armies, but it produces discontent in the service; it is opposed to the genius of our political system; it alienates our people from the Government; it is injurious to the industrial pursuits of the country. (Gov. Seymour's annual message to the New York Legislature, Jan. 5, 1864.)

What does this record show about the effect of conscription in the Civil War? I quote again:

The order for the draft was the signal for violent disturbance in many portions of the loyal States and much blood was shed before these disturbances were quieted. In some portions of the country, particularly in the city of New York, certain districts in Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Illinois, the draft was conducted under the protection of troops sent there to overawe the lawless, and in other districts the draft was deferred until troops could be furnished to protect the officers. The draft was not completed till late in the year and produced but few men for the service. (Report of Provost Marshal Gen. James B. Frey, Mar. 17, 1866.)

That is what is said to have been the result at that time. I also quote from a speech of Daniel Webster, who opposed conscription and said: "That if the time ever comes in the history of this country when an army can not be raised without conscription, the Government will discover that conscription can not be enforced without an army."

One Senator has said all this talk about the sentiment of the soldier is bosh; that it is not necessary to take it into consideration; and he asked, "Why should he not be just as good a soldier if the Government comes around selecting men here, there, and yonder"? Mr. President, you must take sentiment into consideration; you must take environment into consideration; you must take conviction into consideration in this country; you must take the temperament of the people into consideration, the psychological effect, the mental attitude. All these things must be considered.

Mr. President, as I have stated, I believe in the volunteer system and in the American people. I believe the volunteer is the best soldier in the world. I am going to call your attention to the most illustrious volunteer of all time. Yonder in the past there came down from his shepherd father's home from the mountains to the plains where the army of Israel was encamped, a blue eyed, fair haired shepherd boy who beheld the army of the living God, halted terrorized and defied by the mighty giant Goliath, and with heart aflame with indignation and with soul filled with mighty purpose, he demanded to know who it was that defied the army of the Lord, and declared he would overcome and slay him. They said: "Soft—whisper boy—you would better go back up into the mountains and tend your father's sheep; this is the greatest warrior of all time; he is recognized by all the military experts as the invincible champion of the world. You are not a soldier; are nothing but a boy just come down from the mountains; let it not be known that you have said anything like that." But he was insistent and finally taken to the king, where he continued to declare he would go out and fight the giant and slay him. He believed he could do it, and he knew it ought to be done. That was the sort of enthusiasm and conviction that was in his heart. The king said, "If you have done these things as you say, take my armor and go out and fight." "No; I am unused to that; I will fight with the weapons I understand, believing in the God of the armies of Israel, the Living God, whom he defies, and that I shall prevail against him." You all know the result that the giant was slain and beheaded at last with his own sword.

You remember the sentiment the enthusiasm, the conviction of that volunteer, and there is yet marvelous power in sentiment and conviction and enthusiasm. There is no happiness in life nor anything worth living for if you take sentiment and conviction and enthusiasm out of the world, and yet Senators say there is nothing in sentiment.

Mr. President, I am a soldier's son. My father was a volunteer—not in that unconquerable host to which the grand old veteran from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] belonged, but in that other immortal army that followed the fortunes of "the storm-cradled nation that fell." When the war clouds lowered about this country of ours, my father did not believe that the South ought to secede. He did not believe that his own State ought to secede, although he knew she had the right to do so; but when secession came, he went with his State, as most good men felt compelled to do. He stood his country's friend in her time of need. He joined the armies of the South and "played a man's part in the world of men."

Aye, yes, Senators; my father was a soldier. He fought four years east of the Mississippi River, where there was war and where war was hell. He was on sick leave, on crutches, detached from his company yonder in Tennessee; saw that a battle was imminent and borrowed a horse to ride, knowing all the sons of the South that could get into action would be needed there; volunteered for special service, was assigned to the staff, and carried dispatches along the firing line on Franklin's bloody field, where great Pat Claiborne fell on the enemy's front line of breastworks with a thousand yards of dead men around him. He fought all down through Georgia when Sherman marched to the sea. Ah, yes; my father was a soldier, and he fought as became a soldier; and the dauntless southern volunteers would have stormed the gates of hell. I do not say they were more brave than their brothers of the North, and the deeds of that immortal army, with those of their victorious brethren from the North, are now emblazoned forever resplendent high on fame's eternal scroll and have not been dimmed by the glory of the soldiers of the past and shall not be outshone by the glory of the soldiers of the future.

I have more love, respect, and admiration for that man than for any other living. He is old and bent and an invalid, waiting for the final summons; but he saw it in operation, and has told me about this conscription and the conscripts. Senators, there is a deep-rooted conviction in the mind of that man and of every other man who volunteered and fought bravely in the army upon either side that a conscript was a coward, a skulker, a slacker, and would not fight. That was the experience then, and all the men of our country who went to the war under the conscript system rest to-day under a cloud, and their sons and their daughters have not been able to outgrow and escape the baleful effect and influence arising from the fact that their fathers had to be conscripted and dragged into the service.

Remember also the words of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]: "The same prejudice exists against the conscript in the South to-day that was engendered during the war, and it never will be forgotten."

That is the sort of feeling that is in the minds of the people among whom I live.

I am the son of a southern soldier. I am proud of the traditions of the South. I love her history, her sentiments, and I love all that is dear to the southern heart; but I have thanked my God, since I was old enough to know, that the cause for which my father fought did not succeed. I have thanked Him that the great Union was not dissolved; and notwithstanding my love for the South, notwithstanding my love for her great and heroic deeds, her history, and traditions, no man goes beyond me in admiration and love for this country of ours, throughout all her borders, nor has more anxious solicitude for her holding first place in the foremost rank of the nations of the earth. I am speaking to-night again for the young men, and declare that they ought to be allowed to go into this war as volunteers, and not required to go as conscripts.

Let us see. You talk about the Englishmen, the soldier. You talk about the Czar and the Kaiser. But you say that Germany's army is the most powerful, most effective, and best fighting machine on the earth. Lord Northcliffe, who has been quoted here, says "democracy is a bad war maker," because you have got to get the power finally into the hands of some one man or a few men where it can be properly exercised to wage war successfully. What else? Speaking of looking over the battle fields and the country that the Germans were expected to go through into Calais, he said:

> Had that wonderful army that poured through Belgium been inspired by the enthusiasm and the conviction of free men, I do not think that anything could have stopped its progress. It is just that which is lacking in autocratically ruled armies.

The inspiration and conviction of free men is lacking in that sort of an organization; and that is what caused its failure, according to the greatest expert quoted on the other side of the question.

He said also:

> The difference between these soldiers and the soldiers of Napoleon the Great, who used to play havoc with them, was the difference between human automata ruled by machinery as compared with men of individual thought and action guided by a genius.

I have but a few more words to say. There is no lack of enthusiasm in the State of Arkansas. There is no lack of enthusiasm and conviction throughout this Nation. Already one citizen has been able to have 123,000 men volunteer in the time since this war has been declared. You know that if this Government should issue a call for volunteers that more than 120,000 or 150,000 or 500,000 a month would volunteer, and yet you demand that the boys be conscripted.

Now, Senators, I am not going to talk further. I had to say this much once again for the young men of this land. I could not say less. The history of the volunteer is the history of America's military glory, and, lest it depart, here and now I adjure you by the living God who made us all, by the ties that men hold most sacred, the love of liberty, of home, and of native land, do not cut the fighting heart out of our young men with this conscription law. Do not impose this indignity upon American manhood.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the consideration of the pending bill and the various amendments offered to it may well be confined to the one important question, What shall be the military policy of the United States at this time?

The discussion thus far shows that what Senators are chiefly concerned about, and properly so, is the determination of the question, Shall we continue the existing plan, extending it on the basis of the volunteer system, or shall we limit the volunteer feature and expand on the basis of the selective draft system as proposed in this bill?

Some of the amendments offered I may vote for, where they do not change the principle or the policy involved.

I desire to submit some observations in support of the bill.

Experienced and thoughtful people contend that the volunteer system is inseparable from vicious favoritism. Its tendency is to shift the burden from those who ought to bear it to those who, for the good of the Nation, ought not to go into that service. The theory of the selective draft, which there ought to be no great difficulty in putting into practice, is that the men who can best be spared will be called; and those who have dependents, or are needed on the farms to produce the Nation's food, or on the railroads which must be operated to supply the means of necessary transportation, or in the factories which we can not afford to have closed or seriously crippled, would be exempted. Back of universal service is the sense of obligation to the country. The right of the Government under the powers granted by the Constitution to require such service of the citizen, and the duty of the citizen in consideration of the protection and guaranties afforded him to render such service, are perfectly plain.

Consistent with that principle entirely is the idea of exemption of those from military service who can be more useful to the Nation elsewhere than in the field. The volunteer plan does not take into account this idea. It does not facilitate, but hinders, through its lack of system or by its operation, the proper mobilization of the Nation's resources. Its uncertainty and unreliability are indicated by the recent experience abroad and at home. The former has been frequently mentioned. As to the latter, Congress in December, 1915, authorized the enlistment of 20,000 more men for our Regular Army. On December 15, 1916, the authorized strength of the Regular Army was 126,552, while the actual strength was only 100,902. The new enlistments, although considerable effort was made to secure them, were not obtained. In the National Guard recruiting was likewise disappointing. Conceding, in the circumstances I need not detail, notwithstanding there was need for actual service apprehended, there was not a fair test of the volunteer plan, the experience was sufficient to give rise to some doubt that it would be wise to place dependence upon such a plan. It is instanced that England and her colonies raised some 4,000,000 men by the volunteer plan; that Canada enlisted some 400,000 under that plan; that all of them have proven themselves soldiers of the highest type. These facts are cited as proofs of the efficacy of the plan. It will be noted that England refuses to have her soldiers go to the trenches until they have had 11 months of earnest training.

In the first place, the strongest possible appeals were made by England. She had the hideous desolation of Belgium at her doors. Pictures of the treaty called a "scrap of paper" were exhibited everywhere. Zeppelins threatened and kindled a rage which found expression in the cry of "baby killers." Immediate dangers in various directions her people lived in the very presence of. We have not those conditions. Our appeal is to democratic idealism—stress on "the issue between popular rule and military despotism."

In the case of Canada, too much can not be said in praise of the noble, inspiring spirit her gallant sons displayed without even being invited. She saw clearly that the deadliest assault ever made on democracy was begun across the sea when war was declared on the mother country. She heard the alarm of her European brothers. She knew of violated treaties. She realized the meaning of the position that a regular and binding treaty was only a "scrap of paper" in the mind of some who place might above right. She was impressed by the doctrine that weak or small States have no right to live and ought to feel honored to be absorbed or dominated by great powers. She knew the seas no longer separate nations, that the moving bridges across the ocean highway connected all lands.

We find ourselves in thorough sympathy with Canada's sentiment and attitude; but, of course, our relations with Great Britain are not the same as hers.

There are two prime reasons why the selected draft is the preferable if not the necessary plan. First, it will show to the world, to the immense heartening of the allies and the discomfort of the enemy that we mean the force and power of the whole country are centered on victory. That we have gone in with the will to win. Second, it will leave the necessary industries uncrippled and the schools and colleges and the universities unrobbed of the young men to whom the country must look in the future for leadership. The farmer who produces the Nation's food, the mechanic and artisan needed in the trades and industries, the young men getting their education to equip them for high service, will not be allowed to volunteer in wholesale groups when the general good will best be subserved by most of them remaining at their several tasks. The educational institutions will contribute their share only—not empty themselves. The trades and industries and the farms will contribute their share, but not indiscriminately, in numbers that would make us helpless where help is most needed.

The volunteer plan would mean delay, if not disappointment. If submarines and Zeppelins or raiders or armed forces threatened to invade the United States there would be a ready and overwhelming response to the call to the colors. Such a situation will not arise. Some immediate prospect of real, active service in battle would stimulate enlistments to numbers greater than could be cared for. When it is believed fighting is uncertain or remote recruiting will be slow. Thus the volunteer plan depends not on the judgment of the military authorities but upon the disposition of the volunteers. There is absence of control when control may be needed.

There is one other way to bring forth volunteers in sufficient numbers, and that is by arousing feelings of hatred toward the foe. A propaganda of that sort is most inadvisable. "God punish our enemies" is a theme which may serve those who wage a war of "frightfulness" and barbarity, but we can not think of teaching and proclaiming a feeling of hate toward any people. The real origin of the whole abomination of desolation is found in the denial of brotherhood. The failure of great and strong races to respect the personality of the smaller and weaker ones lies at the root of the fresh miseries and new horrors recorded every day. Hate is made the ruling passion to threaten the ruin of a world. We can not resort to that. Without the impulse immediate danger or attack would create, without the promptings engendered by hate, volunteering could not be relied upon to place the armed force of the United States in such a position of strength, numerically or otherwise, as it should occupy. Even with these two incentives, one not likely and the other unthinkable, volunteering would likely occur in localities, in institutions, here and there; in some States there would be enthusiasm, in others lukewarmness, resulting in unfairness, inequality, and inefficiency.

Whole divisions were sent back to operate the mines and factories in England after enlisting and training. This ought to be proof enough that the best results may not be accomplished by such a plan. Besides, there is opportunity, through the National Guard and the Regular Army, for over 300,000 to volunteer. I do not believe any odium could attach to the drafted man under this bill. It would be more nearly accurate to call him the selected man. He enters the service because he is the chosen among thousands. Chosen because he comes up to the standard fixed by the law. Selected because his country needs him and finds him to be fit to meet the supreme test of the citizen. He should feel honored by that choice. He should take pride in the fact that he was selected to defend his country on the battle field with his skill, his manhood, his life. What greater privilege, what higher honor could come to him than to be selected from among all his countrymen to carry his country's flag in the face of his country's enemy! The drafted man will be the selected, the honored man under this bill.

There is no difference between us as to the need of an army, trained and equipped. The only question about which there are different views is how best to attain that end. Some contend with great force and eloquence the volunteer plan is the historic and wisest plan, according with our free institutions. That seems to me, in the last analysis, a haphazard, one-sided plan, certain only in its uncertainty. Experience in former times, and in the very latest and most stupendous of all wars in all time, teaches that the selective draft is the scientific, dependable, safe, and fair plan. It affects all alike. It is what Washington advised when he said:

> A free people ought not only to be armed but disciplined, to which end a uniform and well-digested plan is requisite.

I am not disturbed that we are not entirely unanimous on this question. A writer has well said:

> When men meet together, smile and agree, progress weeps.

Mr. President, I was in Paris, attending a reception given by the American ambassador at the embassy, when a message came to him from the foreign office, the afternoon of July 28, 1914, that Austria had declared war on Serbia. The reading of that message brought a solemn expression to the faces of those present, and the assembly soon melted away. I turned to the prefect of police of Paris, who stood by me, and said I presumed the trouble would be confined to those two countries, or, at any rate, not extend beyond that region of social and political canker in Europe, the Balkans. He shook his head and replied no one could tell how far it would reach. "But," said he, "we are sure America will be found on the side of right and justice."

And so at last it is. And America is there in no feeble or halting manner. "Thus, from Palos, in 1492, to Sarajevo, in 1914, the hand of Europe has drawn us ever and ever closer," and now we, too, must face the "Pentecost of calamity." For democracy, the hope of humanity; for freedom from oppression; for rights which go with liberty and civilization, we resist and we strike.

We will lose blood and treasure; but we feel that no great accomplishment was ever realized, no desirable goal was ever reached, no achievement worth while is possible, without rupture and hemorrhage. That is the law of life. We will have fewer dollars at the end, but we will have our own self-respect and the respect of all other people.

On the 1st of August I was again in Paris and saw the beginning of the mobilization of that magnificent French Army. The Government took charge of the railroads and commandeered the motor cars, trucks, and every means of conveyance. That night, camped in the plaza fronting the Gare du Nord, were something like a thousand Belgians. They were a sturdy, manly, honest, sober, serious-minded lot of men. They had come from the wheat fields of France, where they had been assisting in the harvesting of the crop. They were waiting for transportation to their homes, to which they had been summoned. Within a few weeks those hard-working, brave men were participating in another harvest. They were being mowed down by a relentless, overpowering foe in "bleeding Belgium."

France had a conversation with Germany in which she answered the curt inquiry as to what she meant by mobilizing by saying simply she proposed to protect her interests. Germany declared war on her. The men disappeared from their usual vocations and rushed to the colors. Women took their places in the hotels and elsewhere. Seeing a woman bid one of these men good-by with her blessing and encouragement, I inquired if she was not distressed to have these men go, and she replied, "Every man should go—we expect no mercy from the Germans." If half we read is true she was right.

This grave step by Austria was unwarranted. The action was wholly unjustifiable. Servia had conceded all she could honorably grant and made every reasonable effort to avoid war. The prevailing impression then was, and time and developments have crystalized that into fixed opinions which may be called the public opinion of the world, that if Austria's unreasonable action was not actively instigated by Germany it could have been directed and controlled by the latter.

History will write the truth, that if Germany did not strike the match which set the world afire, she could have readily extinguished it before any damage was done. Her rulers had purposes of their own to subserve.

Here spoke Prussianism. The Prussian creed came into play:

> We Hohenzollerns take our crown from God alone. On us the Spirit of God has descended. I regard my whole task as appointed by heaven. Who opposes me I shall crush to pieces. Nothing must be settled in this world without the intervention of the German Emperor. Might is right and is decided by war. The peace of Europe is only a secondary matter for us. The sight of suffering does one good; the infliction of suffering does one more good. This war must be conducted as ruthlessly as possible.

Germany was willing to make a glowing region on earth on some theory that it meant for her some sort of "place in the sun."

On the 3d our party managed to get a troop train to Dieppe, and thence a boat to New Haven, and thence a train to London. England was mobilizing, and on the 4th war was declared on her. In an orderly, systematic way she began the assembling and training of her forces. On the 10th we sailed from Plymouth, and there on the docks were the motor busses we had seen five days before carrying passengers on the streets of London transformed into ambulances. We were told 20,000 soldiers had already left that port for France. We sailed away from those stirring scenes little dreaming the United States would be even remotely involved in that unprecedented tragedy. It was supposed then the struggle would be over in a few months. I found that impression prevailed in high places here. When we reached home, August 18, there was talk then about the peace that was certain to be realized inside of six months. Let us not deceive ourselves. The only safe course is to prepare for the worst. All we know about peace is we are at this moment at war. Its duration no man is wise enough to foresee. When it will end we can not guess. How it will end, if we do our part with the unsurpassed courage and determination and the absolute scorn of sacrifice which have in the past characterized this people, and having in mind the glorious record made by our friends, we have no doubt. The "short-war" fallacy cost Britain and France dearly. We should profit by the lesson taught them. It would be a grievous mistake for us to fall into a similar error. When Kitchener said "three years" the public scarcely took him seriously. A few days ago Mr. Bonar Law is quoted as stating to the House of Commons that Germany would have a million men added to the ranks of her armies this year and would be numerically stronger than at any time since the war began. The achievements of her military science and valor have given her confidence. That must yield, and the day would be hastened by the prompt creation of a great American Army capable of enormous expansion, as provided in this bill.

With all our resources, with all our strength, with all our might, we strike for justice, for freedom, and for humanity. From every walk of life, from the hills and the valleys, from the cities and the countrysides, from the offices and the workshops, from the platform and the pulpit even, there must be a mobilization of valor such as only a people who love liberty truly, who believe in a Government where individual opportunity is synonymous with individual liberty, in a land where "every man is set free to be his best and do his best" can produce.

In such an enterprise leadership counts mightily. Having full confidence in the master minds, the unquestioned patriotism, the pure and inspiring purposes of those who call on us all, I propose to answer that call in the way they wish it answered in so far as lies in my power.

This is no time for divided councils. Those best informed and in position of greatest responsibility, after mature reflection and deep study, advise us, indeed urge us, to adopt this plan. I am not willing to assume superior knowledge or fuller information than they possess. My patriotism is no greater than theirs. In the days of the Druids in Ireland there was promulgated a command, called the "Ordinance of Tara," to this effect:

No man should light a fire in Meath till the beacon blazed on Temair.

In fateful situations like the present, when vital questions are involved, when a false step may mean destruction, when a blunder may amount to a crime, when a mistake may mean a hurt which can never be healed, it would be "plucking the fruit of unripe wisdom" to disregard the beacon on Temair. In emergencies like the present, indeed in strictly foreign affairs, the President walks ahead. No one belongs in his front, not even by his side, but behind him.

Parliament never failed to give the ministry what it wanted. The Chamber of Deputies gave the ministry power to make laws, without consulting them, by executive edict. Can Congress afford to disapprove the plan which has been agreed upon by the President and his advisers as the wisest and best, if not indispensable, upon which this contest must be waged? "Grim-visaged war hath raised its wrinkled front," and we draw the sword and we must move forward to the "perilous ridges of battle," with armies and equipment that will make the result certain and decisive.

Mr. President, this war must not be prolonged, or it will end the world. The President, upon whose giant shoulders rests the greatest responsibilities, calls on Congress to pass this bill substantially as reported by the Committee.

Let us forego prejudices and preconceived notions and give the "sinews" as wanted.

No man enlists under this bill except for "the period of the existing emergency, unless sooner discharged." The forces here provided for are for this war. Whatever views one might have regarding a military establishment under peace conditions, those views would scarcely be applicable to the situation in which we now find the country. We are at war in which we seek no revenge. Not even reparation is our motive. There is much more at stake than trade or ships or even human life. Material loss or gain must be disregarded. Let there be no discordant note, no division. The cause and the motive can not be better expressed than by the President in his world message. "Right," he declared, "is more precious than peace."

The United States is challenged to play its part in the titanic struggle to "make the world safe for democracy."

Mr. President, there was a great speech delivered in this Chamber 38 years ago next May 10. It ranks along with the ablest and most statesmanlike addresses preserved forever in American history. It quotes that Senator's words in his "notes on the situation." These words are cut into the rain-washed monument erected to his memory in the State he so grandly represented here.

These words of Ben Hill, of Georgia, must never be forgotten. They are, "Who saves his country saves himself, saves all things, and all things saved do bless him. Who lets his country die lets all things die, dies himself ignobly, and all things dying curse him."

Mr. President, I wish to insert in the RECORD a few short telegrams and letters which are samples of the many which have come to me on this subject, as indicating what I believe to be the views of a very large majority of the people of Florida and, I think, of the country.

One of these letters is from one of the best citizens of the country. He was a distinguished officer in the Confederate Army. He has always taken great interest in military affairs, and has been active in the State militia and the National Guard. His experience as a gallant soldier, his sound judgment, his patriotism, his knowledge of the subject, should give his views peculiar force.

I wish to read that letter from Judge William B. Young and to have the other matters submitted inserted in the RECORD. The letter was received to-day and is as follows:

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., April 25, 1917.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Yesterday afternoon I received the copy of the "Bill to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," and also the copy of the report of the committee. After careful reading I most heartily approve of the bill, and indorse the report of the committee. The volunteer system is a failure, and the Confederate Armies would have been practically disbanded in the winter of 1861–2 but for the conscript act. Regiments that were composed of 12 months' volunteers were claiming their discharge, though the enemy were advancing up the peninsula with a large army, which McClellan had spent six months in training and equipping. My experience of years with the National Guard here has convinced me of the futility of relying on voluntary service. It has been impossible to keep the ranks full, and within the past year it has been necessary to disband most of the companies of the First Florida because they could not fill their ranks to the required minimum, and though we are now at war, and though the Government has been calling for volunteers to fill up both the Regular Army and the National Guard, they have not received enough to raise the organizations to war strength. But for the fact that the enemy can not reach us our coast cities would now be in his possession. If he should succeed in overcoming the French and English, we would soon be overrun by a vast veteran army, with only a handful of troops to meet him. Not a day should be lost in passing the bill and organizing and training an army. Too much time has been lost already. The "million men that would spring to arms in a night" have not sprung, and if they had they would be an unorganized, untrained, undisciplined mass that would be worth little against disciplined troops. The advocates of the volunteer system talk of the fighting of the volunteers in the War between the States. The armies of that war fought but one battle before they had been trained and disciplined for six months, and that was the first Battle of Manassas, or Bull Run. In that battle the Federal Army was defeated and utterly demoralized, and the Confederates, though the victors, were too disorganized and undisciplined to follow up their victory. I have felt for over 15 years that we were in a fearfully unprepared condition to meet the attack of any first-class nation. Pardon me for writing at such length, but ever since the War with Spain I have felt that, with millions of men capable of bearing arms, and ample resources, we could be overrun by any first-class power. During that war many of the troops encamped here died from disease because of the ignorance and incompetence of their officers.

Yours, truly, WM. B. YOUNG.

HON. D. U. FLETCHER,
Senator, Washington, D. C.:

The Rotary Club, of Jacksonville, comprising representatives of 100 businesses and professions in Jacksonville, unqualifiedly indorses the recommendations of the President of the United States as to the necessity in this national crisis for the rasing of an army by conscriptive draft. We firmly believe that neither the National Guard system nor volunteer enlistments nor any other plan which penalizes patriotism for the benefit of shirkers and slackers ought to be depended upon. We are earnestly convinced that national military service is at all times as much universal as the payment of taxes, jury service, or any other price that we are called upon to pay for the inestimable privilege of American citizenship.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As organizer and executive of American Merchants' Syndicate, composed of 12,000 real American merchants in every State, I implore you vote for conscription and let the loafers and unsympathetic naturalized foreigners do their part, allowing those not subject to conscription to volunteer, subject to acceptance if needed under arms more than in industry. Though ineligible for conscription I will volunteer for anything after eligibles are conscripted. Thousands and tens of thousands of real patriots anxious to go to the front await news that those who owe the same duty will be required to pay it along with the brave enthusiasts. Let the noncoms. of the Regulars become officers of the new men. Perdition to the green politician volunteer officer.

Universal suffrage and Government protection logically demand universal service in time of need and a universal training of the young man to meet the need. The Rotary Club of Pensacola, composed of 69 representative citizens, unanimously indorses the principle of universal training and service and urges the immediate passage of bill now pending to make same effective.

DEAR SENATOR: At the annual meeting of the Florida Society, Sons of the American Revolution, held on the 19th instant, the anniversary of the Battle of Lexington, the below resolution was adopted; and we hope that you can see your way clear to vote for and give the weight of your influence to the passage of the proper legislation which will bring about universal military training and selective conscription in time of war, as recommended by the President. The following is the resolution:

"Resolved by the Florida Society of the Sons of the American Revolution in annual meeting assembled, That we desire to go on record as supporting the President of these United States in his action in recommending to the Congress the enactment of adequate laws providing for universal military training for the youth of our land and for such selective conscription as shall be necessary in any time of war."

Yours, very truly,

CONSCRIPTING V. VOLUNTEERING.

When President Wilson gives it as his solemn opinion that selective conscription is the only available method by which the country can raise sufficient troops to do the work of this war, the great majority of the people will take his word for it and support him in asking it.

It is regrettable that there are signs of a clash between the President and Congress on this vital subject.

The advantage of conscription will be that it will not permit of "slackers." The volunteer goes to war while his competitor in business remains at home and profits by his absence. The stay-at-home gets the soldier's job. It is a partial and unfair arrangement.

If this country needs the services of every man of certain age, it ought to get them without exception. It is unjust to permit one man to profit by another's patriotism.

Great Britain soon found that the volunteer system didn't bring the desired results. There were too many mouth patriots, who talked of devotion to country but preferred to show that devotion by staying at home in good jobs and comfortable surroundings.

When the need comes for men, we ought to be able to get them without waiting for them to make up their minds to respond. Conscription is, of course, not exactly an American method, but in such a time as this we can not be sticklers for tradition. If every man of the requisite age were willing to drop everything and go to the front, we wouldn't need conscription, but it is likely that one man out of three will not feel that way about it when the time for action comes. Hence the two will suffer while the one will thrive.

We are for the President on this question. He is right, as usual.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., April 16, 1917.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER,
Senate Post Office, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have been discussing with a number of people the proposed Army bill, particularly selective conscription and the relative merits of this procedure in raising the necessary force to that of voluntary enlistments.

It is my belief that selective conscription would come nearer filling the ranks in a short space of time than any other method and would probably avoid the necessity of such procedure in future, which I believe would be more embarrassing than if selective conscription was put into effect in the beginning.

I do not know whether our Senators and Representatives desire personal expressions on this subject, but having sons myself I felt as if I was justified in expressing myself along this line and have taken the liberty of so doing.

Hoping the Government will be able to put through the program of selective conscription, and with kind personal regards, I am,

Yours, very truly,

THOS. P. DENHAM.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., April 14, 1917.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: For the last week I have been sounding out to the best of my ability our most substantial citizens on the question of compulsory military training and conscription for service in the Army, and I have found the opinion almost unanimous in favor of conscription. They all seem to think it is the fairest manner of raising an army. I take it if the law is enacted providing for conscription it would not prohibit any young man from volunteering who desired; but on the other hand it would make every man coming within the prescribed age limit liable to do his duty and prevent shirking. I don't see any justice in making the boys who are patriotic enough to volunteer do the fighting for the shirkers.

From reports I hear I feel sure you are in favor of enacting the legislation the President desires on this subject, and I only write to advise you as to the sentiment down here as far as I have been able to get at it.

With kindest regards, I am,

Yours, very truly.

ARTHUR T. WILLIAMS.

THE LAWYERS' CLUB,
New York City, April 19, 1917.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Member United States Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The war committee of the Lawyers' Club desires to record its belief emphatically and insistently that the institution of universal, obligatory military training and service under Federal control in the United States of all the male citizens of the country should be established at the earliest practicable moment.

This should be done, not only as a measure of national safety, but also for the sake of its benefit physically, mentally, and morally to the recipients thereof.

That an act embodying the measures suggested by the Chamberlain bill or that of the War Staff or such inclusions or modifications thereof as may be found wisest of adoption should receive the serious and early consideration of Congress, and that pending such action a selective conscriptive measure along the lines urged by the President should be passed and put into application without delay.

Very truly, yours,

WM. ALLEN BUTLER,
President.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., April 15, 1917.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am not an applicant for any office, but I feel it my duty to write to urge you to use all of your influence to procure the passage of a law requiring universal military service and training. You know that I have seen considerable military service, and I am sure that is the only safe way. Officers should not be elected, but appointed by the Commander in Chief, and no one should be appointed because he is a prominent citizen or has political pull, but only because he is competent. During the War between the States colonels were appointed in many cases because they had been Members of Congress and were influential, and several very prominent ones were appointed to command brigades, and in every instance coming under my observation they made a mess of things. I had rather be commanded in battle by a cadet from West Point than by the ablest Member of Congress if he had not had military experience. I am as devoted now to the United States as I was to the Confederate States in the years from 1861 to 1865, inclusive, and if I can be of any service I will gladly render it.

Yours, very truly,

WM. B. YOUNG.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if there is no Senator who desires to speak to-night, I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the motion will be entirely in order if no Senator is ready to proceed to speak. The Chair will ask if any Senator is ready to proceed?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly; I did not mean to make the motion if any Senator desired to address the Senate. I had been informed that there would be no other speeches to-night, and the chairman of the committee asked me to make the motion, in case no other Senator desired to speak. I put that inquiry first. If the Senator from Wisconsin desires to proceed, I will be glad to have him do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule that the motion is not in order if any Senator on the floor is ready to proceed with debate on the question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement and under the practice which has come to prevail in the Senate in violation of our rules of making a list, a preferred list, at the desk of the Presiding Officer for recognition, I avail myself of the privilege which the unanimous-consent agreement gives me to take the floor at this time—11.30 p. m.—and I shall proceed to discuss under these conditions one of the most important measures that ever engaged the attention of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, however uncertain the meaning of some portions of this bill may be, its main purpose is clear. About that there is no dispute. The main purpose of this bill is to clothe one man with power, acting through agents appointed by him, to enter at will every home in our country, at any hour of the day or night, using all the force necessary to effect the entry, and violently lay hold of 1,000,000 of our finest and healthiest and strongest boys, ranging in age from 19 to 25 years, and against their will, and against the will and wishes of their parents or family, deport them across the seas to a foreign land three thousand and more miles away, and to require them, under penalty of death if they refuse, to wound and kill other young boys just like themselves and toward whom they feel no hostility and have cause to feel none.

Briefly told, and in as plain language as I can command, that is the purpose of this bill. That is what the draft means. I have not overstated—indeed, no one can overstate—the horror it is proposed to perpetrate by this bill, nor the insult which it conveys to the intelligence and patriotism of the people of this country. Anyone who would have prophesied one short month ago that this body would seriously consider, under existing circumstances, such a measure as this would have raised a question as to his sanity. For such action as it is proposed to take by this bill under present conditions there is no precedent in all our history, and, I believe, there is none in the history of any people making the slightest claim to freedom.

That the person we propose to clothe with this power of life and death over our children happens to be the President only serves to increase the iniquity of the proposal, for the power once granted will attach to the office, and will be exercised so long as this Nation shall last, by every successive incumbent, no matter how ambitious or bloody-minded he may be. Nor is it suggested that the million boys this bill proposes to take is all that will be required at the present time. If newspaper reports are correct, the representatives of the allied nations from over the seas, who are visiting here at present and who may be supposed to speak with some knowledge of the question, suggest that 5,000,000 of our soldiers will be necessary to complete the job.

That our boys will enter upon the actual killing and being killed only after some months of training designed to fit them peculiarly for the atrocious task does not mitigate but rather increases the horrors of the bloody work proposed just in proportion as it increases their efficiency. That the killing will be done by the enginery and in the formations of regular warfare certainly does not make it more humane or less horrible. Killing such as we propose our boys shall engage in, either to kill or be killed, by machine guns, by bursting bombs, by poison gas and tearing shrapnel is the most horrible, and is deliberately designed to be the most horrible, killing that can be devised.

CHANGE WORKED BY MERE DECLARATION OF WAR.

I do not mean to speak of the horrors of war. Were I to do so I should dwell most upon the anguish of those at home, of families broken up, hopes blasted, bodies crippled, insanity and disease, debt and poverty, and want and famine, which are only a few of the results of every great war. I would speak of liberties lost, constitutions destroyed, of peoples exterminated by the immediate savagery of war or languishing in bondage for generations under the tyranny, foreign or domestic, military or economic, that always rides in the wake of war. I will not let my mind dwell upon the distress and disaster this war is bound to bring us in the future, but we can not forget what has happened in the few days that have elapsed since it began. What a transformation has been wrought during the first few hours of this war.

Only a few days ago we were at peace with all the world and cherished nothing but the kindliest feelings toward the peoples of every land. We were engaged in peaceful occupations. Our youth were in the schools and colleges of the country fitting themselves for the useful and helpful work that they were to do in the world. As a Nation we were the one great power that was almost free from debt and in position to help bring peace to a distracted world. As a people we were prosperous. Our taxes were relatively light and cheerfully borne because they were expended largely for objects calculated to promote our material and social welfare. We were apparently secure in our liberties, and, slowly it may be but none the less surely, we were winning peaceful victories for democracy and self-government, not only for ourselves but for our children and the generations to come, which we fondly hoped would bring a little nearer the day of peace on earth and good will to men.

But in a moment all this has been changed. We have declared war against a Government and a people with whom we have always previously lived in perfect friendship. We have made ourselves distrusted or feared by other governments and lost the power we had as a neutral Nation to promote the cause of peace. Already our colleges are practically closed, so far as civil instruction is concerned, and our advanced schools have become mere training camps, in which the teaching of race hatred and military supremacy has taken the place of history and literature and the arts and sciences taught in the days of peace. Already our most cherished constitutional rights have been invaded and will soon be destroyed. The agent provocateur is in our midst. Men are being daily cast into prison in violation of the law, and in many cases without even regarding the forms of law.

I can not forbear to say, Mr. President, that this proceeding upon this great bill here to-night is a travesty upon legislation. The British Parliament took nearly a full month to consider a bill providing for a draft, after it had been discussed in the press of Great Britain for many months, and after a protracted struggle involving the unseating of a ministry had been pushed to its conclusion. But we have come upon times in the United States, with all of its boasted principles of democracy and freedom, where freedom of debate in the consideration of legislation involving the liberties of the people is brought under the iron rule of driving legislation through without deliberation, without the possibility of the Senate being in attendance upon the debate so as to make it possible to have any intelligent and deliberative consideration of the great questions involved in this legislation. Within a few months, under a pretext of carrying democracy to the rest of the world, we have done more to undermine and destroy democracy in the United States than it will be possible for us as a Nation to repair in a generation of time.

The voices of the Senators in this Chamber raised in protest against the infamous espionage bill have hardly died away, and unless we can stop this war-mad program at this point, that protest will be in vain. Already it is proposed by the Executive to fix the prices of the necessaries of life, to make and unmake contracts; in short, to do whatever despotic power conceives will further the program of war. By a single act the people have been saddled with a burden of debt amounting to an average of four or five hundred dollars for each responsible head of a family in our country, and we have scarcely made a beginning.

But, as I have said, it is beside my purpose to discuss any of these matters to-day. It has seemed to me proper, however, to make this brief reference to them, before we vote to commit this country to the revolutionary military policy proposed in this bill.

COMMITTEE HELD NO PUBLIC HEARINGS UPON THIS BILL.

It seems to me a little strange that the committee having this bill in charge should in its consideration have departed from the universal custom of holding public hearings on bills of great importance and general interest, such as this. Why the custom was departed from in this case I do not know, but doubtless it was done for some good reason satisfactory to the majority of the committee. I suppose this bill came to the committee from the War Department. Perhaps it was thought that just the plain people, who are going to be drafted under this bill, who are going to be taken from their homes and put into the trenches of Europe under the provisions of this bill, and who, under its provisions, are going to be killed and maimed and made dependents for the rest of their lives, and who are going to pay the taxes this bill entails, had nothing of interest to say about it. It certainly was unfortunate, however, for those members of the committee having the bill in charge and who are urging it here as a measure in the interest of democracy that it should come to the Senate straight from the secret committee room, without any opportunity having been granted to the public to know its terms, much less to discuss them. Never in all my many years of experience in the House and in the Senate have I heard so much democracy preached and so little practiced as during the last few months.

I have touched briefly upon the transformation that has taken place, and is taking place in our Government daily here at the Capitol, and every new abridgment of liberty and destruction of popular rights is proclaimed as something that is wholly in the interest of the people and intended to advance the cause of democracy. But it seems never to occur to these champions and heralds of democracy to permit the people to express themselves upon any of the matters so vital to their interest. We should remember that the momentous issues with which we are dealing to-day, and have been dealing during the last few weeks, have not been directly in issue in any election. So far as the late election involved the question of peace or war, everyone knows that the result of that election meant that the people by an overwhelming majority were in favor of a policy of peace. That election, in my opinion, should be regarded as a mandate from the people to the present administration to have continued the policy which had kept us out of war.

WE SHOULD HAVE BEEN NEUTRAL.

As was demonstrated in both the Senate and House when the war resolution was under discussion a short time ago, we could have kept out of this war by the simple plan of obeying international law ourselves, and insisting that both sets of belligerents should have equally and in all things respected our rights as a neutral Nation. Even if that policy had availed nothing, it would have been more in keeping with the popular will to have followed the sage advice of Thomas Jefferson, who, when writing to Elbridge Gerry on June 21, 1797, respecting the latter's mission to the French Republic and referring to the conditions which had been brought about by the war between France and Great Britain, said:

> The insults and injuries committed on us by both the belligerent parties from the beginning of 1793 to this day, and still continued, can not now be wiped off by engaging in war with one of them. As there is good reason to expect this is the last campaign in Europe, it would certainly be better for us to rub through this year as we have done through the four preceding ones, and hope that on the restoration of peace we may be able to establish some plan for our foreign connections more likely to secure our peace, interest, and honor in the future.

I am not now discussing the wisdom or unwisdom of declaring war. The administration, actuated by motives the rectitude of which I do not now question, rejected both policies of which I have spoken, and either of which, I believe, if followed, would have continued our friendly relations with all the belligerents with honor to ourselves and incalculable benefit to the world.

The Congress was assembled in special session. The demand was made for an unconditional declaration of war. While I opposed that declaration and urged that the momentous question should be first submitted to the people, I appreciate the point of view of the majority of both Houses of the Congress, which lead them to make the required declaration of war without submitting it to the people.

But upon this question, sir, scarcely less vital to the people than the declaration of war itself, I purpose to urge as strongly as I can that the voters shall have an opportunity to express themselves by an advisory vote. As I hope to show a little later, under the amendment I have offered that vote can be taken without delaying by one moment the plans for the war, and with practically no expense.

The war will end some time. I pray it may be soon. But the iniquitous system of draft which this bill proposes and the military domination which must attend upon it, if once fastened upon the country may perpetuate itself forever. Arm the executive branch of the Government with the power that this bill purposes, to select the men to constitute the Army, of which the President is Commander in Chief, and it marks the beginning of the end of our constitutional government. Its forms may be for a time preserved, but the substance of government will be transferred to the Executive. Before asking your consideration of the amendments I have proposed I wish briefly to discuss some of the features of this bill.

NO EXISTING EMERGENCY.

This bill opens with the declaration that the extraordinary powers therein stated to be conferred upon the Executive are asked in view of the "existing emergency," which demands the raising of a large army at this time. What is the "existing emergency"? Emergency means "a sudden occasion"; something that calls for immediate action. What is it that calls for immediate action in order that we may put into the field an army of 1,600,000 men, or taking the extremes of the propositions of this bill an army of over 1,900,000? That is what we are confronted with. Are we threatened with an invasion? Must we prepare to repel the attack of any foreign foe—I repeat, to repel the attack of any foreign foe? Is there danger of rebellion anywhere within our borders? Is any nation seeking to wrest from us so much as a single foot of our soil?

If we were in the least danger from any of these sources, it might indeed be an emergency which would excuse, if it would not justify, the use of arbitrary power in order to meet it. But we all know that nothing of the sort threatens. It is true we have declared war on Germany, but Germany can not send a man or a battleship to our ports to endanger our coasts. Her ships are bottled up in her harbors, and even if they could get out—the last thing, by the way, that Germany desires—and engage with our fleet, they would be greatly overmatched. Her men she could not spare, even if she had any means to transport them to this country. The submarine attacks from which our commerce suffers in common with that of all other nations when the ships enter the zone Germany is pleased to call a military area are about the same as before we declared war. Germany, by the way, has not even thought it was necessary to answer our declaration of war by a counter declaration.

No, Mr. President, in spite of the language of this bill, there is no "emergency." There is a military policy on the part of the present administration which proposes that we shall land an army in Europe as soon as may be to wage war with Germany on European soil. The merits of this policy I shall not discuss at this point. Though it may be noted in passing that Japan, who has been in alliance with the entente allies almost from the beginning of the war, has never landed a man in Europe, and apparently has no intention of doing so; and also it is to be noted that the entente allies have not put the emphasis on the appeal for men at the present time. On the contrary, the appeal has been most urgent for money and for munitions and food and ships. "Ships, ships, and more ships," as Lloyd George says. And to the appeal for money, Congress certainly has made a generous response.

So, Mr. President, we find on calm analysis of the situation that there is no "emergency" requiring us to speedily land an army in Europe, and nothing which should hurry us unduly in raising and equipping an army for so doubtful a venture or requiring us to abandon the policy we have maintained from the beginning of the Government, of depending upon voluntary enlistments to raise the armies necessary to protect our country.

VOLUNTEER SYSTEM HAS NOT FAILED.

A report was made from the Committee on Military Affairs to accompany the bill under consideration. I have read that report with interest, not to say astonishment. I quote a portion of it, and the portion I quote is found on page 2 thereof:

> The volunteer method has never proved adequate and effectual for national needs, and will prove far less so now. * * * The volunteer method failed this Nation in the Revolution, and it was only the material aid of France that gave us our independence. It failed us in the War of 1812, and had it not been for drastic draft laws and the diversion created by the Napoleonic War we could not have concluded even such peace as we did. It failed the Confederacy in the Civil War, and that Government, to its advantage, was quicker to perceive that fact than our own. It likewise failed the Federal Government, and, volunteering having practically ceased by the end of 1862, was succeeded in the following year by the first of the draft acts. It failed us in the Spanish-American War, for the force then called for was never obtained.

I find much more to the same effect in this report. I had supposed, Mr. President, until I read this report that our armies in each of the several wars we have waged acquitted themselves always with credit, and sometimes I have been led to believe that they had performed wonderful deeds of valor of which we might all justly be proud. But according to this report that is all a mistake. It seems that our forefathers did not wrest their independence from Great Britain as a result of the Revolutionary War, but it was, to quote the report, "France that gave us our independence." This report should have been a little more specific and have told us whether there were really battles at Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill, or whether the accounts of those stirring times, which we have learned and told to our children, were fairy tales. Perhaps the stories of the suffering and the dauntless courage of the American troops at Valley Forge is all an invention, or else it must be that those soldiers had been produced by "selective draft," for surely no volunteers ever performed such deeds of valor.

So it was in the War of 1812, according to this report. Draft laws and Napoleon barely enabled us to escape with our lives. The valor of our soldiers and our sailors did not enable us to win the war if this report is true. The authors of this report are careful not to say that the "draft laws" ever produced so much as a single man for the War of 1812. And so it is in all of our other wars. If this report is correct, we have met nothing but failure in them all.

Even in the late Spanish-American War it is charged that the volunteers called for never came forward. Truly we are a pusillanimous people if this report is true. But, Mr. President, the statements in this report are incorrect. If they came from a less honorable and responsible source than one of the great committees of the Senate, they would not even merit an answer. Considering the source, however, from which this report comes, I desire to enter my solemn protest against the libel it perpetrates upon our living soldiers and the memory of those dead who have fought heroically and bravely and successfully every war in which this country has ever engaged.

PRESIDENT M'KINLEY'S TESTIMONY.

So far as the charge is concerned that our young men were slackers in the Spanish-American War, I put against the unsupported assertion of this report the official statement of President McKinley. There were two calls for volunteers in the Spanish-American War, and an increase in the Regular Army up to 62,000 was provided for. In his second annual message to the Congress, December 5, 1898, President McKinley said, and I quote him:

> The response to the initial call (on Apr. 23, 1898) for 125,000 volunteers was instant and complete, as was also the result of the second call (on May 25) for 75,000 additional volunteers. The ranks of the Regular Army were increased to the limit (62,000) provided by the act of April 26, 1898.

In justice to the honorable Senator whose name appears upon the report accompanying this bill, I wish to say that I do not hold him responsible for the statements appearing in this report. I have no doubt the report was accepted in good faith from that coterie of military gentlemen who are trying to kill the volunteer system. I am sorry, however, that it should have been put forth with the prestige which it receives by having attached to it the name of the honorable and distinguished Senator who has this bill in charge.

Permit me a further quotation from President McKinley, in which he expresses his opinion of the volunteer soldier of the Spanish-American War. In an address to the Tenth Pennsylvania Regiment of Volunteers, delivered August 28, 1899, only a short time before he was laid low by the assassin's bullet, President McKinley said, and I quote him:

Our troops represented the courage and conscience, the purpose and patriotism of their country. Whether in Cuba, Porto Rico, or the Philippines, or at home awaiting orders, they did their full duty, and all sought the post of greatest peril. They never faltered. The Eighth Army Corps in the Philippines has made a proud and exceptional record. Privileged to be mustered out in April, when the ratifications of the treaty of peace were exchanged, they did not claim the privilege—they declined it. They voluntarily remained in the service and declared their purpose to stay until their places could be filled by new levies, and longer if the Government needed them. Their service—and they understood it—was not to be in camp or garrison, free from danger, but on the battle line, where exposure and death confronted them and where both have exacted their victims.

CITES GEN. SHERMAN AND PRESIDENT POLK.

I had never thought to see the day when it would be necessary for anyone to stand up in this Chamber and defend our volunteer soldiers or the system which produces them.

But since that seems to be necessary I wish to quote briefly from Gen. Sherman's opinion of the volunteer soldiers of the Civil War, as set out in his Memoirs, volume 11, page 387. He said:

We tried almost every system known to modern nations, all with more or less success—voluntary enlistments, the draft, and bought substitutes—and I think that all officers of experience will confirm my assertion that the men who voluntarily enlisted at the outbreak of the war were the best—better than the conscript and far better than the bought substitute.

President Polk, in his message to Congress in December, 1846, in referring to the soldiers who had fought and won the Mexican War, had this to say:

Well may the American people be proud of the energy and gallantry of our Regular and Volunteer officers and soldiers. The events of these few months afford a gratifying proof that our country can under any emergency confidently rely for the maintenance of her honor and the defense of her rights on an effective force ready at all times voluntarily to relinquish the comforts of home for the perils and privations of the camp. And though such a force may be for the time expensive, it is in the end economical, as the ability to command it removes the necessity of employing a large standing army in time of peace and proves that our people love their institutions and are ever ready to defend and protect them.

Is it no longer true, sir, that we can "confidently rely for the maintenance of our honor and the defense of our rights on an effective force ready at all times voluntarily to relinquish the comforts of home for the perils and privations of the camp"? If we can so rely, and rely with confidence, upon an effective force of volunteers to maintain our honor and defend our rights, why should we abandon the volunteer plan for the experiment embodied in this bill? If, sir, we find ourselves in a war in which we are afraid to rely upon volunteer soldiers, then I say we might better reexamine the reasons for our entering into the war than abolish volunteers and substitute for them men dragged into the ranks by draft.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S VIEW OF CONSCRIPTS.

At the time of the resistance to the draft in Pennsylvania in 1863 President Lincoln, referring to the draft laws, sent a verbal message to Col. McClure, chairman of the Military Committee. to the effect that while he was desirous of having the laws executed, and I quote:

It might be well in an extreme emergency to be content with the appearance of executing the laws.

So great was the feeling of the people against the draft laws of 1863 that President Lincoln felt constrained to say upon one occasion that it was best not to really try and enforce the law. And as to the results of the securing by this system, an efficient military force, I quote this from President Lincoln:

We get a large body of reinforcements together and start them to the front, but after deducting the sick, the deserters, the stragglers, and the discharged, the numbers seriously diminish by the time they reach their destination. It's like trying to shovel fleas across a barnyard—you don't get 'em all there.

Much has been said here to the effect that the use of the draft during the latter part of the Civil War is a precedent for the policy of this bill. In the first place, drafting men into the Army for the preservation of the unity of a nation is an entirely different proposition from draft for an expeditionary force to carry on a foreign war in which the national integrity is in no wise involved or threatened. The Constitution in its provision that the National Guard shall be subject only to service for the defense of the country makes clear this elementary distinction.

As a matter of fact, our use of the draft in the Civil War and the results of it furnishes one of the strongest arguments against this bill. Every argument made in the congressional debates in behalf of the draft during our Civil War is an argument against this draft. In the first place, it is to be said that the men drafted or sought to be drafted in the Civil War were to be used within our own borders and to crush existing rebellion.

Even Germany—despotic Germany—to whom, according to the sponsors of this bill, we are going to carry the blessed message of "democracy" and force its acceptance by our guns and bayonets, when she has occasion to transport armies over the seas for service in foreign lands does so by calling for volunteers. In the Boxer rebellion, in 1900, the quota of soldiers and men which Germany sent to China were men who volunteered for the work. (See Reichstag Report, vol. 1, pp. 225–228.)

Under the law Germany's colonial troops can only be enlisted for overseas service upon their voluntary application. (See sec. 2, law of July 5, 1896, R. G. P., 1, p. 653; also act of July 25, 1898, amended August, 1908, and in force at the outbreak of the European war.)

The English law as to the overseas service of men obtained through her colonies is the same, and the vast armies that have gone to England from Canada, Australia, and elsewhere to help the mother country in this war, every man of them has volunteered.

ENGLAND UNABLE TO DRAFT IN HER COLONIES.

Draft in England is being held up to our people as an example of what we should do. In this matter of draft we should look to England's liberty-loving colonies rather than to England herself for our example. Canada has contributed most generously to the war. Every account of a great battle has something to say of the notable bravery and efficient service of Canadian troops. Yet after almost three years of war Canada has not even considered the draft. Would it not be wiser to ask the advise of the statesmen of our neighboring Canadian Parliament rather than those of England? Or before coming here to tell the United States to raise an army by draft, why did not our distinguished English visitors first visit Canada and secure the adoption of the draft system there?

Australia, too, by all the standards of patriotic service in time of war has made a wonderful record on the battle fields of Europe during the last three years. Australia was asked to adopt the draft. The question was submitted to a vote of the people.

I do not know whether the attention of the Senate or of any Senator has been called to the fact that Australia passed upon that question by a vote of the people. It is rather interesting. The draft was rejected by a large majority. The action in no wise indicated disloyalty on the part of the Australian population, but the people of Australia believed the draft a denial of fundamental rights and they would have none of it.

Ireland also has furnished her quota of brave men for the European firing lines. And yet when, after a long struggle, England was able to put the clutch of the draft upon her own sons she did not think it wise to draft the sons of Ireland. They were left free to volunteer.

No one questions the patriotism and loyalty of the four and a half million of citizens in the United States who are bound by closest ties of blood and association to the Emerald Isle. The Irish in America, if allowed free choice, would no doubt contribute their share of volunteers for this war in which we are engaged. Shall we subject these proud men of Irish descent and birth to the draft in this land of boasted freedom, whose kindred are free from the draft in the old country and the colonies of the British Empire?

THE DRAFT IS THE COROLLARY OF MILITARISM.

Stop and think for a moment how many of our European emigrants have saved and sacrificed and broken the closest human ties that they might rear their sons in a land exempt from the tyranny of militarism. The thought of the draft is perhaps less abhorrent to us native Americans than to those who have felt the iron heel in other lands and have come to the United States believing it a refuge for those who love liberty.

Go out among the Jews, the Italians, the Russians, the Scandinavians, and other nationalities and you will find a keener realization of the meaning of this measure than among those citizens who have never learned by hard experience how galling is the yoke of involuntary military servitude.

The senior Senator from Idaho spoke feelingly, eloquently, in this Chamber on the day that war was declared, of his sympathy for the 8,000,000 Germans and 2,000,000 Austrians who are a no less integral part of our national life than the citizens of Scandinavian, Irish, Italian, Russian, or English origin, and who have contributed in the same spirit to our national unity, prosperity, and progress.

The fact that we are made up of peoples of many nationalities, most of whom feel very intensely on this subject of draft, should in itself be an impelling reason why Congress should insist on a volunteer army to fight on foreign soil.

The draft is the corollary of militarism and millitarism spells death to democracy. No war can be successfully prosecuted that has not the spontaneous support of the men who do the fighting. There is not the shadow of an excuse for pressing men into involuntary military servitude for the conduct of this war.

In face of all the reasons why we should adopt the volunteer plan for the conduct of this war, it will be a black page in the history of Congress, if we pass the draft provisions of this bill.

The feature of compulsory overseas service in foreign lands embodied in this bill, for the first time in the history of civilized government, I believe, distinguishes this measure from any draft law of which I have knowledge. It distinguishes it certainly from any adopted by any country in a situation similar to our own.

WEBSTER SAID THE DRAFT WAS UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

If it was the fashion of the day to pay any attention to the Constitution, it might be well to demonstrate that there is no authority in the Constitution to raise an army by draft and send them across the seas into foreign lands, there to engage in military operations which do not involve protection of the lives or property or rights of the citizens in this country. Even the right to raise men by draft to carry on a war here at home has been seriously questioned, and in view of the peculiar language of the Constitution and the fact that the Federal Government is one simply of delegated powers, able and distinguished statesmen and lawyers have argued that the Federal Government had no such power.

Now, I am going to read for the edification of the Senate an authority upon that subject. I read from the speech on the conscription bill delivered by Daniel Webster in the House of Representatives December 9, 1814. Mr. Webster says:

If the Secretary of War has proved the right of Congress to enact a law enforcing a draft of men out of the militia into the Regular Army, he will at any time be able to prove, quite as clearly, that Congress has power to create a Dictator. The arguments which have helped him in one case will equally aid him in the other, the same reason of a supposed or possible State necessity, which is urged now, may be repeated then, with equal pertinency and effect.

Sir, in granting Congress the power to raise armies, the people have granted all the means which are ordinary and usual, and which are consistent with the liberties and security of the people themselves, and they have granted no others. To talk about the unlimited power of the Government over the means to execute its authority, is to hold a language which is true only in regard to despotism. The tyranny of arbitrary governments consists as much in its means as in its ends; and it would be a ridiculous and absurd constitution which should be less cautious to guard against abuses in the one case than in the other. All the means and instruments which a free government exercises, as well as the ends and objects which it pursues, are to partake of its own essential character, and to be conformed to its genuine spirit. A free government with arbitrary means to administer it is a contradiction; a free government without adequate provision for personal security is an absurdity; a free government, with an uncontrolled power of military conscription, is a solecism, at once the most ridiculous and abominable that ever entered into the head of man.

Shades of the departed Webster, the greatest expounder of our Constitution! A little more than 100 years ago what I am reading here to-night was uttered by that great statesman, the man of all in the honored list who best understood and best interpreted the Constitution. I shall now read and print as an appendix to my remarks a more extended extract from Mr. Webster's argument. (See Appendix No. 1.)

WANT SAME PRINCIPLE APPLIED AS WAS APPLIED IN CIVIL WAR.

I have said that the arguments which support the draft proposition of the Civil War refute the draft proposition contained in this bill. This is easily shown by a reference to the debates upon the draft law of the Civil War. No man attempted then to justify the draft except upon the ground of absolute necessity. It was said again and again in the course of those debates that if any other means could be pointed out which gave reasonable hope of securing the men to crush the rebellion to save the Nation, that means would be adopted. What we, as opponents of this bill, are asking to-day simply is that the same principle shall be applied. No man can say with any show of truth that we can not raise in this country by voluntary enlistment every man and more than will be required in this war declared April 4, 1917.

Mr. Olin, of New York, who had the Civil War draft bill in charge in the House in 1863 when that bill was under consideration, said (p. 1214, Congressional Globe):

I should have been glad to have seen this rebellion crushed by the voluntary efforts of the citizens of the Republic, but if this can not be, I believe it to be a part of my duty to place at the command of the General Government every soldier capable of bearing arms and thus give the rebel Confederacy to understand, give the world to understand, that the destruction of the Republic will never come until the Republic becomes a solitude and a desert.

Again he says:

This is the first attempted exercise of that great power * * * to compel all our citizens to devote their lives to sustain, defend, and perpetuate the life of the Republic.

You will observe in Mr. Olin's statement, as well as throughout the entire debate, that the men of that time made no pretense that there had ever previously been any resort to draft in this country. You will also note in this speech, as in that of every other advocate of the draft at the time, that the principle is laid down that every man capable of bearing arms must be put into the Army, and that that must be done in order that the Republic might not perish.

When the time comes as the result of this war upon which we are now embarking that every man must bear arms in order to beat off the foe and save the Republic, I venture to say that no voice will be raised against such legislation as may then be necessary to accomplish that purpose; but until it is felt that there is at least some slight occasion for resorting to the draft I can not see how any man who loves his country and cherishes her institutions can be willing to call into existence this awful autocratic and despotic power the exercise of which nothing can justify except the extremist necessity.

Resorting to the draft at the time and under the conditions described in the Civil War was the exception which proves the rule that voluntary enlistment is the normal manner of raising an army. As well might you say that because a surgeon is justified in cutting off the leg of a patient afflicted with a disease or suffering from an injury which makes his only chance of life dependent upon such an operation that the surgeon might go about cutting off legs at will when no such necessity for the operations existed as to contend that because the draft was justified in the acute crises of the Civil War that it should be applied now.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S ATTITUDE.

The letter said to be an unissued letter from President Lincoln concerning the draft of the Civil War printed in the report which accompanied this bill from the Committee on Military Affairs, and from which report I have previously quoted, contains the complete and final answer to the sponsors of this bill. In that letter, found on page 5 of the report, it is said:

We already have, and have had, in the service, as appears, substantially all the men that can be obtained upon this voluntary weighing of motives—

"Voluntary weighing of motives!" Weighing of motives by each man for himself. I continue to quote:

And yet we must somehow obtain more or relinquish the original object of the contest, together with all the blood and treasure already expended in the effort to secure it. To meet this necessity the law for the draft has been enacted.

"Voluntary weighing of motives!" Lincoln understood. He knew that it was the inalienable right of every citizen to weigh for himself the motives pro and con as to his entering the Army. In the case of a minor it was his right and his duty to seek and to some extent be guided by the views of his parents; and it was the right and the duty of the parents to advise and, to some extent at least, control the decision of the minor son who had under consideration the grave question of whether he should volunteer or not. It never occurred to Lincoln that the men who were asked to join the Army should be expected to give up this right of voluntary choice—"voluntary weighing of motives!" It was only in the great crisis, when the iron hand of absolute despotism must be laid upon the individual in order that the Nation might survive, that he considered the possibility of the draft. Again in this same letter he said, with his wonderful clearness of expression:

There can be no army without men. Men can be had only voluntarily or involuntarily. We have ceased to obtain them voluntarily, and to obtain them involuntarily is the draft—the conscription. If you dispute this fact, and declare that men can still be had voluntarily in sufficient numbers, prove the assertion by yourselves volunteering in such numbers, and I shall gladly give up the draft.

Note the words "we have ceased to obtain them voluntarily." Have we ceased to obtain soldiers voluntarily for this war? Why, it has been demonstrated on this floor during the course of this debate, by the Senator from Missosuri [Mr. REED] and others, that you have but to call for the soldiers and they will volunteer. When you gentlemen, supporters of this bill, can say truthfully, as Lincoln said, "We have ceased to obtain men voluntarily," then you have a right, and only then, under the authority of Lincoln's example, to resort to the draft; but until you can say that Lincoln is against you, every authority to which you have appealed is against you, every precedent in this or any other free Government is against you.

But even under these circumstances the draft in the Civil War was a complete failure. It did not produce enough men to suppress the riots which the attempted enforcement of the draft caused. This is strikingly demonstrated by Lincoln himself.

GEN. MILES AGAINST THE DRAFT.

Gen. Nelson A. Miles, an able, devoted soldier and patriot, testified before the House Committee on Military Affairs in January, 1916, on House bill 12766. Gen. Miles began his service in the Civil War as second lieutenant in 1861. He was rapidly promoted for meritorious service, mustered out in 1865, and brevetted major general of volunteers August 25, 1864, for "highly meritorious and distinguished conduct throughout the campaign and particularly for gallantry and valuable services at the Battle of Reams Station, Va." He was awarded congressional medal of honor July 23, 1892, for distinguished gallantry at Chancellorsville; conducted several campaigns against hostile Indians on the western frontier; was commander of the United States troops at Chicago during the railroad strike trouble in 1894; senior commanding officer of the United States Army 1895 to 1903; retired, August 8, 1903.

Gen. Miles, being examined before this committee, testified as follows:

Mr. GORDON. You are opposed to compulsory service?
Gen. MILES. Absolutely.
Mr. GORDON. Do you believe that we can raise 133,000 men each year for three years for the continental army without compulsion?
Gen. MILES. With compulsion, I hope not. I think it would be a very dangerous step toward centralization. As far as conscription was concerned, that was tried out during the Civil War with unsatisfactory results. I think there were 54,000 men added to the Army—54,000 additional to 2,000,000 men—by conscription, but I know that just at that time of the crisis of the Gettysburg campaign thousands of the best troops, drilled and disciplined men in the Army, had to be taken out of the field and sent back to suppress the riots occasioned by that unpopular measure. Approximately 10,000 or 12,000 were ordered to New York, and I know that there was a brigade in Pennsylvania which was organized at Huntingdon, and, instead of being sent to the field, where they were needed, they were sent to Philadelphia to maintain order. It was a very unpopular measure at that time in that great crisis of the Nation.

On this same subject, before the same committee, Prof. Edward P. Chaney, professor of European history, University of Pennsylvania, testified as follows:

Only two or three times was the draft used; and whether the draft was ever used at other times, I have never seen any authoritative statement. It was recommended, as I say, by Congress for the States. It was not used in the War of 1812 and it was not used in the Mexican War. It was only used at the beginning of the third year of the Civil War, when the bill was passed for the using of the draft. In July, 1863, was the first effort to enforce that which was made. Three times after that the draft was made use of. The draft was accompanied with these two other provisions—that men could pay money indemnity or guarantee a substitute. When they guaranteed substitutes it was, in a certain sense, that they were going recruiting for certain men.

I doubt very much whether Mr. Lincoln would have approved of the draft, certainly at the beginning, if he had not felt it necessary, and he wrote that he was willing to do that because there were no other alternatives. As this actually worked out, somewhat more than half of the men drafted were excused under one exception or another, more than half of those left secured substitutes, and less than half of those still left were actually drafted into the service. Of the something like 2,000,000 men in our Army, only 2 or 3 per cent served under compulsion, and the draft was accompanied with riots.

AMERICANIZE OUR MILITARY, DO NOT MILITARIZE AMERICA.

Maj. William C. Harllee, of the United States Marine Corps, testified before the Senate Military Committee in a previous Congress when the subject of universal military training was under discussion. Maj. Harllee, who served as private, corporal, and sergeant during the Philippine insurrection, and as a cadet at the Academy at West Point for 2 years, and for 17 years as an officer of the Marine Corps, offered some very sensible, enlightening, and progressive views as to the best way of raising and maintaining an army.

He begins his testimony with this very pertinent inquiry:

Instead of attempting to militarize America and to bring America to the ideals of the present military orthodoxy, why not Americanize our military institution and bring it to the ideals of America?

On the subject of conscription Maj. Harllee says:

I am opposed to universal service, or compulsory service, or any other kind of service other than that rendered by willing men. * * * Unhappy or dissatisfied men are of no service to a military or any other body. * * * Unwilling men burden armies, eat its substance, retard its action, and give it panic. Even if there were enough jails and Federal constabularies to enforce universal service without riots among a people, it would not be good business to do it.

No, Mr. President, you can not excuse the attempt to foist the draft upon the people of this country by any appeal to history, or any resort to precedent, and so it is that the supporters of this bill shift their ground. At one time they declare that we can not raise the necessary army by voluntary enlistment; at another time they assert that voluntary enlistment will raise too many. At another time they say that the "selective draft" is necessary in order to get the right kind of young men into the Army; at another they contend that it is necessary in order that the "slackers" may not be left at home. The President has put this wholly theoretical, and, to my mind, fallacious argument in its most attractive form.

CONTRAST'S ATTITUDE OF PRESIDENTS LINCOLN AND WILSON.

For a statement of the President's argument I quote his recent letter to Congressman HELVERING, of Kansas, given to the press on the 19th of this month. In that letter he says:

The idea of the selective draft is that those should be chosen for service in the Army who can be most readily spared from the prosecution of the other activities which the country must engage in and to which it must devote a great deal of its best energy and capacity.

The volunteer system does not do this. When men choose themselves, they sometimes choose without due regard to their other responsibilities.

And again:

The principle of the selective draft, in short, has at its heart this idea, that there is a universal obligation to serve and that a public authority should choose those upon whom the obligation of military service shall rest, and also in a sense choose those who shall do the rest of the Nation's work.

There you have it! There you have Prussianism raised to the nth power. "When men choose themselves, they sometimes choose without due regard to their other responsibilities," so says the President. And what is the remedy? The President's letter furnishes the answer. "A public authority should choose those upon whom the obligation of military service shall rest"; but into what service, trade, or labor the draft agent of the President decides, for the President does not stop with choosing "those upon whom military service shall rest," but "also in a sense chooses those who shall do the rest of the Nation's work." The individual is to have no right of choice. A "public authority" is to do it. The counsels of the father, the wishes and the prayers of the mother, the judgment of the young man himself are all scouted as unworthy of consideration under this plan. Oh, how different was Lincoln's conception! He said let there be "voluntary weighing of motives" by the individual so long as that is possible, and only abandon that course when the very life of the Nation is at stake and to abandon it seems the one possible way of securing an army to preserve the Nation.

No Prussian dream of efficiency could induce Lincoln to abandon the democratic principle that the citizen was able to choose for himself, and had a right to choose for himself, and had the intelligence to choose wisely and the patriotism to make the choice with devotion to his country as well as with due regard to his own obligations, until, as he said, the moment of great crisis arrived and the life of the Nation hung in the balance. Remember that the Prussian system which this bill foolishly attempts to imitate is only efficient—in so far as conscription produces an efficient system—because it has been drilled into the subjects of that country through generations, and because during all that time the individual has had constantly before him the specter of war and invasion and possible destruction by the surrounding nations.

Col. Maude, cited so often as a high authority—Col. F. N. Maude, of the British Army, in an article on the achievements of the British Army in this war, says, speaking of the relative merits of the German or Prussian system and the volunteer—for at the time this article was written Great Britain had not resorted to conscription:

Compulsion had done all that it could do, and more than even the best Prussian dared to expect, for their troops. It has carried them forward to almost certain death in a manner which has exacted the admiration of all our men and officers; but at that critical moment when the fate of empires hangs in the balance it has always failed them and our men—territorials and regulars alike—

Volunteers, for all the territorials are volunteers, and regulars—and all the regulars in Great Britain were volunteers up to the time that this article was written—have sprung forward upon them with the bayonet with a determination never dreamt of in warfare since the days of Waterloo and the Peninsula.

Your compulsory system, your draft system, may produce a machinelike type of soldiery, but that element which sweeps to victory, which comes from the devotion that leads men to victory, you find wanting under any system that must depend upon compulsion for service.

PRUSSIANIZING THE UNITED STATES.

Maj. Gen. John F. O'Ryan, of New York, in October, 1915, stated the same idea now expressed by the President—not in the fine phrase of the President, but in the blunt words of the camp—in his address to the Technology Club, of New York. Since that time those in authority have felt it necessary to use more diplomatic language to express the same idea. His frankness in speech has not been imitated by any of the advocates of the draft. I quote from the report of his address in the New York Times, under date of October 21, 1915. He had the same idea of the way to make soldiers that the advocates of this bill have.

[From the New York Times, Oct. 21, 1915.]

Maj. Gen. John F. O'Ryan told members of the Technology Club at the fifth "war luncheon" yesterday that the greatest value of a trained soldiery came from the process which made them mere automatons, trained to do the bidding of their officers. "The first thing that must be done," he said, "is to destroy all initiative, and that with the training fits men to be soldiers.

"The recruit does not know how to carry out orders. His mental state differs from that of the trained soldier who obeys mechanically. We must get our men so that they are machines.

"We have to have our men trained so that the influence of fear is overpowered by the peril of an uncompromising military system often backed up by a pistol in the hands of an officer.

"The recruits have got to put their heads into the military noose. They have got to be jacked up. They have got to be bawled out."

That tells the story. That is the condition to which this Prussianizing plan would reduce our men in the ranks. The very first step in that plan is taken when the "public authority" referred to by the President—some underling it may be in the military service—raps at the door with the butt of his musket and tells the parents that he has come to take their boy, to transport him over the seas and put him in the trenches to be killed, or perhaps only blinded or permanently crippled. The parents can not even argue with this petty military agent who is given the power of life or death over their boy, for to do so would not only be useless but it would be resisting the draft, and they would only render themselves liable to the terrible penalties provided for such a crime. What a mockery it is to apply the expression "universal obligation to serve" to such a proceeding as that. That this idea of selective draft has been tolerated up to this point by the people is due, in my opinion, to the fact that it has been presented with a plausibility which has lead them to believe that it would mean equal opportunity and equal liability to serve the country. And the same patriotism and loyalty which would have made the volunteers come forth in overwhelming force had they been called for has led many of the people to remain silent while a controlled press has clamored for the Prussianizing of our Army.

But once they understand what this means, once they feel the iron hand within the velvet glove, we shall see that the spirit is not dead which has raised volunteer armies again and again in defense of liberty. When they see that "universal service" may mean favoritism and unfair discrimination—and no man in the White House, however well intentioned he may be, can prevent abuses under the provisions of this bill—they will find the means of relief through their most powerful weapon—the American citizen's ballot.

WHAT THE SELECTIVE DRAFT MEANS.

It has been said that the obligation to serve the country as a soldier is a universal obligation, like that of paying taxes, to support the Government. In my opinion there is no analogy between the two; but, even if there were, the analogy between the selective draft of this bill and the obligation to pay taxes would mean that it would be left to the judgment of some "public authority" to decide who would pay taxes and who should not.

A little while ago we had with us an English captain, who testified before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives on April 14 last. His full title is Capt. Percy George Reginal Benson, and he made a strong statement in favor of our applying the draft. His argument is precisely that of the President.

I quote from his testimony, page 5 of hearings before House Committee on Military Affairs:

Mr. KAHN. In this country it has been stated that by reason of your volunteer system at the beginning many of your best men who could have been utilized as officers were killed?

Capt. BENSON. Undoubtedly. For instance, men of that type went out in the Sportsmen's Battalion, an organization composed of 1,028 men. Those men had the sporting spirit and wanted to go to the front, and instead of the Government saying, "All are liable to serve, and we will not let you go, but we will take you into the officers' training corps for officers," they went into the Army. There was wasted a tremendous lot of valuable material for officers at the beginning in that way.

Do you not see? Under the selective draft, the sports and bloods, whom some friend thought would make officers, or who had a pull, would not get into the trenches. It would be just plain Jimmie Jones and Johnnie Smith who would be taken for that work, and the sportsmen and the politicians' sons and the boys whose fathers had influence would be held back as "material for officers." So the selective draft will choose not only who shall go but where they shall go, whether to be shot or to be brevetted, whether to be kicked and cuffed, "jacked up," and "bawled out" as a private soldier, or whether they shall receive such soft berths as parental pull may provide for them. All this in the name of democracy!

Did you ever hear of a Dreyfus case in an army of American volunteers? Do you think there could have been such a thing as the official murder of the Irishman, Francis Sheehy-Skeffington, by an officer in our volunteer army, and the officer merely be sent to a sanitarium to recuperate?

I have noticed in the papers during the last few days expressions of some of the well-known patriots who have come to the support of this bill. One was John D. Rockefeller, jr., who, in the Washington Star of April 22, has a long interview favoring selective draft because of its "democratic" tendencies. He says:

I know of no better way of putting men upon a parity of manhood than by putting them upon a parity of work.

And Joe Leiter came out with an interview a few days ago favoring this bill because of its "democratic" features. According to the public press, he said:

The administration bill is a sensible attempt to equalize the burdens of war. It places military service upon the same basis as taxes. Those who object to it will be "slackers" at heart or expect to secure commissions or some special privilege under the volunteer system. The only objection to the administration bill is that it does not give the country a permanent policy.

That is just beginning, you know. Give them a little time, and they will fix that all right. This is just a start. It would not have been thought of six months ago, but it has been nursed for years by the military board, and they have seized upon this as a favorable opportunity to fasten it upon the American people not merely as a system to be resorted to in war; it is the first step toward making the draft permanent.

SOME "AUTOCRATIC" TENDENCIES OF THE TIMES.

Mr. President, I have sometimes been sort of lifted out of my surroundings here in the Senate in the last few weeks and made to almost doubt my environment as I have heard Senators talk about democracy and how much we are to do for other governments in spreading the doctrine of democracy. Just a few days ago the country was thrilled with the announcement that the President of the United States, thoroughly in sympathy with the struggles that are being made in Russia to throw off the yoke and establish a free government, and wanting to promote their efforts and sustain them, had selected as a pilot for them in their struggles through the maze and difficulties of establishing a democracy the distinguished gentleman who formerly represented New York in this Senate, Elihu Root. He has been designated by President Wilson to go over to Russia and see to it that the provisions of their constitution shall insure equality for all.

As I remember, that distinguished gentleman took a very active part in a constitutional convention held a few years ago to frame a new constitution for the State of New York. His influence in that body was, of course, very potential, and the document was turned out and submitted to the people to be passed upon in the election of 1914. Its adoption became a very burning issue. The plain people studied the work of that constitutional convention. They became pretty well informed about it and rejected it at the polls by a majority of upward of 500,000. Up to that time Mr. Root had been very prominently mentioned as almost sure to be nominated candidate on the Republican ticket, but after the election, after the people of the State of New York had passed upon the cunning of his handiwork in the framing of that constitution, it led very promptly to his withdrawal as the candidate for the Republican nomination for the Presidency. But in these days of new apostles of democracy he has been selected by this administration to go to Russia and aid the Russian people to establish a free government.

I imagine that some of the people recently released from Siberia, who remember the struggles of their friends, political refugees, to secure an asylum in this country during the time when the distinguished gentleman who has been selected for this high mission by the present administration was in official life, and the obstacles which he continually placed in the way of their securing an asylum in this country, will perhaps enlighten some of those political refugees who have lately come back from Siberia to make their homes in Russia, and they will perhaps have a pretty fair understanding as to just how far to follow his counsel. These are great days for democracy, Mr. President.

This administration has been quite insistent that the people of Mexico had a right to work out the sort of a government they wanted down there for themselves, frame their own constitution, build their own democracy, but under the new doctrine that now prevails we are going to draft an army to go to Europe and shoot democracy into the German Government.

But, Mr. President, the times are too serious, the issues too momentous for humor, even if it be a little grim; and from any point of view we always come back to the proposition that this bill, fathered by the Army board and attempted to be foisted upon the people in the name of "democracy," will destroy democracy. Every interest, every newspaper, every man who has been opposing popular government in this country is to-day lined up in support of this bill.

BILL MEANS A MILITARY AUTOCRACY.

I have trespassed longer upon the time of the Senate than I intended in a general discussion of this measure, for I wish to reserve some time for consideration of the amendments which I have proposed. There are many glaring defects in the bill, even from the standpoint of those who favor it. For example, the provision of section 2, that all persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens shall be subject to draft. It is familiar law, though possibly not known to the Army board, that we have no right to draft aliens within our borders into military service, other than locally and in the nature of police service. Besides, there are treaties with a number of the nations involved specifically forbidding such proceeding on our part. Every person whom we force into the Army under these conditions and every family of every such person, if the drafted men were killed, could properly present claims against the Government.

If this bill contemplated anything except the creation of a military autocracy it would have extended the rights of the men in the ranks and provided proper compensation for them and protection for their families against want, in the case of their death. That we should pay the common soldier $15 a month for the privilege of being shot and crippled for life, and leaving his family destitute, and then refuse to provide a sufficient pension for his dependents, is one of the crying shames of our Army plan. It would have been the first thing to have been corrected in this bill had the Army board back of it had the least idea that the common soldier had any rights entitled to respect.

PLAN SHOULD BE SUBMITTED TO VOTE OF PEOPLE.

I come now, Mr. President, to the amendment I have proposed providing for an advisory vote on the part of the qualified electors upon the following question:

The Government of the United States having declared war against the Government of Germany, shall the United States Government at this time raise an army by draft to send to Europe to prosecute the war?

The methods by which the advisory vote can be obtained are very simple. This vote could be secured while registration was going forward under the bill, which, according to my amendment, strikes out the draft features and provides for raising the required number of men by voluntary enlistment. Practically no expense would be involved in obtaining the vote, and every voter would be given the opportunity of expressing his opinion upon this most vital question. If the people vote in favor of the draft and of sending the Army to Europe, that closes the discussion. If the friends of this bill are sure that it has the support of the people, they should be the first to agree to this amendment. If the principle of the bill has not the support of the people, it should be abandoned. No harm can come from pursuing the course I propose. Incalcuable harm may result if that course is not pursued and this bill is forced through at this time. The draft features can be quickly added to the volunteer features, which are preserved in the bill by the proposed amendment, if the people vote in favor of the draft, and in the meantime enlistments under the volunteer system will have proceeded. Not a day will have been lost. In a matter of such transcendent importance, where it is proposed to reverse the policy of this Government from its beginning, and upon which the people have never had the opportunity to express themselves in any form, a decent regard for the principle of popular government requires that the question involved in this bill should be submitted to the voters.

The proposed amendment, as I have said, is intended to eliminate from the bill all draft features, except those relating to the National Guard, and adds to the bill a simple, speedy, and inexpensive plan by which the voters of the country may express themselves upon the principle of draft.

This is accomplished by leaving the sections numbered first and second of section 1 of the bill untouched, and by slight changes in the language of the bill eliminating the draft features, as indicated on the face of the bill, and providing for voluntary enlistment.

Section 3 of the bill under this plan is necessarily stricken out.

All provisions of the bill relating to registration and raising the required number of troops is retained. The bill if passed in the amended form would therefore permit of everything being done that would be done under the original bill for a number of weeks, so far as actual raising and equipping the Army is concerned.

The proposed amendment does not disturb the provisions of the subdivision second, in section 1, relating to drafting the National Guard, for the reason that this is substantially the law at the present time, and to suggest disturbing it would raise a question not now necessary to consider.

While the work of voluntary enlistment, equipment, and registration would be going forward under the law if the bill in the amended form was enacted, the provisions with respect to a referendum would become operative, and within 45 days or less from the time the bill in its amended form became law we could have the most complete expression of the opinion of the voters of the country on the subject of draft which it would be possible to obtain. This vote is made advisory in order to avoid any possible constitutional difficulty; and there can be little doubt that if the voters express themselves strongly against the draft, we would proceed to raise our army according to the only plan under which we have ever raised an army in this country, namely, by voluntary enlistment. If, however, the voters express themselves in favor of the draft, then it is certain that all substantial opposition to the draft at this time will disappear.

SUBMISSION WOULD OCCASION NO DELAY.

The plan would give the people an opportunity to be heard, and would put at rest any possible controversy which might arise if it is sought to enforce a draft without giving to the voters any opportunity for expression on the subject.

This amendment requires no new machinery to put it in operation. It uses the Census Bureau and the Post Office, and it can be completed within 45 days. The Government Printing Office can supply the necessary ballots within 10 days. They can be delivered at the rate of 1,800,000 per day. As soon as such delivery begins the Director of the Census can start the distribution, and the whole country can be supplied within the time provided. The Director of the Census can determine the size of the ballot, and thus can order it in a form to permit it to run through the counting machinery, so that the counting can be done rapidly. The result will be ascertained promptly, accurately, and in a way to furnish an authoritative guide to Congress.

Mr. President, the suggestion has been made by the Senator on my right and the Senator on my left that a recess might be taken at this hour and that I might conclude my remarks in the morning. If I could be certain to have the floor to go on with my address in the morning, I would very gladly relinquish it at this time and not detain the Members of the Senate and the officers of the Senate a moment longer to-night; but unless I can be assured of being recognized and having the floor to conclude what I have to say to-morrow morning I must go on to-night.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, so far as I am personally concerned it would be all right, but I know that there are a number of Senators who expect to speak to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair would, of course, be unable to make any promise as to to-morrow, because he is only a temporary occupant of the chair and will not be in the chair in all probability in the morning. It is entirely with the Senate, under the unanimous-consent agreement, and while the Chair assumes that there would be time for the Senator to conclude in the morning, he does not feel that he would have the authority to make any promise that might bind whoever may be in the chair at that time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Chair has a list before him on the desk, as I understand, of quite a number of Senators who desire to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is quite a large number at the desk.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They are awaiting recognition under an understanding with the Vice President, and, of course, I might be excluded from recognition to-morrow morning if I yielded the floor under a misapprehension to-night.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I should like to have spoken to-morrow, but there were a number of Senators who expected to speak to-morrow, and so I made my remarks this evening.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am not making any request on the ground of personal convenience to myself. I never felt fresher or better than I do now, or more able to proceed, and I will not waste another moment in the discussion of this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will understand that the Chair would personally have no objection to the Senator going on in the morning, but the difficulty is that he can not promise anything as to what might be the ruling of the occupant of the chair in the morning.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well, Mr. President, I will continue my observations.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not intend to discuss his amendments to-morrow, also?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can not do so within five minutes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Ten minutes are allowed, as I understand.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I can speak once on the bill generally for 10 minutes, and only once. I have two amendments that cover a number of pages, and which are, in my view, important, the discussion of which would require some time. I do not know that I advance the chance of those amendments being favorably considered by the Senate by discussion to-night, but if the matter which I am putting before the Senate now can appear in the RECORD to-morrow before the Senate meets, what I submit to-night on those amendments might pass under the eyes of some Senators who are not here.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I will state to the Senator that I think the RECORD is printed about 3 o'clock, and if he wishes to get his remarks in the RECORD I think he had better conclude pretty soon. I make the suggestion in order that the Senator's remarks get into the RECORD. I want to be sure that they get into the RECORD, for I should like to read them over after having heard them.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very anxious to get them into the RECORD, and I will not waste any more time in discussing this matter of recognition.

WOULD EXEMPT CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

The further amendment which I have proposed adds to the bill a new section to be known as section 12 and requires very little explanation. This bill is so framed as to allow the President great latitude in exempting persons from its provisions who would, except for such exemptions, be liable to draft under the provisions of this bill.

The exemption provisions of the bill are found in section 3, and provide, in the first place, that certain classes shall be exempt as a matter of law, and include in such exempted classes all "officials, legislative, executive, and judicial of the United States and of the several States and Territories." The bill also empowers the President at will to exempt numerous other classes of persons mentioned therein, and further provides that a person who "is found to be a member of any well-organized religious sect or organization, at present organized and existing, whose creed forbids its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed of said religious organization" shall be exempted. The bill further provides that the—

President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft * * * persons engaged in industries including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency; those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support, which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable; and those found to be physically and morally deficient.

So far as I can see almost anyone under these provisions of the bill can be exempted, and anyone of the required age that is from 19 to 25 years and found to be physically and morally fit can be refused exemption. Some one must pass upon the thousands and tens of thousands, and perhaps hundreds of thousands, of applications for exemption which will arise if this bill goes into effect. The bill makes no provision for any tribunal, body, or person to pass upon these claims for exemption. The English draft law of January, 1916, which seems to have contained the germ at least of the present bill and which is in many respects vastly superior to it in point of clearness as well as definiteness contains a provision for three tribunals, namely, a local tribunal, an appeal tribunal, and a central tribunal, to pass upon the claims for exemptions.

From the local tribunal an appeal is allowed to the appeal tribunal, and from the appeal tribunal an appeal is allowed to the central tribunal, so that the English law provides for tribunals at least to secure to the subject such right of exemption as the law allows him and endeavors to secure some uniformity of decision. Nothing of the kind is provided in the bill now under consideration.

I have accordingly offered this amendment providing for the three tribunals, substantially as provided for in the English act mentioned, and I have stated specifically in the amendment four grounds of exemption. Some of the grounds of exemption provided for in the amendment may be provided for in section 3 of the bill, to which I have just alluded; and if so, the inclusion of such grounds of exemption does no harm.

I have endeavored in the amendment, however, to extend the right of the conscientious objector, so as to take in all persons who have "a conscientious objection" to the undertaking of combatant service in the present war. If the "selective-draft" law for which this bill provides is to be saved from the danger of becoming a means of oppression and tyranny of the worst form, tribunals must be provided to pass upon the claims of exemption. If the supporters of this bill desire to doom it to failure from the start, they have only to force its passage without any provision for a tribunal to pass upon the claims for exemption, which are bound to arise under it. The English law, even with its liberal provisions for exemption from the operation of the draft, and with its three tribunals for hearing applications for exemption from the draft, has worked badly.

SHOULD GUARD AGAINST MILITARY PERSECUTION.

Mr. Charles P. Trevelyan, M. P., in an open letter to the American people published December 5, 1916, said that up to October, 1916, there were nearly 2,000 young men in prison by reason of conscientious refusal to do military service. I quote this portion of his letter:

Nor would anyone here have believed three years ago that nearly 2,000 Englishmen would have been imprisoned for conscientious refusal of military service, some of them condemned to death, and only respited at the last moment, and many bullied and tortured by the military.

Yet England has a homogenous population, not made up as ours is of people from almost every nation in the world. If the result of the attempted enforcement of the English draft law under the conditions existing there, with its liberal exemptions and tribunals to pass upon the claims for exemptions, are as stated above by Mr. Trevelyan, what can you expect will follow in this country if this bill is passed, without containing even the safeguards of the English law.

Furthermore, as we all know, there are many thousands of spiritual-minded citizens in the United States who believe that all war is wrong, and that it is against civilization and the Christian religion, and who will be killed rather than to kill. These people are by no means confined to members of religious organizations—as that language used in this bill. These people are among our best citizens—sober, industrious, law-abiding, God-fearing people, and yet this bill makes no provision which will allow them to obey the dictates of their conscience if in the operation of the draft they are selected for military service, and neither does it contain any provision to protect these people or any others from being singled out and made the special objects of military persecution under this law. These and other considerations in justice and fairness require the adoption of this amendment.

OUR REAL PROBLEM IN THIS WAR.

Mr. President, the declaration of war as passed by Congress was, to quote the gist of it:

That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany, which has been thrust upon this United States, is hereby formally declared.

This momentous step having been taken, it was to be expected that we should proceed to conduct the war along definite lines and for specific ends. And in the great ordeal with which the Nation is confronted it seems to me the people of the United States will want to know, and that they have the right to know, what the governmental policy is to be and to what ends the war is to be fought.

The general world situation, together with the events that it is claimed caused the United States to enter the war clearly indicate that our efforts should be directed along two well-defined lines:

First. All our naval and military resources should be concentrated on the solving of the submarine problem.

Second. All our moral and diplomatic power should be directed to the earliest possible conclusion of the war on the basis of a durable peace.

We had gone to war because Germany's persistent submarine warfare had interfered with the rights of neutral commerce. Logically our naval and military resources should have been concentrated upon destroying submarine menace—to the assembling of an army of experts from civil and military life, whose genius, skill, and training, backed by all the resources of this great Nation of ours, might cope with the dreaded submarine.

We need not theorize or speculate as to the practical wisdom of the course so clearly marked out for us by the long line of events that led to the declaration of war, nor is it worth while to dwell upon the fact that such a line of action was in accordance with our traditions in keeping us free from entangling alliances and preserving the advantages of our independent place in the world.

Congress was not given an opportunity to say anything about the war policy. With only a day intervening after the declaration of war Congress was asked to appropriate $7,000,000,000—only one billion less than the entire cost of the Civil War—and, without any budget or any guarantee whatever of how it was to be spent, other than that three billions was to be loaned to the allies and the remainder to be used for the prosecution of war, the bill was hurried through Congress under the strange spell of an "emergency" call. The two objects were presented in the one measure, so that it was necessary to vote the loan for the allies if we voted supplies for the Army and Navy necessary for the conduct of the war. I say for myself that otherwise I would not have voted to make the loan, if it had been a separate proposition, if I could have voted for the supplies for the Army without casting my vote for the entire bill. Committed to war, Congress was bound to furnish equipment, to make liberal, generous appropriations for the men and measures that such a declaration necessarily carries with it.

It is for the American public to judge whether, if the President had laid before Congress and the people of the United States his extraordinary program, tieing this country up with the allies, assuming undefined responsibilities and unforeseen consequences—whether, if he had frankly stated his purpose at the time he asked for the declaration of war—whether the declaration would have been made at all.

The declaration has been made. The most urgent demand of the President has been satisfied. The enormous sum of money has been appropriated by Congress without question and without stint.

THE SUBMARINE MENACE.

But the menace of the submarine is more and more insistent. Each day it becomes more evident that the submarine is the problem of the war.

Yesterday's papers contained the alarming official news that Lord Devonport, the British food controller, had issued a statement on April 25 solemnly warning the British public that severe privation menaced the nation on account of the country's shipping being depleted daily in large volume.

If the nations at war can not force enough ships through the submarine blockade to transport food to their hungry people they surely can not spare ships for the transportation of our troops across the Atlantic.

If we undertake the task with our own Navy, what probable fate awaits the expedition?

The war in Europe furnishes a number of examples of the danger of entering great enterprises with blind confidence in military and naval power that has not been efficiently organized or modernized to meet the enemy.

Much has been made of the unpreparedness of Great Britain. But the history of the war demonstrates that it is not the lack of loyalty of volunteers, but the bullheadedness of British statesmen and military and naval officers in command that is at bottom, the cause of blunders, now frankly admitted. It was not because volunteers did not fight valiantly at the Dardanelles that the siege failed. It was because the noble lords and famous commanders undertook the capture of land fortresses which they should have known were invincible against naval attack.

Mr. President, the report of the Dardanelles commission offers sad proof of the danger—the awful danger—of blind surrender to the dictatorship of any one man, no matter how great a hold he may have on public confidence.

Mr. President, the acute and dangerous situation created by the enemy's submarine warfare might not confront the world to-day if England had given heed to the advice and warnings of her own experts. At this point I wish, without taking the time at this late hour to read in its entirety, to direct attention to the letter of Sir Percy Scott, together with the comment of the London Times of June 5, 1914. This letter of Sir Percy Scott was written December 15, 1913. That was some time before the European war broke out.

Sir Percy Scott warned the British people, at the time of the publication of this letter, that the submarine was to be the controlling factor of the seas. It is a remarkable letter, one worthy the attention of the American Congress and the American people before we commit ourselves to policies which will prove as disastrous as some of those that have been pursued elsewhere without heeding the warning given by Sir Percy Scott.

In connection with that letter I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate a very remarkable editorial which appeared in the Scientific American on the 7th of April, 1917, entitled "Germany's Submarine Effort." The result of this special investigation conducted by the Scientific American presents the seriousness of the problem which confronts this Nation. Also a brief extract from the address of Hon. Walter L. Fisher, former Secretary of the Interior, on the subject of the submarine, when he spoke at congressional hearings nearly two years ago. I ask leave to print the editorial and also the extract from Mr. Fisher's address as a part of the appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

AN EARLY OFFICIAL ENGLISH WARNING.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I read a part of the comment and summary that appeared in the London Times in connection with the letter of Sir Percy Scott.

[From the London Times, Friday, June 5, 1914.]

THE SUBMARINE MENACE—SIR PERCY SCOTT'S VIEWS—USELESSNESS OF GREAT BATTLESHIPS—FUTURE NAVAL WARFARE.

"But the strength of navies can not be reckoned only in dreadnaughts, and the day may come when it will not be reckoned in dreadnaughts at all."—Mr. Churchill, March 26, 1912.

"To the whole system of naval architecture and the methods of computing naval strength are brought under review by the ever-growing power, radius, and sea worthiness of the submarine, and by the increasing range and accuracy of its fatal torpedoes."—Mr. Churchill, March 17, 1914.

The communication which we print below must attract general attention, both at home and abroad, alike from the personality of the distinguished writer and the cardinal importance of his subject. Admiral Sir Percy Scott is a naval officer who has not only shown himself on several occasions able to think ahead of his contemporaries, but has made good his prophecies. To him we owed the presence of the naval guns at Ladysmith, which saved the situation, if not South Africa. He it was who made possible the advance in marksmanship with heavy guns which has been such an important feature in naval efficiency of late years. To him, too, it is due that the navy recently was provided with a "director" which has enormously increased the possibilities of hitting at long ranges and enabled broadside salvo firing to be carried out with a precision before unknown.

Sir Percy Scott goes still further in his forecast of the future, for, assuming that submarine can not fight submarine, he sees the end of sea warfare altogether. Neither numbers nor skill are to avail. Nothing will live afloat, for, if opposed nations have provided themselves with a sufficiency of submarines, they can destroy everything which can not hide from these vessels below the surface. The position apparently will become one of the greatest disadvantage to the nation which depends for its existence upon water-borne supplies. Indeed the only obvious benefit which these islands will derive from the change is the removal of all fear of invasion, seeing that, if battleships and cruisers can not cross submarine-infested waters, neither, of course, can transports.

Sir Percy Scott brings the very serious charge against those in authority of wasting the nation's money on ships that will be unable to fight. It is for them, he suggests, to defend that policy by explaining what part the battleship will play in war, how she can be made safe from destruction by the submarine at sea or in port, and how her situation is to be kept secret from aircraft. Instead of battleshpis, he would have the money voted for their construction spent on building more submarines and seaplanes.

Mr. President, the lateness of the hour does not permit me to discuss the inevitable conclusion to be drawn from the authorities I have cited taken in connection with the facts of submarine destruction as now known to the world.

Shall we, heedless of the warning, reckless of human life, load our boys onto transports incapable of defense against submarine attack, to take their chances of being sunk along with the enormous freight tonnage we know is going to the bottom of the sea daily? Shall hundreds of thousands of American troops be sacrificed as the English and Australian troops were at the Dardanelles in a desperate and foolhardy undertaking? Is there not enough slaughter going on now without exposing our young men to the double risk of being blown up at sea and of being killed in the trenches?

The cause of the allies is suffering much more from scarcity of food than from lack of men. The only reasons thus far urged for our sending troops to Europe are "sentimental." In the present desperate condition of the world food supply it is frightful to think of the quantities going to the bottom of the sea. The slaughter of more men is not going to stop the war. The submarine must be coped with and outmatched. From every standpoint it is up to us to fight the war out on this line.

OUR EFFORTS COULD BE MORE POTENT THAN THROUGH ARMIES.

Under any circumstances the raising of a million men by draft, training and equipping them with uniforms and guns, withdrawing them from their normal occupations, is an enormously wasteful project. A careful survey would without doubt demonstrate that the effort might be much more potent in ending the war if expended in raising food and devising means of getting it to the allies.

But if we must have an army of such magnitude for an overseas expedition let it be a volunteer army on the Canadian and Australian basis. Let its ranks be made up of free, willing men who desire to go. This will not raise any constitutional question nor be in such flagrant violation of our traditions, nor will it necessitate any such upheaval of our economic life as this draft proposition seems to call for.

The President and his Cabinet appear to be making plans for the mobilization of all the activities and output of a hundred million people distributed over a territory equal to all Europe, excluding Russia. Germany has been 50 years acquiring efficient control over the business of two-thirds as many folks living in an area about the size of Texas.

Even if it were possible for the United States to work such a transformation over night, it would hardly be wise to do so. If we are to preserve our liberties, these social and economic changes must be wrought out slowly and carefully in the public interest. Students of the subject tell us that one of the evils of the European war is that the autocratic control of business under the pressure and exigency of war does not tend to promote democracy but to strengthen imperialism.

However patriotic the motives of the great financiers and captains of industry, who are being entrusted to execute the far-reaching plans of the President, these men by instinct and training have the imperialistic idea of the right way to manage trade and production. If the transportation business is to be conducted in the public interest like the post-office business, for instance, we can hardly entrust the mobilization of the railroads to their own officials, who are not satisfied with the recent advance in rates which have overflowed their coffers with the largest net earnings in the history of railroading in this country, but are now demanding another 15 per cent increase on the existing extortionate rates.

Under the high pressure and excitement of the hour the country may be confused and unable to see straight. But before very long the sober common sense of the American people may be depended upon to assert itself. They will want to know why their boys are being drafted, what they are paying taxes for, why the country is being militarized and needlessly dominated.

In my judgment, the only way to avert a strong and bitter reaction is to satisfy the people of the United States that we have conscientiously used our influence and power to bring about a just and durable peace in the world.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S DEMANDS.

Mr. President, in his address to the Senate of January 22 President Wilson outlined what he deemed the basis of a permanent international agreement in language and terms important to recall at this time.

"It must be a peace without victory," the President said, and then he stated these propositions:

First. No peace can last, or ought to last, which does not recognize and accept the principle that governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that no right anywhere exists to hand peoples about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were property. I take it for granted, for instance, if I may venture upon a single example, that statesmen everywhere are agreed that there should be a united, independent, and autonomous Poland, and that henceforth inviolable security of life, of worship, and of industrial and social development should be guaranteed to all peoples who have lived hitherto under the power of governments devoted to a faith and purpose hostile to their own.

Second. So far as practicable, moreover, every great people now struggling toward a full development of its resources and of its powers should be assured a direct outlet to the great highways of the sea. Where this can not be done by cession of territory, it can no doubt be done by neutralization of direct rights of way under the general guaranty which will assure the peace itself. With a right comity of arrangement, no nation need be shut away from free access to the open paths of the world's commerce.

Third. "Freedom of the sea," says the President, "is a problem closely connected with the limitation of naval armaments and the cooperation of the navies of the world in keeping the seas at once free and safe. And the question of limiting naval armaments opens the wider and perhaps more difficult question of the limitation of armies and of all programs of military preparation. Difficult and delicate as these questions are, they must be faced with the utmost candor and decided in a spirit of real accommodation if peace is to come with healing in its wings, and come to stay. Peace can not be had without concession and sacrifice. There can be no sense of safety and equality among the nations if great preponderating armaments are henceforth to continue here and there to be built up and maintained. The statesmen of the world must plan for peace, and nations must adjust and accommodate their policy to it as they have planned for war and made ready for pitiless contest and rivalry. The question of armaments, whether on land or sea, is the most immediately and intensely practical question connected with the future fortunes of nations and mankind."

In the course of this remarkable address the President expressed the conviction:

I feel confident that I have said what the people of the United States would wish me to say. May I not add that I hope and believe that I am, in effect, speaking for liberals and friends of humanity in every nation and of every program of liberty? I would fain believe that I am speaking for the silent mass of mankind everywhere who have as yet had no place or opportunity to speak their real hearts out concerning the death and ruin they see to have come already upon the persons and homes they hold most dear.

Rarely is it given to one man to speak so movingly to a listening world.

This exalted appeal of the President to the warring nations for a peace "without victory" was made before we became a party to the conflict. But that very fact should make the President, the Congress, and the people of the United States even more strongly resolved to hold to the noble ideals promulgated by President Wilson as the basis of an international agreement.

FREE RUSSIA'S POSITION.

Russia in the very throes of her new birth proclaimed her adherence to the high standards set for the world by President Wilson. She did not ask that her enemy be crushed or conquered by slow attrition. She gave out to the world:

That free Russia does not aim at the domination of other nations, at depriving them of their national patrimony, or at occupying by force foreign territories, but that its object is to establish a durable peace on the rights of nations to decide their own destiny.

We have distinguished visitors in our midst. They are entitled to every honor and consideration. It is to be expected that our American press, which is no less mad for conscription than for war, should blazon in large letters the opinions of the official representatives of the allies as to the necessity of conscription in this country.

If, as reported in the newspapers, Mr. Balfour has suggested that the United States will need 5,000,000 men for the conduct of the war, we can not but infer that he represents the view that our enemy must be crushed or worn out by slow attrition, and that he expects the United States to uphold the exhausted allies in this determination.

OUR DUTY IS TO MAKE AN END OF THE WAR.

Mr. President, the people of the United States will not stand for an indefinite prolongation of this war for these ends. The only way this administration can justify its course is by bringing the war to the earliest possible conclusion on the basis of the President's peace message.

If a tithe of the energy and power we have consumed in making war had been directed to its settlement, world peace would be at hand.

But having entered the war we should use our great power and position to make an end of it. That is what the country expects of the President and Congress. If the expectation is not met, it will grow into a demand and become the foremost issue of the next election. An awakened and terribly overburdened people will hold Congress to a strict accountability.

Already we notice a change of attitude on the part of the allies—a stiffening of their demands since our entrance into the war. It is but human nature that with all our resources back of them they should begin to talk of indemnity and territorial aggrandizement. We are in a position to choose whether we shall lead or be led. If we agree to fight for these drastic conditions and terms of the allies, we can hardly uphold the claim that we are making war for democracy.

Already there is a resolution introduced in the Senate which proposes that we shall bind ourselves as the entente allies have done, to make no peace until all parties are satisfied. The American people should not be confused as to this issue. The power to make a separate peace is a tremendous lever which can be used by us at the opportune time, to bring all the nations to reasonable terms. We should hold ourselves free to render this service to humanity at the earliest possible moment.

APPENDIX NO. 1.

Let us examine the nature and extent of the power which is assumed by the various military measures before us. In the present want of men and money the Secretary of War has proposed to Congress a military conscription. For the conquest of Canada the people will not enlist; and if they would, the treasury is exhausted, and they could not be paid. Conscription is chosen as the most promising instrument both of overcoming reluctance to the service and of subduing the difficulties which arise from the deficiencies of the exchequer. The administration asserts the right to fill the ranks of the Regular Army by compulsion. It contends that it may now take 1 out of every 25 men, and any part, or the whole, of the rest, whenever its occasions require. Persons thus taken by force and put into an army may be compelled to serve there during the war or for life. They may be put on any service, at home or abroad, for defense or for invasion, according to the will and pleasure of the Government. This power does not grow out of any invasion of the country, or even out of a state of war. It belongs to government at all times, in peace as well as in war, and it is to be exercised under all circumstances, according to its mere discretion. This, sir, is the amount of the principle contended for by the Secretary of War.

Is this, sir, consistent with the character of a free government? Is this civil liberty? Is this the real character of our Constitution? No, sir; indeed it is not. The Constitution is libeled, foully libeled. The people of this country have not established for themselves such a fabric of despotism. They have not purchased at a vast expense of their own treasure and their own blood a Magna Charta to be slaves. Where is it written in the Constitution, in what article or section is it contained, that you may take children from their parents and parents from their children and compel them to fight the battles of any war in which the folly or the wickedness of government may engage it? Under what concealment has this power laid hidden which now for the first time comes forth, with a tremendous and baleful aspect, to trample down and destroy the dearest rights of personal liberty?

Who will show me any constitutional injunction which makes it the duty of the American people to surrender everything valuable in life, and even life itself, not when the safety of their country and its liberties may demand the sacrifice, but whenever the purposes of an ambitious and mischievous government may require it? Sir, I almost disdain to go into quotations and references to prove that such an abominable doctrine has no foundation in the Constitution of the country. It is enough to know that that instrument was intended as the basis of a free government, and that the power contended for is incompatible with any notion of personal liberty. An attempt to maintain this doctrine upon the provisions of the Constitution is an exercise of perverse ingenuity to extract slavery from the substance of a free government. It is an attempt to show, by proof and argument, that we ourselves are subjects of despotism, and that we have a right to chains and bondage, firmly secured to us and our children by the provisions of our Government. It has been the labor of other men at other times to mitigate and reform the powers of government by construction; to support the rights of personal security by every species of favorable and benign interpretation, and thus to infuse a free spirit into governments not friendly in their general structure and formation to public liberty.

The supporters of the measures before us act on the opposite principle. It is their task to raise arbitrary powers by construction out of a plain written charter of national liberty. It is their pleasing duty to free us of the delusion which we have fondly cherished that we are the subjects of a mild, free, and limited Government, and to demonstrate—and to demonstrate by a regular chain of premises and conclusions—that Government possesses over us a power more tyrannical, more arbitrary, more dangerous, more allied to blood and murder, more full of every form of mischief, more productive of every sort and degree of misery than has been exercised by any civilized Government, with a single exception, in modern times.

The Secretary of War has favored us with an argument on the constitutionality of this power. Those who lament that such doctrines should be supported by the opinion of a high officer of the Government may a little abate their regret when they remember that the same officer, in his last letter of instructions to our ministers abroad, maintained the contrary. In that letter he declares that even the impressment of seamen, for which many more plausible reasons may be given than for the impressment of soldiers, is repugnant to our Constitution. It might therefore be a sufficient answer to his argument in the present case to quote against it the sentiments of its own author, and to place the two opinions before the House, in a state of irreconcilable conflict. Further comment on either might then be properly forborne until he should be pleased to inform us which he retracted and to which he adhered. But the importance of the subject may justify a further consideration of the arguments.

Congress having, by the Constitution, a power to raise armies, the Secretary contends that no restraint is to be imposed on the exercise of this power, except such as is expressly stated in the written letter of the instrument. In other words, that Congress may execute its powers, by any means it chooses, unless such means are particularly prohibited. But the general nature and object of the Constitution impose as rigid a restriction on the means of exercising power as could be done by the most explicit injunctions. It is the first principle applicable to such a case, that no construction shall be admitted which impairs the general nature and character of the instrument. A free constitution of government is to be construed upon free principles, and every branch of its provisions is to receive such an interpretation as is full of its general spirit. No means are to be taken by implication which would strike us absurdly if expressed. And what would have been more absurd than for this Constitution to have said that to secure the great blessings of liberty it gave to government an uncontrolled power of military conscription? Yet such is the absurdity which it is made to exhibit, under the commentary of the Secretary of War.

But it is said that it might happen that an army could not be raised by voluntary enlistment, in which case the power to raise armies would be granted in vain, unless they might be raised by compulsion. If this reasoning could prove anything, it would equally show, that whenever the legitimate power of the Constitution should be so badly administered as to cease to answer the great ends intended by them, such new powers may be assumed or usurped, as any existing administration may deem expedient. This is the result of his own reasoning, to which the Secretary does not profess to go. But it is a true result. For if it is to be assumed, that all powers were granted, which might by possibility become necessary, and that government itself is the judge of this possible necessity, then the powers of government are precisely what it chooses they should be. Apply the same reasoning to any other power granted to Congress, and test its accuracy by the result. Congress has power to borrow money. How is it to exercise this power? Is it confined to voluntary loans? There is no express limitation to that effect, and, in the language of the Secretary, it might happen, indeed it has happened, that persons could not be found willing to lend. Money might be borrowed then in any other mode. In other words, Congress might resort to a forced loan. It might take the money of any man by force, and give him in exchange exchequer notes or certificates of stock. Would this be quite constitutional, sir? It is entirely within the reasoning of the Secretary, and it is a result of his argument, outraging the rights of individuals in a far less degree than the practical consequences which he himself draws from it. A compulsory loan is not to be compared, in point of enormity, with a compulsory military service.

Sir, I invite the supporters of the measures before you to look to their actual operation. Let the men who have so often pledged their own fortunes and their own lives to the support of this war look to the wanton sacrifice which they are about to make of their lives and fortunes. They may talk as they will about substitutes, and compensations, and exemptions. It must come to the draft at last. If the Government can not hire men voluntarily to fight its battles, neither can individuals. If the war should continue there will be no escape, and every man's fate and every man's life will come to depend on the issue of the military draft. Who shall describe to you the horror which your orders of conscription shall create in the once happy villages of this country? Who shall describe the distress and anguish which they will spread over those hills and valleys, where men have heretofore been accustomed to labor and to rest in security and happiness. Anticipate the scene, sir, when the class shall assemble to stand its draft and to throw the dice for blood. What a group of wives and mothers and sisters, of helpless age and helpless infancy, shall gather round the theater of this horrible lottery, as if the stroke of death were to fall from heaven before their eyes on a father, a brother, a son, or a husband. And in a majority of cases, sir, it will be the stroke of death. Under present prospects of the continuance of the war not one-half of them on whom your conscription shall fall will ever return to tell the tale of their sufferings. They will perish of disease and pestilence, or they will leave their bones to whiten in fields beyond the frontier. Does the lot fall on the father of a family? His children, already orphans, shall see his face no more. When they behold him for the last time they shall see him lashed and fettered, and dragged away from his own threshold, like a felon and an outlaw. Does it fall on a son, the hope and the staff of aged parents? That hope shall fail them. On that staff they shall lean no longer. They shall not enjoy the happiness of dying before their children. They shall totter to their grave, bereft of their offspring and unwept by any who inherit their blood. Does it fall on a husband? The eyes which watch his parting steps may swim in tears forever. She is a wife no longer. There is no relation so tender or so sacred that by these accursed measures you do not propose to violate it. There is no happiness so perfect that you do not propose to destroy it. Into the paradise of domestic life you enter, not, indeed, by temptations and sorceries, but by open force and violence.

But this father or this son or this husband goes to the camp. With whom do you associate him? With those only who are sober and virtuous and respectable like himself? No, sir. But you propose to find him companions in the worst men of the worst sort. Another bill lies on your table offering a bounty to deserters from your enemy. Whatever is most infamous in his ranks you propose to make your own. You address yourselves to those who will hear you advise them to perjury and treason. All who are ready to set heaven and earth at defiance at the same time, to violate their oaths and run the hazard of capital punishment, and none others, will yield to your solicitations. And these are they whom you are allowing to join your ranks, by holding out to them inducements and bounties with one hand, while with the other you are driving thither the honest and worthy members of your own community, under the lash and scourge of conscription. In the line of your Army, with the true leveling of despotism, you propose a promiscuous mixture of the worthy and the worthless, the virtuous and the profligate, the husbandman, the merchant, the mechanic of your own country, with the beings whom war selects from the excess of European population, who possess neither interest, feeling, nor character in common with your own people, and who have no other recommendation to your notice than their propensity to crimes.

Nor is it, sir, for the defense of his own house and home that he who is the subject of military draft is to perform the task allotted to him. You will put him upon a service equally foreign to his interests and abhorrent to his feelings. With his aid you are to push your purposes of conquest. The battles which he is to fight are the battles of invasion—battles which he detests perhaps and abhors, less from the danger and the death that gather over them, and the blood with which they drench the plain, than from the principles in which they have their origin. Fresh from the peaceful pursuits of life, and yet a soldier but in name, he is to be opposed to veteran troops, hardened under every scene, inured to every privation, and disciplined in every service. If, sir, in the strife he fall; if, while ready to obey every rightful command of government, he is forced from his home against right, not to contend for the defense of his country, but to prosecute a miserable and detestable project of invasion, and in that strife he fall, it is murder. It may stalk above the cognizance of human law, but in the sight of heaven it is murder; and though millions of years may roll away, while his ashes and yours lie mingled together in the earth, the day will yet come when this spirit and the spirits of his children must be met at the bar of omnipotent justice. May God, in his compassion, shield me from any participation in the enormity of this guilt.

I would ask, sir, whether the supporters of these measures have well weighed the difficulties of their undertaking. Have they considered whether it will be found easy to execute laws which bear such marks of despotism on their front, and which will be so productive of every sort and degree of misery in their execution? For one, sir, I hesitate not to say that they can not be executed. No law professionally passed for the purpose of compelling a service in the Regular Army, nor any law which, under color of military draft, shall compel men to serve in the Army, not for the emergencies mentioned in the Constitution, but for long periods, and for the general objects of war, can be carried into effect. In my opinion it ought not to be carried into effect. The operation of measures thus unconstitutional and illegal ought to be prevented by a resort to other measures which are both constitutional and legal. It will be the solemn duty of the State governments to protect their own authority over their own militia and to interpose between their citizens and arbitrary power. These are among the objects for which the State governments exist; and their highest obligations bind them to the preservation of their own rights and the liberties of their people. I express these sentiments here, sir, because I shall express them to my constituents. Both they and myself live under a Constitution which teaches us that "the doctrine of nonresistance against arbitrary power and oppression is absurd, slavish, and destructive of the good and happiness of mankind." (New Hampshire bill of rights.) With the same earnestness with which I now exhort you to forbear from these measures, I shall exhort them to exercise their unquestionable right of providing for the security of their own liberties.

In my opinion, sir, the sentiments of the free population of this country are greatly mistaken here. The Nation is not yet in a temper to submit to conscription. The people have too fresh and strong a feeling of the blessings of civil liberty to be willing thus to surrender it. You may talk to them as much as you please of the victory and glory to be obtained in the enemy's Provinces; they will hold those objects in light estimation if the means be a forced military service. You may sing to them the song of Canada conquest in all its variety, but they will not be charmed out of the remembrance of their substantial interests and true happiness. Similar pretenses, they know, are the grave in which the liberties of other nations have been buried, and they will take warning.

Laws, sir, of this nature can create nothing but opposition. If you scatter them abroad, like the fabled serpent's teeth, they will spring up into armed men. A military force can not be raised in this manner, but by the means of a military force. If administration has found that it can not form an army without conscription, it will find, if it venture on these experiments, that it can not enforce conscription without an army. The Government was not constituted for such purposes. Framed in the spirit of liberty, and in the love of peace, it has no powers which render it able to enforce such laws. The attempt, if we rashly make it, will fail; and having already thrown away our peace we may thereby throw away our Government.

Allusions have been made, sir, to the state of things in New England, and, as usual, she has been charged with an intention to dissolve the Union. The charge is unfounded. She is much too wise to entertain such purposes. She has had too much experience, and has too strong a recollection of the blessings which the Union is capable of producing under a just administration of government. It is her greatest fear that the course at present pursued will destroy it, by destroying every principle, every interest, every sentiment, and every feeling which have hitherto contributed to uphold it. Those who cry out that the Union is in danger are themselves the authors of that danger. They put its existence to hazard by measures of violence, which it is not capable of enduring. They talk of dangerous designs against government, when they are overthrowing the fabric from its foundations. They alone, sir, are friends to the Union of the States who endeavor to maintain the principles of civil liberty in the country and to preserve the spirit in which the Union was framed.

APPENDIX NO. 2.

LARGE SHIPS OR SMALL?—THE NEEDS OF GREAT BRITAIN AT SEA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

SIR: Although I have retired from His Majesty's Navy, many people have written, and are still writing, to me as to whether we should build small battleships or large. My opinion is that we should not be building either. My reasons for holding this opinion will be found in a letter I wrote some time ago and a copy of which I inclose herewith. I am,

Yours, truly, PERCY SCOTT.

52 SOUTH AUDLEY STREET, May 31.

52 SOUTH AUDLEY STREET, GROSVENOR SQUARE, WEST,
December 15, 1913.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter, I have seen the correspondence in the press suggesting building smaller battleships and also the arguments as to whether two or four battleships should be laid down in 1914.

If we have battleships, we must have thick armor on them to keep out the enemy's shot, and we must have speed to give a tactical advantage in bringing our fire on the enemy; these are axioms among naval officers. For battleships our Nation and all other nations have very properly decided to have big ships, big guns, thick armor, and high speed.

The other question is, Are we in 1914 to build two or four battleships? The little navyites say two in order to save money; the big navyites say four to, as they think, save the country. If battleships are of use in saving the country, the little navyites are foolish and unpatriotic. If battleships are of no use, then the big navyites are wrong in putting the country to the expense of building four more; the real question to settle before even talking about building more battleships is, Are they of use or are they not? For some thousands of years armed vessels floating on the surface of the water have been used for attack and defense; these vessels to-day vary in size from a canoe containing one man armed with a spear to a 32,000-ton battleship armed with 15-inch guns, and these craft, whether large or small, all float on the water and are visible. In this island we depend upon our food supply coming from overseas; hence it has been necessary for us to have a large number of armed ships to protect our commerce and to safeguard our food supply. This protecting force or insurance of our country is called the Royal Navy and to-day consists of a large number of ships that swim on the water and can be seen and a few that swim under the water and can not be seen.

The introduction of the vessels that swim under water has, in my opinion, entirely done away with the utility of the ships that swim on the top of the water.

The functions of a vessel of war were:

Defensively—
1. To attack ships that come to bombard our ports.
2. To attack ships that come to blockade us.
3. To attack ships convoying a landing party.
4. To attack the enemy's fleet.
5. To attack ships interfering with our commerce.

Offensively—
1. To bombard an enemy's ports.
2. To blockade an enemy.
3. To convoy a landing party.
4. To attack the enemy's fleet.
5. To attack the enemy's commerce.

The submarine renders 1, 2, and 3 impossible, as no man-of-war will dare to come even within sight of a coast that is adequately protected by submarines; therefore the functions of a battleship as regards 1, 2, and 3, both defensively and offensively, have disappeared.

The fourth function of a battleship is to attack an enemy's fleet; but there will be no fleet to attack, as it will not be safe for a fleet to put to sea. This has been demonstrated in all recent maneuvers, both at home and abroad, where submarines have been employed, and the demonstration should have made us realize that; now that submarines have come in, battleships are of no use either for defensive or offensive purposes, and consequently building any more in 1914 will be a misuse of money subscribed by the citizens for the defense of the Empire.

As regards the protection of our commerce on the high seas, we must examine who can interfere with it.

Turkey, Greece, Austria, and Italy must pass through the narrow Straits of Gibraltar to get at our commerce.

Cyprus, Malta, and Gibraltar, well equipped with aeroplanes to observe the enemy's movements and submarines to attack, would make egress from the Mediterranean very difficult.

Spain and Portugal have ports open to the Atlantic and could interfere with our commerce, but war with those countries seems improbable and they are not very far from Gibraltar.

France from Brest could harass our commerce, but if homeward-bound ships gave that port a wide berth and signaled by wireless if they were attacked, fast cruishers and submarines from Plymouth could be very soon on the spot.

Russia and Germany are very badly placed for interfering with our commerce; to get to the Atlantic they must either run the gauntlet of the Channel or pass to the north of Scotland, and even if they get out they have nowhere to coal.

America could attack our commerce, but they would have a long way to come.

If by submarines we close egress from the North Sea and Mediterranean, it is difficult to see how our commerce can be much interfered with.

It has been suggested to me that submarines and aeroplanes could not stop egress from the Mediterranean, that a fleet would steam through at night. With aeroplanes that would report the approach of a fleet and 30 or 40 invisible submarines in the narrow Straits of Gibraltar, trying to pass through them at night would be a very risky operation.

Submarines and aeroplanes have entirely revolutionized naval warfare. No fleet can hide itself from the aeroplane eye, and the submarine can deliver a deadly attack even in broad daylight.

Under these circumstances I can see no use for battleships and very little chance of much employment for fast cruisers. The Navy will be entirely changed; naval officers will no longer live on the sea, but either above it or under it, and the strain on their system and nerve will be so great that a very lengthy period of service will not be advisable; it will be a navy of youth, for we shall require nothing but boldness and daring.

In war time the scouting aeroplanes will always be high above on the lookout, and the submarines in constant readiness, as are the engines of a fire station. If an enemy is sighted, the gong sounds and the leash of a flotilla of submarines will be slipped. Whether it be night or day, fine or rough, they must go out to search for their quarry; if they find her, she is doomed, and they give no quarter; they can not board her and take her as a prize, as in the olden days; they only wait till she sinks, then return home without even knowing the number of human beings that they have sent to the bottom of the ocean.

Will any battleship expose herself to such a dead certainty of destruction? I say no.

Not only is the open sea unsafe, a battleship is not immune from attack even in a closed harbor, for the so-called protecting boom at the entrance can easily be blown up. With a flotilla of submarines commanded by dashing young officers, of whom we have plenty, I would undertake to get through any boom into any harbor and sink or materially damage all the ships in that harbor.

If a battleship is not safe, either on the high seas or in harbor, what is the use of a battleship?

It has been argued to me that if a foreign power destroys our submarines, we are at the mercy of his dreadnaughts. There can be no doubt about the accuracy of this statement, but submarines are difficult to destroy, because it is difficult to attack what you can not see. A power that sends out ships to look for and destroy submarines will be courting disaster; the submarine when in the water must be kept away from, not looked for.

Submarines will be hauled up on land, with arrangements for instantly launching them when required. They can only be attacked by airships dropping bombs upon them.

What we require is an enormous fleet of submarines, airships, and aeroplanes, and a few fast cruisers, provided we can find a place to keep them in safety during war times.

It has been argued to me that our enemy will seize some island in the Atlantic, get some fast cruisers there, with plenty of coal, and from this island prey upon our commerce. This is ridiculous. The moment we hear of it we send a flotilla of submarines, towed by an Atlantic liner. She drops them just when in sight of the island, and she brings them back to England when they have sunk everything they found at the island.

If we go to war with a country that is within the striking distance of submarines, I am of opinion that that country will at once lock up their dreadnaughts in some safe harbor; we shall do the same; their aeroplanes and airships will fly over our country; they will know exactly where our ships are; and their submarines will come over and destroy anything and everything that they can get at.

We shall, of course, do the same, but an island, with many harbors and much shipping, is at a great disadvantage if the enemy has submarines.

I do not think that the importance of submarines has been fully recognized; neither do I think that it has been realized how completely their advent has revolutionized naval warfare. In my opinion, as the motor vehicle has driven the horse from the road, so has the submarine driven the battleship from the sea. I am,

Yours, truly,

PERCY SCOTT.

APPENDIX NO. 3.

EDITORIAL IN SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN OF APRIL 7, 1917, ENTITLED "GERMANY'S SUBMARINE EFFORT."

In war, perhaps more than in any other contest of strength, it is perilous to underestimate the resources and strength of the enemy. That is one of the truisms which are so true that we are in danger of overlooking them altogether. Thus, in regard to the German submarine campaign, we note that there is a tendency to underestimate its potential danger to the allies, and therefore, in the event of its success, to ourselves.

It is generally believed that the submarine-infested areas are so completely covered by the antisubmarine fleets of the allies that the strength of the German attack is constantly being weakened by very large losses; but if we analyze the testimony and apply to it the cold criticism which we would use in any other enterprise; in other words, if we brush aside unauthenticated rumors and confine ourselves entirely to official statements, we shall find that the allied governments have never made any definite statement whatsoever as to the number of German and Austrian submarines that have been captured or sunk.

It is only recently that this journal has been able to obtain a conservative estimate, in quarters where reliable statistics are available; and we are informed that a total loss of 100 would be, if anything, an overstatement of the truth. This figure includes many boats which were supposed to be lost because they were believed to have been heavily hit by shell fire.

For some months we have had a growing conviction, based upon a very close study of the campaign, that the submarine losses were not nearly so large as represented and that with the growth in size, speed, and sea-keeping qualities of the submarine, the problem of meeting and breaking up the so-called blockade is becoming increasingly difficult.

It is our belief that at the time of the Jutland fight, when the German high-seas fleet was driven back with heavy losses and in a badly battered condition to its naval bases, Germany, realizing the hopelessness of any attempt to defeat or break through the British fleet, determined to cease all work upon the construction of capital ships and bend its whole ship-and-engine-building capacity to the creation of a great fleet of submarines for war upon enemy and neutral commerce. Saving and except that this was an utterly illegal form of warfare, the Germans were perfectly right in stating that herein lay their "last chance of victory." For it is a fact that, granted a sufficiently large fleet of submarines, the allies can be, if not starved, at least so hampered by a shortage of food and raw materials for the manufacture of guns, shells, and military equipment that they will be unable to win such an absolute victory as to enable them to dictate the terms of peace. This is the situation as Germany sees it to-day. She has stated that it is her purpose to force the allies to a compromise peace, and whether she can do it or not depends first and last upon her ability to set afloat and man within a definite period of time the thousand or more submarines which would enable her thus to bring the allies to their knees.

What is the German submarine-building capacity? Is it sufficient to enable her, say, within the year to build, equip, and man 1,000 or 1,200 boats? Nobody outside of Germany can answer that question; but the Scientific American believes that she is probably well able to do this, provided, of course, that she is not herself brought to her knees through collapse of her finances, through starvation, or by the absolute overthrow of her armies.

Of course, the only plan by which Germany could build 1,000 submarines in a year would be by what has come to be known as the manufacturing method, of which a notable example is found in the great Ford plant at Detroit. It is pretty safe to say that she has adopted a standard type of craft, the details of which are based upon the experience of the past two and a half years, and that she has enlisted the whole of her shipbuilding plants, public and private, and a corresponding number of her engine-building firms in this work.

We have made investigation of the capacity of the German yards as regards building ways, and it discloses the interesting fact that, without laying down any additional ways, she could have under construction at any given time about 530 submarines of the size of the U-53, which came to Newport last year. The 800-ton submarine requires about 30 feet of clear width in order to allow a working space around the hull, and its length is something under 250 feet. Each of the three 625-foot dry docks at Wilhelmshaven, for instance, would permit of the construction of six submarines on its floor, and eight boats could be constructed in each of the larger docks, 822 feet in length. Also the floating docks, of which the Germans have so many, would form excellent building ways. The smaller dry docks, 500 feet or less in length, and the floating docks would take two, three, or four submarines, as the case might be. Moreover, ways suitable for submarine construction can be built rapidly on foreshore or river bank, and the actual shipping and dock-yard capacity, so far as building ways is concerned, could quickly be doubled. If the Germans thought fit, they could have a thousand submarines under construction at the same time.

The limiting factor as to time capacity, however, would not be the provision of ways, or even the construction of the hulls, but rather the rapid construction of the internal equipment. Of this, the engines would present the least difficulty, for Germany is the great Diesel engine country, and if they extended themselves in a concerted effort of this kind the leading heavy-oil engine builders, such as Krupps, the Emden Works, the Augsburg Works, and the Neuremburg Works, reinforced by less known firms and the large number of engineering plants which could be requisitioned for this work, would be well able to take care of the demand. The principal difficulty would be to supply the special apparatus in the way of periscopes, gyroscopic compasses, and the other mechanical details, which must be of the very finest workmanship and require special knowledge and skill. Germany, however, is famous for her optical work, and unless there was a shortage of the materials required, the instrument makers should be able to keep pace with the shipbuilder and the builder of engines.

As to the time for construction, one large shipbuilding firm in this country has assured us that if its plant were doing nothing else it could turn out a submarine of the German type in five months' time. Our Naval Construction Corps estimates that it would take seven months. If Germany is concentrating her whole shipbuilding resource upon the task, we believe that six months might be taken as a fair average.

The central powers may have 200 submarines afloat—and we think it is possible that they have many more than that—and if, as is more than likely, they have some 500 on the ways at the present time, this would mean that in six months they would have 700 U-boats available, and 1,200 by next spring.

But the crews? The German naval personnel numbers over 150,000 men. Her idle battleships can supply all the men required to man the submarines as they are successively set afloat.

Here, as we see it, is the immediate danger point in this great conflict into which we have now entered. It is here that we should apply, and should at once apply, our whole effort.

APPENDIX NO. 4.

EXTRACT FROM ADDRESS OF HON. WALTER L. FISHER, FORMER SECRETARY OF INTERIOR.

We are at least entitled to ask questions. If our Navy is intended only to defend our own shores from invasion, could we not enormously increase the number of our submarines for the same money that it is proposed to spend on dreadnaughts, and would not the result give us a far more effective Navy for purely defensive purposes? Does not a single superdreadnaught cost as much as many submarines, depending on the types selected? If modern war—if this war—has taught us anything, it is that a navy of the dreadnaught class is of little, if any, practical value against a stronger navy of the same sort. The weaker navy is inevitably bottled up. It dare not come out into the open unless it is prepared to risk all upon the result of its unequal contest with a stronger force. Unless we are prepared to enter the endless competition in naval expenditure, is not the navy of the era that ended with this war a waste of money and a self-deception as an efficient instrument of defense? Is not this confessed by the insistence of those who cling to this type of navy that the United States must increase its Navy until it equals the navy of any other nation? Some say any other nation except England, either because they are appalled at competition in naval expenditure with England, whose existence as a world power depends upon predominance at sea, or because they think we should assume that war will never occur between England and the United States. Some insist that we must have a Navy equal in aggressive strength to the combined navies of any two other nations except England, and that anything less than this will leave us without adequate protection for the very reasons that are given as underlying the dreadnaught naval theory.

Has not this war demonstrated that a navy composed chiefly of great numbers of submarines, supplemented by the torpedo boat, the destroyer, and the aeroplane, would be of immense defensive value against the most powerful dreadnaught navy afloat? Is not a single submarine an effective fighting unit against any fleet, while a single dreadnaught is of practically no value whatever? Might not a few submarines encounter and destroy a mighty fleet, while a dreadnaught navy outclassed in strength by an invading squadron would lie impotent in the harbor? Are we not about to commit this Nation to a program of dreadnaughts that need yet more and more dreadnaughts to make them useful? Is it not wise to delay this program at least until we can know more than is now possible as to the place of the dreadnaught in the future navies of the world?

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1800) to amend an act approved June 29, 1906, and entitled "An act to authorize the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia to sell, hold, and convey certain real estate."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Scio, Oreg., pledging support to the Government and praying that freedom be given the people of Bohemia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PHELAN. I present a petition from the Grand Commandery of the Knights Templar of California, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 21, 1917.

JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Grand Commandery, Knights Templar, of California, in session at Sacramento, Cal., April 20, 1917, unanimously—

Resolved, That the Knights Templar of California avow their belief in some form of impartial and effective conscription in the present national emergency, and urge our Senators and Congressmen to support such measures as may be best forwarded in furtherance thereof; that the present is a propitious time to adopt and effect some efficient system of universal military training for our young men to better fit them for citizenship; and that our Republic in any exigency may justly rely upon them in completest confidence.

THOS. A. DAVIES,
Grand Recorder.

Mr. PHELAN. I present resolutions of the Legislature of California, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 26, 1917.

Hon. JAMES PHELAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please be advised that the following resolution has been adopted by both houses of the California Legislature, senate joint resolution introduced by Senator Breed relative to the universal military training bill before the United States Congress:

"Whereas it is vital to the life and liberty of this Nation that it be put upon a basis of preparedness for war in order that it may not invite, as it does, aggression and successful attack by warlike nations and also in order that it may maintain and preserve our institutions of civil and religious liberty: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate, the assembly concurring, That the Legislature of the State of California hereby indorses the principle of universal military training and respectfully requests the United States Senators from California and the Members of the House of Representatives from this State to support with all their ability a bill in Congress having for its purpose the establishing throughout the United States of a system of universal military training. Your earnest consideration of the resolution is respectfully requested."

CLIFTON E. BROOKS,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Building Trades Council of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation which will stimulate the production and conserve the supply of foodstuffs, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of S. S. Lightbody, of Rochester, N. H.; J. Levi Meader, of Gonic, N. H.; and Arthur T. Case, of Tilton, N. H., praying for prohibition during the period of the war, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of 21 citizens of Winfield of the San Antonio District Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South; of the Polytechnic Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Fort Worth; and of the Tarrant County Sunday School classes of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, all in the State of Texas, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of the county judge of Caldwell County; of the Kewanee Club, of Dallas; and of 5,000 citizens of Rockwell County, all in the State of Texas, praying for selective conscription, which were ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 2102) granting an increase of pension to Increase E. Watson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 2103) granting an increase of pension to Albert B. Watrous; to the Committee on Pensions.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. WATSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. FRANCE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. SHAFROTH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. THOMAS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no other Senator is ready to proceed with the debate, the motion is in order.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 55 minutes a. m., Saturday, April 28, 1917) the Senate took a recess until 10 o'clock a. m. Saturday, April 28, 1917.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 27, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, infinite in all Thy resources, increase our faith and confidence in Thee; for they that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion which can not be removed, but abideth forever. And increase our faith and confidence in the nobility of soul which Thou hast implanted within every man and which is ever contending against selfishness and ignoble desires for supremacy. That we may hasten the coming of Thy kingdom by living to the ideals exemplified in the life and character of the Jesus of Nazareth. Amen.

The journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Bell	Dooling	Lever	Sims
Blackmon	Dupré	Linthicum	Smith, Idaho
Blanton	Dyer	Martin, Ill.	Sterling, Pa.
Borland	Estopinal	Oliver, N. Y.	Sullivan
Buchanan	Flynn	O'Shaunessy	Sumners
Campbell, Kans.	Fuller, Mass.	Pou	Taylor, Colo.
Capstick	Gardner	Powers	Vare
Carter, Okla.	Graham, Pa.	Ragsdale	Ward
Connally, Tex.	Hayes	Raker	Williams
Costello	Hulbert	Robbins	Wise
Curry, Cal.	Johnson, S. Dak.	Rowland
Davis	Kettner	Scott, Pa.
Dill	Kincheloe	Shackleford

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and eighty-two Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a dispatch from the Central Labor Union of Toledo, 10,000 strong, announcing the adoption of resolutions against conscription, and similar resolutions passed by the Machinists' Union and the Glassworkers' Union of Toledo.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3545. Before that motion is put, I would like to make this announcement. As far as we can control the situation, I have an understanding with the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] that those who desire to speak on either side of this question and who were eliminated by the process of elimination which we finally had to adopt shall have the right to have their remarks extended when we begin to read the bill under the five-minute rule. In other words, that he and I will not object to a liberal extension of time in order that these gentlemen may have the same advantage as those who spoke during general debate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understand that the Senate has entered into an agreement to vote to-morrow upon the Senate bill on this same subject. Of course, we would not necessarily be making much progress if the House were to pass a House bill on the subject and the Senate should pass a Senate bill on the same subject unless unanimous consent were given to take it up immediately. It would be desirable, it seems to me, for the House, if possible, to act on the House bill in time to send it to the Senate before a final vote is had on the Senate bill, so that the Senate might vote on the House bill by substituting the text of the Senate bill instead of on the Senate bill by number. Is it the intention of the gentleman to ask the House to sit late to-night with the hope that it might be possible to finish the bill either to-night or early to-morrow morning?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I will say that I intended to make that additional announcement, that I shall ask the House to sit until at least 8 o'clock to-night, probably later, in order that we may vote upon this bill sometime to-morrow. I had a conversation last night with Senator CHAMBERLAIN, and he told me that the Senate had reached an agreement to vote upon the bill sometime during the calendar day to-morrow, and that probably it would be sometime during Saturday night. I hope the House will take a vote on this bill prior to 6 o'clock to-morrow evening.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3545.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3545, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3545, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3545) authorizing the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. [Loud applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I be allowed to proceed with my remarks and that I be not interrupted with questions until I have made my main statement; after that I shall be glad to answer questions. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I want to thank my colleagues on the Committee on Military Affairs for the uniform courtesy and kindness shown me personally during the time the committee was engaged in formulating this legislation. I have a high regard and deep admiration for the chairman of the committee and the members of the majority. I do not approve of the attacks that have been made upon them, because I believe that they are actuated by the same high motives that actuate the members of the minority. [Applause.] I want to thank, too, the members of the minority on that committee for the loyal support they have given me in all our deliberations on this bill. Theirs is a difficult position to occupy. The minority always does occupy a difficult position. It is hard to stand up against a majority, but I hope before I conclude to convince this House that the views of the minority are sound and that at the very beginning of this great struggle that confronts us we must start our military policy on a proper basis. [Applause.] The high-spirited, patriotic, courageous sacrifice of personal interests and creature comforts, and often even life itself, in volunteering for the Republic. The timid, the selfish, the cowardly, are permitted to shirk their duty. The burden ought never to be allowed to fall upon the shoulders of the former alone. Universal obligation to service ought to rest upon the shoulders of all alike. The Nation should never permit our patriotic citizens who are willing to volunteer solely to do the fighting. I do not—I can not—complain of the volunteer soldier. On many a bloody field in our country's history he has demonstrated his valor and his splendid fighting qualities. I would never tolerate any disparagement of him, but I am opposed to the system which permits him alone to do the fighting for the Republic and permits the timid and the cowardly to stay at home. [Applause.] As I recall, the Speaker of this House in addressing us the other day, and there is no man for whom I have a higher regard, said something to the effect that Washington fought his battles with volunteers. That is true. But he did not rejoice over that fact. Let me read to you from Washington's letters what he thought upon the subject. The first is an extract from a letter dated at headquarters, 17th of October, 1777, almost at the beginning of the revolutionary struggle, to Thomas Wharton, president of Pennsylvania. He said:

There is another matter which I beg leave to recommend to the serious consideration of the legislature of your State; that is, the adopting of some mode of completing and keeping up the quota of your Continental regiments. Upon an average your battalions have never been above one-third full, and now many of them are far below even that. From the extravagant prices given to substitutes in the militia in the different States, it has become impossible to recruit more upon the bounty allowed by Congress. The New England States and Virginia have begun to adopt the mode of drafting, and, I am informed, they have succeeded very well. I am convinced that this will be found the only method of raising Continental troops, and if the measure were to become general throughout the States it would not be deemed a hardship. I mention this matter to you at this time in the hope that you will as soon as possible fall upon this or some other mode to recruit your regiments in the course of this fall and winter; and as it is more than probable that our opposition will not end with this campaign, we ought to endeavor to have a respectable army in the field in the spring, before the enemy can receive further reinforcements from Europe.

[Applause.]

In a letter dated at West Point, the 18th of November, 1779, to the President of Congress, he said:

In the more early stages of the contest, when men might have enlisted for the war, no man, as my whole conduct and the uniform tenor of my letters will evince, was ever more opposed to short enlistments than I was, and while there remained a prospect of obtaining recruits upon a permanent footing in the first instance, as far as duty and a regard to my station would permit, I urged my sentiments in favor of it. But the prospect of keeping up an army by voluntary enlistments being changed, or at least standing on too precarious and uncertain a footing to depend on for the exigency of our affairs, I took the liberty in February, 1778, in a particular manner to lay before the Committee of Arrangement, then with the Army at Valley Forge, a plan for an annual draft as the surest and most certain, if not the only means left us, of maintaining the Army on a proper and respectable ground. And, more and more confirmed in propriety of this opinion by the intervention of a variety of circumstances unnecessary to detail, I again took the freedom of urging the plan to the committee of conference in January last: and, having reviewed it in every point of light and found it right, or at least the best that has occurred to me, I hope I shall be excused by Congress for offering it to them, and in time for carrying it into execution for the next year, if they should conceive it necessary for the States to complete their quotas of troops.

The plan I would propose is that each State be informed by Congress annually of the real deficiency of its troops, and called upon to make up, or such less specific number as Congress may think proper, by a draft; that the men drafted join the Army by the 1st of January and serve until the 1st of January in the succeeding year; that from the time the drafts join the Army the officers of the States from which they come be authorized and directed to use their endeavors to enlist them for the war, under the bounties to the officers themselves and the recruits granted by the act of the 23d of January last, namely, $10 to the officers for each recruit, and $200 to the recruits themselves; that all State, county, and town bounties to drafts, if practicable, be entirely abolished, on account of the uneasiness and disorders they create among the soldiers, the desertions they produce, and for other reasons which will readily occur; that on or before the 1st of October annually an abstract or return similar to the present one be transmitted to Congress, to enable them to make their requisitions to each State with certainty and precision.

[Applause.]

Later, from Morristown, May 25, 1780, he wrote to Philip Schuyler, John Mathews, and Nathaniel Peabody, a committee from Congress, as follows:

Unless the principal part of the force be composed of men regularly organized, and on the continuance of whose services we can rely, nothing decisive can be attempted. The militia are too precarious a dependence to justify such an attempt, where they form a material part of the plan. Militia can not have the necessary habits nor the consistency, either for an assault or a siege. In employing them essentially we should run a risk of being abandoned in the most critical moments. The expense and the consumption of provisions and stores, which we are bound by every motive to economize, will be very considerably increased. As we should not be able to keep the same body in the field during the whole campaign, we should a great part of the time have a double set of men to pay and feed, those in actual service and those on the march to relieve them or returning home when relieved. The operations of husbandry will suffer in proportion.

The mode by draft is, I am persuaded, the only efficacious one to obtain men. It appears to me certain that it is the only one to obtain them in time; nor can the period which you have appointed for bringing them into the field be delayed without defeating the object. I have little doubt that at any time, and much less at the present juncture, the powers of government exerted with confidence will be equal to the purpose of drafting. The hopes of the people, elevated by the prospects before them, will induce a cheerful compliance with this and all the other measures of vigor which have been recommended and which the exigency requires.

I have still another letter of the immortal Washington, which I shall read to you, upon this subject:

It is idle at this late period of the war—

He writes to James McHenry, from Philadelphia, March 12, 1782—

It is idle at this late period of the war, when enthusiasm is cooled, if not done away, when the minds of that class of men who are proper subjects for soldiers are poisoned by the high bounties which have been given and the knowledge of the distresses of the Army so generally diffused through every State, to suppose that our battalions can be completed by voluntary enlistment. The attempt is vain, and we are only deceiving ourselves and injuring the cause by making the experiment. There is no other effectual method to get men suddenly but that of classing the people and compelling each class to furnish a recruit.

Oh, how true, how prophetic, are the words of this man whom his countrymen believe to have been the greatest of all Americans! [Applause.] "First in peace, first in war, first in the hearts of his countrymen" was said of him by one of the men who had followed his career all through the troubled days of the Revolution and through those other days when he presided over the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia; and, my friends, it is rarely that a man in public life ever gets full credit for what he has done from his contemporaries. As Mr. Reed, a former distinguished Speaker of this House, once said, "a statesman is a dead politician." When men in public life die, the country only then gives them credit for the services they have performed. Washington was known and loved and revered in his day by all of his contemporaries. [Applause.] And they gladly accorded to him the premiership during that troubled period of the Republic.

I shall not attempt to read further from the writings of Washington. I have here extracts from 15 letters which he wrote to distinguished men of his period, every letter of which recommends drafting for the Continental Army in order that the Colonies might win their fight against the common foe. [Applause.]

I want to say at this time that I intend to treat this subject from an historical standpoint. It has been ably discussed from the sentimental viewpoint by some of those gentlemen in the House who agree with the minority, notably the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], and many others. But I propose to show you, if I can, from the pages of this country's history that the volunteer system has been a failure—not the volunteers, not the men who went into battle for the Republic. They were not failures, but the system under which they went was a failure. [Applause.] And I propose to try to guard against any similar failure in the future.

After the young Republic was established the Congress in 1792 passed a militia bill. I shall read it to you:

That each and every free, able-bodied, white male citizen of the respective States, resident therein, who is or shall be of the age of 18 years and under the age of 45 years (except as hereinafter excepted) shall severally and respectively be enrolled in the militia by the captain or commanding officer of the company within whose bounds such citizen shall reside, and that within 12 months after the passing of this act. And it shall at all times hereafter be the duty of every such captain or commanding officer of a company to enroll every such citizen, as aforesaid, and also those who shall, from time to time, arrive at the age of 18 years, or, being the age of 18 years and under the age of 45 years (except as before excepted), shall come to reside within his bounds; and shall without delay notify such citizen of the said enrollment by a proper noncommissioner officer of the company by whom such notice may be proved. That every citizen so enrolled and notified shall within six months thereafter provide himself with a good musket or firelock, a sufficient bayonet and belt, two spare flints, and a knapsack, a pouch, with a box therein to contain not less than 24 cartridges suited to the bore of his musket or firelock, each cartridge to contain a proper quantity of powder and ball, or with a good rifle, knapsack, shot pouch and powder horn, 20 balls suited to the bore of his rifle, and a quarter of a pound of powder, and shall appear so armed, accoutered, and provided when called out to exercise or into the service, except that when called out on company days' exercise only he may appear without a knapsack.

That law was passed at the beginning of the Republic. It required compulsory military service for every citizen between 18 and 45 years of age. It gradually fell into disuse. Each man furnished his own gun. Can you imagine a regiment made up of men who carried their own rifles? What kind of a regiment would that be to-day? They had what they called in those days "drilling days." Once a year every male citizen came forward to drill. There was no fear of invasion at that time. The only enemy thought of was the Indian on the frontier. If they failed to appear, they were fined $2 or $3 for this failure. Gradually they did not call them together for drill, and the law became a dead letter. But the principle of compulsory military service was in that law of 1792.

Thomas Jefferson, on December 3, 1805, in his annual message to Congress, said:

In the meantime you will consider whether it would not be expedient for a state of peace as well as of war so to organize or class the militia as would enable us on any sudden emergency to call for the services of the younger portions, unencumbered with the old and those having families. Upward of 300,000 able-bodied men between the ages of 18 and 26 years, which the last census shows we may now count within our limits, will furnish a competent number for offense or defense in any point where they may be wanted, and will give time for raising regular forces after the necessity of them shall become certain; and the reducing to the early period of life all its active service can not but be desirable to our younger citizens of the present as well as future times, inasmuch as it engages to them in more advanced age a quiet and undisturbed repose in the bosom of their families. I can not, then, but earnestly recommend to your early consideration the expediency of so modifying our militia system as by a separation of the more active part from that which is less so, we may draw from it when necessary an efficient corps fit for real and active service, and to be called to it in regular rotation.

In explaining that part of his message to Gen. Kosciusko, he wrote a letter dated at Monticello on February 26, 1810, which reads in part as follows:

Two measures have not been adopted which I pressed on Congress repeatedly at their meetings. The one to settle the whole ungranted territory of Orleans by donations of land to able-bodied young men, to be engaged and carried there at the public expense, who would constitute a force always ready on the spot to defend New Orleans. The other was to class the militia according to the years of their birth, and make all those from 20 to 25 liable to be trained and called into service at a moment's warning. This would have given us a force of 300,000 young men, prepared by proper training, for service in any part of the United States, while those who had passed through that period would remain at home, liable to be used in their own or adjacent States. These two measures would have completed what I deemed necessary for the entire security of our country. They would have given me, on my retirement from the Government of the Nation, the consolatory reflection that, having found, when I was called to it, not a single seaport town in a condition to repel a levy of contribution by a single privateer or pirate, I had left every harbor so prepared by works and gunboats as to be in a reasonable state of security against any probable attack; the territory of Orleans acquired and planted with an internal force sufficient for its protection; and the whole territory of the United States organized by such a classification of its male force as would give it the benefit of all its young population for active service, and that of middle and advanced age for stationary defense. But these measures will, I hope, be completed by my successor, who, to the purest principles of republican patriotism, adds a wisdom and foresight second to no man on earth.

So you see the great Jefferson believed that each and every male citizen between certain ages ought to be trained in the use of arms, so that upon occasion he could be called to the defense of his country.

In the War of 1812 we had a peculiar situation. The volunteer system showed its inefficiency in that war as it had not done theretofore in our country's history. Two States, Massachusetts and Connecticut, refused absolutely to furnish any troops for the war. In consequence the burden fell more heavily on the other States of the Union.

Such a condition is possible under the volunteer system. Under the system of selective draft every State in the Union must furnish its quota of soldiers. The burden does not fall unequally, as it did in the War of 1812. It falls on each Commonwealth in exact proportion and on all the citizens of the States exactly alike.

Therefore, it seems to me, recalling what occurred in the War of 1812, one is bound to believe that in that war the volunteer system did not measure up to the standard extolled by those who still believe in that system. The War of 1812 gives no comfort to the advocates of the volunteer system.

The Mexican War was but a repetition of the War of 1812. The States that furnished the troops for that war were largely the States of the South and the Southeast, and a few troops from New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and the Middle West. But I would like you to search the annals of the country to see how many came from the extreme eastern part. Again the volunteer system fell down. Again the burden of that war had to be carried by the willing. Those States that refused to furnish any troops relied upon those who were willing to fight to win their battles. Under the conscriptive plan proposed by the minority of the Committee on Military Affairs every State in the Union must furnish its quota. The strong arm of the United States Government reaches out and takes them into the military service during the war. In this country of ours, this glorious Republic under which the American citizen enjoys so many privileges, so many advantages, ought he not gladly risk even life itself in defense of the rights of Americans and the lives of the citizens of the Republic? [Applause.]

But now let me consider the period of the Civil War. Again I say I have nothing but praise for the volunteer. The volunteer soldier of the South, the volunteer soldier of the North, probably fought as no soldier before his time ever fought. I have nothing but praise for him. But it is the system under which he was recruited to which I take exception.

What is the history of the Civil War period? In the first place, I want to say that during this debate there has been given to the House such a quantity of misinformation and misstatements that if I were to speak for two days I probably would not be able to correct them all. Much has been said of the youth of the boys who enlisted in the Civil War. Tables have been inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to show how they were nearly all boys from 18 to 20 years of age. That misleading table was published in the newspapers of the country some 13 years ago for the first time. The office of The Adjutant General—and that office has control of the records of the soldiers of the Republic—has written thousands of letters denying the accuracy of that published statement. I shall ask the Clerk to read this letter from the Adjutant General for the information of the Members of this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 26, 1917.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. KAHN: In response to your telephonic request of to-day for data concerning the ages of soldiers of the Civil War, I have the hono- to advise you as follows:

A tabulation, falsely claiming to set forth what the records of The Adjutant General's Office show with regard to the ages of soldiers at enlistment during the Civil War, first appeared in the public press about 13 years ago, and since that time this office has repeatedly endeavored to correct the erroneous impression created by the publication of that tabulation. Numerous letters have been written by this office to prominent men, including Senators and Representatives, explaining the facts in the case; but it does not appear that the statement of this office has ever been published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, although the newspaper tabulation has frequently been published.

The tabulation has been printed in various forms, but if the numbers given in it as it appeared in the press originally are resolved into the numbers at each age given therein, the irregularities of the figures are apparent. Following is a statement showing an arrangement of those numbers:

10 years and under	25
12 years	187
13 years	75
14 years	1,223
15 years	104,464
16 years	125,064
17 years	613,840
18 years	306,547
19 years to 21 years	1,008,360
22 years to 24 years	571,885
25 years to 43 years	30,555
44 years and over	16,071
Total	2,778,309

From the foregoing it will be seen that the tabulation would make it appear that the number of men 17 years of age was greater than the number 22 to 24 years of age, and that the numbers 15, 16, and 17 years, respectively, were over three, four, and twenty times as large as the number 25 to 42 years of age. Dr. Gould, whose compilation is referred to in the inclosed pamphlet, seems to have had access to the official records of the War Department, and as his estimates are based upon the examination of the records of more than a million men those estimates should be accurate, and therefore entitled to great weight in considering this question. By a comparison of the figures printed on page 35 of Dr. Gould's publication (United States Sanitary Commission Memoirs) and the tabulation quoted above it will be seen that the two estimates are wholly at variance. For instance, Dr. Gould shows that 58.34 per cent of the million soldiers whose records he examined were under 25 years of age at the date of enlistment, while the tabulation referred to shows that more than 98 per cent of the soldiers in service during the Civil War were less than 25 years of age at the date of enlistment.

As shown on page 7 of the inclosed pamphlet, the average age of the survivors of the Civil War at the end of that war was 28 years, and there is no way to reconcile that estimate with the figures contained in the newspaper tabulation.

The tabulation quoted above accounts by ages for 2,778,309 men of the Army alone, whereas, as shown by the official records, the whole number of credits (each enlistment being counted as a credit) for men furnished to the Army and to the Navy and Marine Corps as well was only 2,778,304, this latter number including many duplications caused by counting men a second time in cases of reenlistment. The number of individuals in service, as estimated by this office, was 2,213,365, and included in that figure are sailors and marines.

The irregularities and discrepancies shown by the newspaper tabulation in question, together with the fact that no compilation showing the ages at which men entered the Union Army during the Civil War has ever been made by the War Department, the only department that has the records from which a reliable compilation can be made, should be sufficient to show that figures such as those given in the tabulation have no official basis and are entitled to no credit whatever.

Very respectfully,

H. P. MCCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

MEMORANDUM RELATIVE TO THE PROBABLE NUMBER AND AGES OF THE ARMY AND NAVY SURVIVORS OF THE CIVIL WAR.

The basis of all estimates as to the number of beneficiaries under and the cost of any proposed Civil War pension law must be the determination of, or an estimate of, the number of the survivors of that war at the present time, and of the number who will be surviving at various periods in the future, until none shall remain. Such an estimate was prepared by the Record and Pension Office in March, 1890, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, House of Representatives, for use in the consideration of various proposed measures which culminated in the act approved June 27, 1890. That estimate was reviewed in April, 1896, with a view to determining whether, in the light of more recent data, any change should be made in it. As a result of that review the conclusion was reached that there was no ground for the belief that a more accurate estimate than that of 1890 could have been made either then or in 1896; and it is not believed that a more accurate estimate can be made now. The estimate made in 1890 and the remarks made thereon in 1896 were substantially as follows:

It should be stated in advance that any estimate of the number and ages of the surviving veterans of the Civil War can not be more than approximately correct, for the reason that the data on which to base such an estimate are deficient in two very important particulars, viz: First, the actual number of individuals in service has never been, and can not be, officially determined; and, second, the numbers of men of different ages, at the date of entry into service or at any given date during the war, have never been ascertained; nor can the missing data be supplied without a laborious search of the many thousands of original rolls and other records filed in the War and Navy Departments—a work which would require years for its completion.

Moreover, if the exact number and ages of the survivors at the close of the war were known, the problem of determining the number now living and the probable duration of life for each group of ages would still be involved in difficulty for no life table has ever been constructed which is based upon such a class of lives as that furnished by the veterans of the Civil War. While it is the generally accepted opinion that the expectation of life of men of this class is less than that of men of the same ages who have never been exposed to the shock of battle and the hardships and privations of field, camp, and prison, on the other hand, it has been very ingeniously urged that, by the operation of the law of the survival of the fittest, the reverse is actually the case, for the reason that the individuals of little endurance and tenacity of life, whose early death materially shortens the average length of life among civilians, have long since been eliminated from the class to which the veterans belong, having succumbed either to the hardships and dangers of the war or their subsequent results. Thus, it is claimed, the survivors have become a selected class, whose average duration of life is likely to be greater than that of an equal number of nonveterans of the same ages, who have not been subjected to this weeding-out process.

It will be readily seen, then, that the problem presented is incapable of an exact solution, and that the results obtained can be nothing more than approximations But it is also evident that an approximation which is reached after a careful study of all the data available, meager though they are, is of much greater utility than the loose estimates and wild guesses which have heretofore passed current in discussions of this question. Moreover, it is believed that sufficient information is at hand to enable a calculation to be made which can not be very far from correct, and which may be safely used for all practical purposes.

As the life table ("Thirty American Offices" male) which was used in the preparation of this estimate is based upon the experience of insurance companies with a class of lives that were selected, to a certain extent at least, and as, for reasons that are more fully set forth below, the expectation of life of veterans of the Civil War must be somewhat greater than that of nonveterans of the same ages, it is believed that the figures obtained from the use of this life table are more nearly correct than figures obtained by the use of a table based upon wholly unselected lives would have been. If, however, it is held by anyone that the expectation of life of the veterans is less than that of the class of lives upon which the life table used is constructed, then the results obtained in this estimate must be considered as maximum figures.

The following estimate is subject to the foregoing remarks and should be considered only in connection with them:

ARMY.

As shown by the latest official statement, the number of men furnished by the different States and Territories during the Civil War, under calls from the President, was 2,778,304. Deducting from this the number of seamen and marines, 105,963, leaves a total of 2,672,341 credited to the Army. The strength of the Regular Army at the outbreak of the war was 16,422, but this number has not been taken into account in the calculation, because the majority of the men whom it represents, being professional soldiers, undoubtedly reenlisted or were commissioned in either the Regular or Volunteer service during the war, and are consequently included in the total number of credits. The strength of the Navy at the beginning of the war has been neglected in the calculation for the same reason.

No official compilation of the total number of reenlistments has ever been made, but it is estimated, from the best data now obtainable, that the reenlistments in the Army during the Civil War numbered 543,393. Deducting this number from the total credited to the Army leaves 2,128,948 as the number of individual soldiers serving in the war.

The number of deaths in the Army, according to the latest official compilation, was 359,528, and the number of actual deserters at large at the close of the war (making due allowance for those incorrectly reported as deserters) has been estimated at 117,247. Deducting the deaths and deserters leaves 1,652,173 as the probable number of individual soldiers who were alive at termination of service and were not deserters.

NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

The total number of men credited to the several States as having been furnished to the Navy and Marine Corps during the Civil War was 105,963. This figure is taken as the basis of calculation, and not the number of enlistments as reported by the Navy Department, which is believed to include a large number of transfers from the Army, and these have already been counted in the Army estimates.

No data are at hand from which to estimate the number of reenlistments, but assuming that their proportion was the same as in the Army, the total number of individuals in service was 84,417. No information has been obtained as to the actual number of desertions, but again assuming that the Army proportion is applicable, the number would be 4,649. The deaths as reported by the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery numbered 4,588. Deducting the deaths and desertions leaves 75,180 as the probable number of seamen and marines who were alive at termination of service and were not deserters.

ARMY, NAVY, AND MARINE CORPS.

Combining the foregoing estimates, it appears that the total number of individuals in the military and naval service during the Civil War was 2,213,365, and that of these 1,727,353 were alive at termination of service (deserters excluded).

As in the case of reenlistments, no official compilation has been made of the ages of the men in service at any period of the war. From statistics of the ages at enlistment of about 1,000,000 soldiers, collected by the United States Sanitary Commission, Dr. B. A. Gould, actuary of the commission, formed estimates of the number of men in each year of age. In the absence of better information, and assuming that the ages of soldiers, seamen, and marines were relatively the same, the tables published by Dr. Gould have been taken as a basis for calculating the appended table (No. 1), which shows the probable total number of survivors (excluding deserters) on June 30 of each year from 1890 to 1909, inclusive, and at the close of each quinquennial period from 1910 until none shall remain.

Table No. 2 shows the probable number of men who will arrive at the age of 62 years, or over, June 30, 1890, and of the probable number that will attain the age of 62 in each succeeding year, until practically all shall have passed that age.

SUMMARY.

(1) Estimated total number of survivors (deserters excluded) June 30, 1890	1,285,471
(2) Total number of men furnished during the war (credits)	2,778,304

1900	55,042

The life table which was used in the calculations involved in the foregoing estimate is based upon the experience of insurance companies with a selected class of lives, and its rates of mortality are somewhat lower than those of other tables that are based upon unselected lives. But, as suggested above the veterans of the war may be considered to be a selected class from among whom, by the operation of the law of the survival of the fittest, those individuals of little endurance and tenacity of life have been eliminated either by the vicissitudes of the war or their subsequent results. In addition to this, the lot of the average veteran is very much better than that of the nonveteran, in that the former enjoys the benefit of liberal pension laws, is given preferment in municipal, State, and Federal employment, and is cared for by relief associations and in soldiers' homes when he needs such care. All of these favorable conditions combined must certainly tend to prolong the life of the class which enjoys their benefit, and there seems to be good ground for the belief that the expectation of life of veterans of the war, in later years at least, is greater than that of nonveterans of the same ages. And for this reason it is believed that the table used in the preparation of the estimate for 1890 and subsequent years has given more accurate results than would have been obtained by the use of a table whose rate of mortality is higher.

It should be observed also that in applying the life table to the determination of the number of survivors at various dates each group of individuals of the same age was dealt with separately, and no attempt was made to use an average age in any calculation. The inaccuracy of the results obtained by the application of a life table to an average age is so well known to those who are at all familiar with statistical matters that it would not be necessary to mention the subject here, were it not for the fact that since the publication of the estimate made by this office in 1890 several estimates have emanated from other sources in which it has been erroneously assumed that the average age of the survivors as determined by this office for a given period could be used as a basis for accurate calculations covering future periods. It is only necessary to say in this connection that, because of the greater rate of mortality among, and the resulting more rapid decrease in the number of, the survivors of the higher ages, the average age of the whole class does not increase as rapidly as the age of an individual member of it. For instance, as estimated in 1890, the average age of all survivors in 1865 was 28 years, whereas in 1895, 30 years later, the average age was only 57 years. The number of survivors on June 30, 1895, as obtained by separately applying the life table to each group of survivors of the same age, differs by more than 40,000 from the number obtained by using an average age in the calculation.

According to the estimate, the survivors of the late war (deserters excluded) should have numbered 1,154,810 on June 30, 1895; and if this figure is correct it should be supported by data obtainable from the records of the Pension Bureau.

It has been ascertained from the Commissioner of Pensions that 735,338 survivors of the war were borne on the pension roll on June 30, 1895; that 116,177 other survivors had claims pending, and that 150,209 "original invalid" claims were on the rejected or abandoned files of the bureau. These figures include those who have been pensioned for service in the Regular Army and Navy since the war, those who have died with rejected or abandoned claims on file, and some duplications in that class of claims. It is impossible to determine exactly how much of an allowance should be made for these factors, but from the best data obtainable it is estimated by this office that a reduction of 57,540 in the foregoing figures should be made in order to make them represent individual survivors of the Civil War. Making this reduction, it appears that the records of the Pension Bureau account for 944,184 survivors on June 30, 1895.

It will be seen from the foregoing statement, then, that the number of survivors on June 30, 1895, as estimated by this office, is 210,626 in excess of the number that can be accounted for by the records of the Pension Bureau on that date; and if the estimate is correct this excess must represent the number of those who, up to June 30, 1895, had never made application for pension, and of whom, consequently, the Pension Bureau could have had no record on that date. This number is, and must always remain, an unknown quantity; but being freed, as it now is, from other obscuring factors, it can be considered by itself, and each one interested in the problem can pass his own judgment upon it.

It is believed that the number of survivors of the war who have never made application for pension is considerably larger than those who have given the question but little thought are accustomed to estimate it to be. There are several different classes of veterans who have not applied for pension. The first, and probably the largest, of these is made up of those who are yet comparatively young men, who are still vigorous and able-bodied, and who are free from disabilities or ailments that disqualify them in any degree for the performance of manual labor or the discharge of their accustomed duties. The fact that this class is a very large one will be better appreciated when it is considered that, according to the estimates of this office, the average age of all survivors of the war on June 30, 1895, was only 57 years, and, consequently (because of the preponderance of enlistments at the lower ages), at least half of them, or more than half a million in all, must have been younger than that, and many of them must have been considerably younger. In addition, there must be considered those of all ages who have never applied for pension because of their prosperous circumstances, or for sentimental reasons, or because they are aware that they are suffering from disabilities that are not pensionable under any law. Of course there is no means of determining the total number of persons who are comprised in these four classes, but it needs but little reflection to convince anyone that the number must be a large one, and it would seem that it must equal, if it does not exceed, the 210,626, which must be added to the 944,184 considered to be accounted for by the records of the Pension Bureau on June 30, 1895, in order to make 1,154,810, which is the total number of survivors (deserters excluded) that is shown by the original estimate of this office for that date. This is in the proportion of 817.61 applicants for pension and 182.39 nonapplicants per thousand of all pensionable survivors.

It does not seem unfair to assume that in every thousand honorably discharged survivors of the late war there were on June 30, 1895, 182 who, for various reasons, had never made application for pension, and that the estimate of this office as to the total number of survivors on that date is very nearly correct. And if the estimate is correct for the date in question it can be demonstrated to be equally correct for other dates covered by it.

But, as stated above, this question is one in the solution of which each inquirer can well exercise his own judgment. Those who believe that more than eight hundred and eighteen in every thousand of the honorably discharged survivors of the war had, on June 30, 1895, made application for pension must consider the estimate as to the total number of survivors on that date to be too large, whereas those who believe that less than eight hundred and eighteen per thousand had applied for pension on that date must consider the estimate too small.

A special enumeration of survivors was made during the census of 1890, and in a published statement of the Commissioner of Labor, in charge of the Eleventh Census (S. Doc. No. 135, 54th Cong., 1st sess.), the total number of survivors, as shown by the population schedules, is given as 1,034,073. But the census enumeration could not possibly have included all the survivors, because many of them were out of the country at the time, and many more must have failed to be enumerated as such for various reasons. It requires but a brief examination of the census figures to show that they fall far short of representing the total number of survivors in 1890, and that they can not be relied upon as the basis of any calculation for the future. If, as shown by the census report, there were 1,034,073 survivors of the Civil War in 1890, of the ages ascertained by the census enumerators, this number should have fallen, according to the life tables, to 919,954 on June 30, 1895. But this last number is only 80,917 in excess of the number of survivors who were either on the pension rolls or had claims pending at that date, excluding Regular Army and Navy pensioners and claimants who served since the war, and is 24,230 less than the number that, as previously pointed out in this paper, can be considered to have been accounted for by the records of the Pension Office on that date, to say nothing of the very large number of those who had never applied for pension, and of whom, consequently, the Pension Office could have had no record. It is confidently believed, therefore, that the figures shown by the estimate made by this office are much more reliable than those shown by the census of 1890 as the basis of any calculation for the future.

The foregoing estimate of 1890, with the comments made thereon in 1896, is republished, there being no reason to believe that there are any data now available on which to base a more accurate estimate than the one heretofore made.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE MILITARY SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
May 15, 1905.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in having that letter read at this time is to convince the House that many of the statements that have been made on this floor since Monday respecting the question of the volunteers have been misleading in many particulars. But those who have spoken of the volunteer system on this floor have told you of the great number of men that came to the colors under that system. I again repeat, I have no quarrel with the men who volunteered. It is with those who did not volunteer that I quarrel. [Applause.]

We had over 2,200,000 men on the northern side in that great war. Under what system were they brought to the colors of the Union? Have you ever heard of the bounties that were paid to secure that number of men? Let me give you the figures in round numbers:

Maine paid	$7,837,000
New Hampshire	9,600,000
Vermont	4,500,000
Massachusetts	22,900,000
Rhode Island	820,000
Connecticut	6,800,000
New York	89,600,000
New Jersey	23,868,000
Pennsylvania	43,000,000
Delaware	1,000,000
Maryland	6,000,000
The District of Columbia	134,000
West Virginia	864,000
Kentucky	692,000
Ohio	23,500,000
Indiana	9,000,000
Illinois	17,000,000
Michigan	9,600,000
Wisconsin	5,800,000
Iowa	1,600,000
Minnesota	2,000,000
Missouri	1,200,000
Kansas	57,000

Or a total of approximately $289,900,000 paid by the States to induce men to volunteer. [Applause.] These figures are taken from the report of the Provost Marshal General of the United States.

Why, the States even bid against each other! Some paid $100 as a bounty and others paid as high as $1,100. The States not only bid against each other, but all of them bid against the Federal Government.

That is part of the history of the volunteer system of the Civil War, which has been lauded so highly on this floor.

But what did the Federal Government pay in bounties? The bounty system, by the by, was not a new one in the Civil War. In the Revolutionary War the Continental Congress, as well as the States, paid bounties of clothes—a suit of clothes a year—and land and money to induce men to volunteer. Under that system the Federal Government in the Civil War paid $363,662,200 to induce men to volunteer. I shall not go into the details at this time, although I shall publish the full statement in the RECORD. It is as follows:

An estimate of amount paid on account of bounties.

151,363	one-year men, at $100	15,136,300
30,950	two-year men, at $100	3,095,000
8,340	two-year men, at $200	1,668,000
5,110	two-year men, at $200	1,022,000
657,868	three-year men, at $100	65,786,800
421,465	three-year men, at $100	42,146,500
158,507	veterans, at $400	63,402,800
150,000	veterans, at $300	45,000,000
102,735	recruits, at $100	10,273,500
165,365	substitutes, at
576,607	total of last four items.
153,049	three-year men, at $300	45,914,700
54,967	two-year men, at $200	16,490,100
75,156	one-year men, at $100	7,515,600
1,042	four-year men, at $300	312,600
24,768	regulars, at $100	2,476,800
	Additional bounty under act of July 28, 1866	68,560,000
	Fifteenth and Sixteenth Missouri Cavalry	147,000
	First Army Corps—special bounty of $300 to 7,567 men	2,270,100
	Paid under special acts of Congress to Iowa Gray Beards and others	200,000
		413,662,200
	Deductions on all accounts	50,000,000
	Estimated amount paid	363,662,200

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE.

I received this memorandum from Mr. Rathbone, chief bookkeeper, Second Auditor's Office, about two years ago, February 27, 1896.

JOHN C. HESSEE.

That sum of $363,662,200, added to what the States paid, makes the marvelous sum of over $650,000,000 paid to induce men to volunteer—a sum which in the aggregate is equivalent to one-fourth of the entire cost of the Civil War. That sum was paid to induce men to volunteer. And yet we hear this volunteer system lauded so constantly on this floor! [Applause.]

But what happened further? I have here the tables of troops that fought the great battles of that war. These figures can not but convince any man who has an open mind. In the Battle of Shiloh, fought on April 6, 1862, there were 76 regiments of Infantry, 28 companies of regular Cavalry, 15 batteries of Artillery, with a total authorized legal strength of 82,792 men. There were present at the battle just about 44,000 men, an aggregate shortage of 38,792 men.

What do those figures disclose? That there were dozens of regiments in that battle that had only a small percentage of their full complement of men on account of failure to volunteer. They could not get them under the volunteer system.

No sooner do troops go into the field than so-called wastage begins. Men fall sick and die. Their places ought to be filled promptly, so that the regiment can continue with its full force, its full quota of men. Whenever the regiment falls short of that it is an added expense to the Nation. And I want to say that during the Civil War, while most of the regiments went in with three battalions, before the end of the war, under the volunteer system, there were as many as nine battalions in one regiment. The companies making up the battalions had shrunk to almost nothing. Under the volunteer system the deficiencies were not supplied.

New regiments were constantly organized, with a full quota of officers appointed by the governors of the States. Instead of getting volunteers to fill up the regiments already in existence, ambitious men who wanted shoulder straps went around the country begging men to volunteer, in order that they might be the officers of the newly organized regiment. That is the history of the volunteer system. And I can not repeat too often the assertion that I have no complaint of the volunteer-service soldier. He always did his duty, but it is the system of which I complain.

On September 16–17, 1862, was fought the battle of Antietam. There were 84 regiments of Infantry, 14 of Cavalry, 45 batteries of Artillery. The total legal authorized strength was 113,968 men. There were present 87,000 men; absent only 14,000 men. That is a very good showing for the volunteers in that one battle. I am always willing to give credit where credit is due.

But what happened at Chancellorsville? There were 253 regiments of Infantry, 26 of Cavalry, 68 batteries of Artillery. The total legal strength of this force under the laws of the Union was 290,773 men. The total aggregate present was 130,000 men, and the aggregate absent 161,773 men. There were more thousands lacking than were present at that battle under the volunteer system. If the policy of selective draft had been in vogue, the Republic could, as it would have had the right to do, have called upon every citizen of military age to come to its defense. The regiments would have been kept up to their legal strength. It is my honest opinion and my absolute belief if the selective draft system had been in force during the Civil War that war would have been ended two years earlier and the great number of lives that were lost, the great volume of treasure that was expended, would have been saved to the Republic. [Applause.]

Take the figures for the battle of Gettysburg. Again I want to call your especial attention to the large number of regiments that were present. You will notice that they began to increase in proportion as the war went on. The political generals and colonels were getting in their deadly work. Men were needed, and it was not a difficult matter in the hours of the country's stress to get a commission from the governor of the State and to drum up some volunteers for the purpose of going to the front.

At the battle of Gettysburg there were 227 regiments of Infantry, 35 of Cavalry, 68 batteries of Artillery, with an authorized legal strength of 286,427 men. There were present 101,000 men, and the aggregate lacking was 185,427 men. Under the conscriptive system that could not have happened, and undoubtedly the war would have been shortened if we had had selective draft.

I will insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the figures for Chickamauga, the Atlanta campaign, and the Appomatox campaign. They are:

Date.	Battle.	Number of Infantry regiments.	Number of Cavalry regiments.	Number of batteries.	Authorized legal strength.	Aggregate present.	Aggregate lacking.
Sept, 19–20, 1863	Chickamauga	124	18	28	151,940	57,000	94,940
May to September, 1863	Atlanta campaign	318	35	64	379,126	98,797	280,329
Mar. 1 to Apr. 9, 1865	Appomattox campaign	280	49	68	356,104	120,000	236,104

These figures do not include staff officers, either executive or administrative, or their subordinates, and the strength of the companies and regiments is as established in 1862-3. Engineer troops not counted and Heavy Artillery included with Infantry.

These figures are as enlightening on the volunteer system as are the figures which I previously read. Let us learn a lesson from these facts. [Applause.] Let us not start this war wrong. Let us start right in our military policy.

I am afraid that this is going to be a long war. I am afraid that it will last some years. Many sacrifices will have to be made. Let us start the war by telling every American citizen that in this hour of the country's peril the United States expects every American to do his duty [applause]; that it will not be for him to say whether he wants to do it or not [applause]; that the country will demand of him that he do it in payment for the blessings of liberty that he has enjoyed all these years under the folds of Old Glory. [Applause.]

The amount of misinformation that has been offered about the draft system in the Civil War is appalling. I am sorry to say that all too often the Members of the House do not take the trouble to read the history of their country on these great questions. During the period that bounties were being paid a peculiar system sprang up in this country. It was the business of bounty brokerage. There were bounty brokers, if you please, in the various States of the Union, and these men furnished the volunters required by the various States to make up their quotas.

And, then, alongside of the bounty broker came the bounty jumper. The bounty broker furnished men for any given State that gave him a commission to do so. The volunteers did not have to be residents of the particular State to which they were furnished. That was not at all necessary under that system. The bounty broker furnished his men. Presumably he received his commission from the men, and then he proceeded to furnish the next batch of volunteers. I have no doubt that many of the bounty jumpers were in collusion with the bounty brokers, and that as soon as they got their money they deserted and started out for a new bounty. I have here, in the Records of the War of the Rebellion, series 3, Volume V, at page 725, a recorded case where one man, who was then imprisoned in the Albany Penitentiary for 4 years—I think he ought to have been imprisoned for 40 years—admitted that he had been paid bounties 32 times, having enlisted as a volunteer each time. [Laughter.]

The Speaker of the House referred feelingly to the volunteers as the "flower of the country." In the first flush of the war, when they came willingly and splendidly to the colors of the Republic, there never came to the martial call of any country a better, a nobler, a more heroic class of men. [Applause.] But the system that helped get the men in later years was a false system, and instead of being one of the "flower" of the Republic, in my opinion, the individual to whom I have just referred was a "cauliflower" of the Republic. [Applause and laughter.]

Naturally the draft bill which was passed was objected to by the great mass of the people. It made exemptions of two classes, the man who paid $300 by way of commutation and the man who furnished a substitute. The law thus favored the rich. The poor man was discriminated against. He had to serve. He went to the front, while the wealthy man paid his commutation or furnished a substitute and stayed at home. I will give you some figures on this subject. They are taken from official records.

The first call under the draft law of 1863 was for something between 200,000 and 300,000 men. Those that were held to personal service were 9,781. Those who furnished substitutes,

26,002. Those who paid the commutation, 52,228, or a total of 88,171 men. That was the first draft, and yet Members of this House seek to compare that draft with the entirely equitable selective draft proposed under the system that demands obligatory universal service to the country. [Applause.]

There are many other figures on the draft law I could give you that would prove just as enlightening, but I refrain from encumbering this record with them. Small wonder that the people of the country did not approve of the draft. Small wonder that the law was criticized, and the men who were drafted into the service under it were stigmatized.

Under the proposed law there will be no stigma. Gentlemen who have spoken for the volunteer system have repeatedly asserted during this debate that it would be a stigma to conscript men into the service. Yes; if we passed a draft law similar to the laws that were passed during the Civil War, of course there would be a stigma. But under the selective draft system, where every man is treated alike, where every man of military age is compelled under the law to do his bit for the country, there can be no stigma or odium. [Applause.] Every man knows that his neighbor is going to be treated just as he is treated. If they had had during the Civil War an equitable draft, such as is proposed here, there never would have been any trouble under it, and especially if such a law had been passed at the very beginning of the Civil War there never would have been a moment's trouble or delay in filling all the regiments that were required to fight the war to a successful conclusion.

During the progress of that war that great man in the White House, the lamented Lincoln, wrote this letter to a mother up in New England. It is dated Executive Mansion, Washington, November 21, 1864, and is written to Mrs. Bixby, Boston, Mass.:

DEAR MADAM: I have been shown in the files of the War Department a statement of the adjutant general of Massachusetts that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously on the field of battle. I feel how weak and fruitless must be any word of mine which should attempt to beguile you from the grief of a loss so overwhelming. But I can not refrain from tendering you the consolation that may be found in the thanks of the Republic they died to save. I pray that our Heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and lost and the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom.

Yours, very sincerely and respectfully, A. LINCOLN.

Why, my colleagues, why should that mother in New England have been permitted to make such a sacrifice to the Republic while somebody living near her probably made no sacrifice at all? [Applause.] My friend the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] spoke to me a day or two ago and told me that in his district there was one family that sent nine sons to the war. Under the selective-draft system advocated by the administration that would not be possible; and it ought not to be possible in these days. [Applause.] Why should these nine men have been allowed to do the fighting for shirkers and cowards who refused to volunteer? [Applause.]

I am simply pointing out the evils of the volunteer system during the Civil War. Again I assert that I admire those soldiers who went to the fields of battle voluntarily. We owe them everything that the Republic can bestow upon them. During my membership in this House I have voted repeatedly to show the debt of gratitude that I feel the country owes them by giving my assent to legislation in their behalf.

But in a Republic like ours every man should do his duty when the country calls. The age limit fixed in this bill is from 21 to 40 years. I am 56 at the present time. I would not object to having the age limit increased so that it would be from 21 to 65. [Applause.] That is the age that is prescribed in many of the countries of Europe. I am willing to do my share of the fighting, if need be, in defense of my country's rights. [Applause.] We are in a war, a great war, and there will have to be many sacrifices. No sacrifice that we can make will be too great for this country which has given every one of us such an opportunity in life as we probably never could have had in any other country on the face of the globe. [Applause.]

Now let us consider the Spanish-American War. That was a short war and we had no trouble in that struggle. The President called for 200,000 men—125,000 at the first call and 75,000 at the second. The records of the War Department disclose the fact that we never secured the full quota of men under the calls. We did get 163,000 men. Oh, but you say, "there were thousands of men in regiments in my State who could have been called." Yes; that is so; but would that have been equitable, would that have been fair, would that have been just, under the quotas announced for each State, and should not every State in the Union have been willing to have furnished its prescribed quota? Why should some States have been allowed to fail to do their duty while other States have been permitted to do more than their duty? Was that fair, was that equitable, was that just in a Republic like ours, where every individual receives equal benefits? I imagine that those States that failed to furnish their quotas will realize that under the system provided in this bill their citizens will be able to serve the Republic better than they could have served it under the old volunteer system.

And now to correct another statement that has been made repeatedly on this floor. It has been said that the German Government will not allow its soldiers to go to over-sea service unless they volunteer for such service. I believe two or three gentlemen have made such assertions on this floor. They are misinformed. There is no law of that kind in Germany. The German system is peculiar. The standing army is made up of two classes of men—those who are in their second year of service and those who are in their first year of service—50 per cent of each class of soldiers. They are not full-fledged soldiers, but constitute the standing army of Germany in peace times.

The soldiers who have fully completed the training are in the reserves. No doubt the erroneous impression as to the German law arose from a misapprehension regarding the Boxer trouble in China. At that time all of the civilized nations who had ministers in Peking agreed to a joint expedition against the capital of China. The United States Government took on its share of the white man's burden on that occasion. Ten thousand Germans were needed for the expedition. There were millions of men in Germany who could have been ordered there if the German Government had so desired. But they allowed 10,000 of their reserves to carry the flag of their Empire to the rescue of the German minister at Peking. That is all there is to that story.

In war times the soldiers of Germany are under the Kaiser. During peace some of them are under the local kings, such as the King of Wurtemburg, the King of Saxony, the King of Bavaria. But in war time the Kaiser becomes the commander in chief of the German Armies, and in that capacity he has the right to send German soldiers anywhere on the face of God's footstool. So there is absolutely nothing in the statement that the Germans can not be sent overseas under existing law. I have procured this information from the records of the Army War College.

Reference has frequently been made to the great number of volunteers that were secured in England during the present war before conscription was put into effect. Let me read to you what the facts really are. They have all taken place within two or three years, and yet we seem to have forgotten them. I shall ask the Clerk to read, as a part of my remarks, the following, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, April 25, 1917.

[Memorandum for Maj. Nolan, General Staff.]

1. In connection with the question now pending before Congress relative to conscription for the new forces, it may be of interest to know that some very recent reports received at the War College contain some interesting information as to the successive steps taken by England to develop her full man power. Briefly, the following are the successive steps through which Great Britain passed in order to meet the demands of the war:

First. In the beginning England depended purely on volunteering. Men volunteered in abundance, but as there was no proper machinery for receiving, equipping, and training, a great deal of confusion resulted. It became necessary to check the stream of volunteers by raising the physical standard. This had an injurious effect in repressing enthusiasm so that when, later, better machinery had been prepared and more men were required, they did not volunteer so freely. At this period there set in that elaborate recruiting campaign which reached proportions of unheard of extent, and means and methods which may be fairly stated to have exceeded the bounds of dignity. This first phase of volunteering extended until July 15, 1915, when the national-registration act was passed.

Second. By the terms of this act, all males and females between the ages of 15 and 65, had to declare their occupation and also their capacity for any other business useful to the war. This resulted in a fairly complete inventory of the man power available. A great recruiting campaign was then undertaken under Lord Derby, as a result of which all eligibles were arranged in groups aaccording to their ages and whether married or unmarried. On December 11, 1915, after two months of the new system, recruiting for the groups was formally closed. In this time 2,250,000 men attested and were available for calling up at any time. Although an improvement on the volunteer system, it was not yet perfect in that it did not deal with the shirkers, and did not enable the Government to fully control its man power to the best advantage

Third. The third phase was inaugurated by the adoption of the compulsory-service law on May 25, 1916, or one and one-half years after the outbreak of the war. Under this compulsory-service act a new classification of men was made, based on physical qualifications, and men were classified according to their fitness for service at the front, in rear of the army, or at home. The main classes were further subdivided so as to still further show the special characteristics and qualifications of each man. A statement has just been made in Parliament that hereafter there will be but two classes of men—those fit for military service and those unfit for military service. In the foregoing it will appear that England was forced finally to adopt compulsory military service—in other words, conscription—as the only solution for developing her full man power—this after the failure of the volunteer system and a partial compromise.

2. In this connection it may also be pointed out that a very recent report received at the War College shows that New Zealand has also been compelled to have recourse to a system of registration and compulsion in order to maintain her force of fighting men dispatched to Europe. While the volunteer system still obtains compulsion applied to registration lists is resorted to to obtain quotas from territorial districts where volunteering fails to produce the specified number of men.

JOSEPH E. KUHN,
Brigadier General, General Staff, Chief of War College Division.

Mr. KAHN. So that, according to the latest reports received at the War College, New Zealand, whose system of volunteering has been extolled repeatedly upon this floor, has come to obligatory compulsory service to furnish the necessary troops in this war. It is needless to point out the many methods that were employed to secure the large number of volunteers in England. The report of the minority sets out the facts clearly. But the statement has been made on this floor by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], I believe, that not a single conscripted soldier is yet at the battle front in France or Belgium. That statement is erroneous. There are thousands, hundreds of thousands—yes, a million of the conscripted soldiers of England who are now fighting the battles of that country in the trenches in France and Belgium.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a slight correction? That statement was made by the Speaker of the House.

Mr. KAHN. It was made by the Speaker, but I think it was originally made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield at this time. I not only obtained the facts from our own War College, but undertook to verify them from sources that were indisputable. So that, as a matter of fact, there are now in France and Belgium a million soldiers of England who were conscripted under the English law.

What about Canada? Frequent reference has been made on this floor to the wonderful things that were done in Canada under the volunteer system. Let me read to you what has been done in Canada:

Throughout central Canada the time taken to raise local battalions has been found to be between four and seven months, and this is probably true of the whole of Canada. As against a compulsory system, which would raise a regiment in two weeks, there is, therefore, loss in time of at least five months in bringing each battalion up to the stage of mobilization, at which point the real training only begins. Moreover, since the authorized full complement of officers and noncommissioned officers is on pay practically from the beginning, and since the heaviest enlistment occurs in the first two months, it is a conservative estimate that the loss in money—that is, the avoidable expenditure incurred—can not be less than the pay and upkeep of the full battalion for a period of from three to four months. As this equals $75,000 per month, it is evident that with the exception of the first hundred thousand men who came forward eagerly every thousand men raised by the voluntary method has cost the Canadian taxpayer $250,000 of unnecessary expense. In other words, the 260,000 men thus raised have—as contrasted with any sane system of levying troops—cost the Canadian taxpayer $65,000,000, for which his only return has been the privilege of being five months late in turning out each battalion as a full unit ready to commence its training.

In addition to this, there is the not inconsiderable expense of so-called whirlwind recruiting campaigns being conducted spasmodically in every part of the Dominion of Canada. Speakers, bands, and escorts must be transported; press bills and bunting must be used in abundance; clerical work, halls, motor cars, liveries, speakers' hotel expenses—returned soldiers are frequently on salary—must all be provided for, and the people pay. In fact, it is a safe estimate that the man power and the money now used in the undignified attempt to raise men would, if properly controlled, raise, equip, and maintain another division on the firing line.

That is the experience of Canada in getting its volunteers. Do we want that system repeated here? Do we want to plunge this country again into a saturnalia of debt because of the inefficiency of a system that takes months to bring in the recruits, whereas under the selective draft system they can be secured when needed? That is the overwhelming argument in favor of the selective draft. And the fact that the general at the front marshaling his forces, knowing that at a certain day he is going to make an attack, knows exactly how many men his country can supply at the given time. He never can know that under the volunteer system.

Some days volunteering is good; some days it is bad. There is an uncertainty about it that always leaves the generals in command of the armies at the front in doubt as to whether they can secure the force that will be required to give battle to the enemy on any given day. Take the newspapers of this country at the present time. Within the last 10 days they have told you that on such a day volunteering was good, and the day following that there has been a slump; that volunteering has fallen off. England had a similar experience. Whenever a German Zeppelin came over and raided some seacoast city the volunteering from that particular section of England immediately went up. But it did not affect any of the other sections, and when the excitement of the raid died down volunteering took the usual slump. Do we want a system of that kind in this country? We have to have men in this war—yes, probably millions of them, and the only way to get them is under a system of universal obligation to service for this country.

Much is heard of the Australian troops—splendid fighting men. They volunteered, but every one of them had previously gone through a system of compulsory military training. That has been the system in vogue in Australia for some years. There men are prepared to fight. They have had the proper military training. They can fight when they go into the service. They have the fighting spirit; they volunteer. But there is no other country engaged in this war where conditions are similar. Oh, I have heard some men on this floor speak almost in derision of the conscripts of Prussia. Great God! those conscripts are at the present time holding a dozen nations at bay. I shall be glad indeed if the soldiers of this Republic will be able to overcome those troops. [Applause.] We have a hard fight ahead of us, and we must win this war. [Applause.] No matter how many men will be required, no matter what sacrifices will have to be made, the Republic must win this war, and the only way to win it is to have the men without fail when they are needed at the front. [Applause.]

I was rather amused the other day, and probably became a little overexcited about it, when the gentleman from Kansas asked what battles the experts of the War Department had participated in. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] has put into the RECORD the engagements in which the officers of the General Staff have participated. But let me ask the gentleman from Kansas, or any other Member on this floor, in what battles did the generals of the great German staff participate before this war? For 43 years Germany had been at peace. She had had no wars, and the generals of Germany, the military experts of that Empire, had had no service in war. And yet the gentleman from Kansas wants to know what the military experts of this Nation have done in the way of participation in military engagements. I am afraid that I am detaining you too long; but just one word—— [Cries of "Go on!"] Just one word about the pending legislation. Much has been said about the attitude of the War Department in regard to the enforcement of the law, and some fear has been expressed that probably the military officers would be charged with the duty of putting the law into execution. I put the question to the Secretary of War and received this reply:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 26, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. KAHN: Responding to your question as to how the War Department proposes to operate the registration of available men in the event of the passage of the pending measure, I beg leave to say that, without presuming to anticipate the action of Congress, I have yet felt quite certain that some law would be passed requiring the registration of available men of military age, and have therefore, in part at least, perfected the plans under which that registration will be made. It is the intention of this department to deal primarily with the governors of the several States as the chief civilian authority therein, and through the cooperation of the governor to institute in each county or city a board composed entirely of civilians, who, using the ordinary electoral registration machinery of the State, will upon a day proclaimed by the President as registration day receive and register all men presenting themselves pursuant to the President's proclamation. This board, being a local body, will conduct its labors until all unregistered persons have been registered, and in the meantime the registration returns will be sent to Washington for tabulation, the quotas of the several States and subordinate units determined, and regulations and machinery arranged for testing out exemptions, using in all cases local agencies, in cooperation with those of the department, so that we can have the advantage of neighborhood judgment and information in dealing with the many questions which will arise in the application of the act.

In my hearing before the committee some question was asked as to whether such a provision would be put into execution solely through military channels. I was unable to give a very definite answer at that time and am now unable to be definite as to details, because the local agencies vary widely in the several parts of the country. But from what I have said about it, it will be clear that it is the purpose of the department to have this registration a fine instance of cooperation between the civilian authorities of the States and the General Government, rather than an exclusive military matter carried out from Washington as the center of the military establishment.

Respectfully, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
House of Representatives.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I wish to read this quotation from that remarkable book which every American boy ought to be compelled to read as soon as he has proper understanding, The Man Without a Country, by Edward Everett Hale:

Remember, boy, that behind all these men you have to do with, behind officers and Government and people even, there is the country herself, your country, and that you belong to her as you belong to your own mother.

[Applause.]

That ought to be written deep on the memory of every young American. Oh, I often think that the old stamina of the fathers of the Republic has gone from us in these days of material growth. Then we were ready to fight in defense of the sacred rights of Americans. There was no question about the attitude of the people of the country toward that question. One thing more. In Europe to-day——

Mr. GORDON. Could I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. KAHN. I will finish in a moment, and then I will be glad to yield. In Europe to-day the armies are all conscript armies except the remaining volunteers from England. What were the Belgians who fought so gallantly at Liege, at Namur, at Antwerp? Under the law of Belgium they were conscripts, and the whole world stood amazed and applauded their valor when they defended their hearths and their homes against the German invaders. [Applause.] They were men who had been called by draft or conscription, whichever term you prefer, to the armies of that little country.

But what of France? France is a Republic even as we are a Republic, and every man in France who helped to drive back the Germans at the Battle of the Marne was a conscripted man. He was not a volunteer. [Applause.] Those Frenchmen, and the Frenchmen who have been sent to the colors since, are all men who under the laws of France are obligated to do service for their country in the hour of the country's stress and trouble.

If France had waited to enlist volunteers, I am afraid there would not be any France to-day. They were all conscripted men. They were all men of whom the country demanded service. They were not asked, "Do you want to come to the colors of the Republic; we would like to have you do it? Do you want to come and fight under the tricolor; we would like to have you do it?" They were all told by the country, by the Government itself, "It is your duty to come to the colors of the Republic and we call upon you, every mother's son of you, to do your duty in this hour of the country's need." [Applause.] The Italian soldiers are all men who have been similarly called to the colors.

Mr. LITTLE. May I ask the gentleman a question? I understand he referred to me a few moments ago while I was out.

Mr. KAHN. One moment; I will be ready in a moment. I have often thought that in this the hour of our country's trouble we all ought to bear constantly in mind the immortal declaration of that martyr to the American cause, Nathan Hale, who on the threshold of death said: "I regret that I have but one life to lose for my country." [Applause.]

That is the epitome of patriotism. Every man must die. What more glorious death can he die than fighting in the cause of his country and especially in the cause of a country like ours? [Applause.] Oh, my friends, this is not a matter for to-day. We ought in this hour to prepare a military policy that will last for time. We ought to write upon the statute books of the Republic a law for a selective draft system so that future generations, when they come upon the scene to take our places, will know as they grow to man's estate that it is the duty of every American citizen to lay down his life, if need be, upon the altar of his country. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HASTINGS). The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to say at the outset of my remarks that I appreciate the personal reference that the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] made of me and the majority of the Military Committee, which submitted the report upon this bill. The gentleman from California has the esteem and the respect of every member of the Military Committee of the House. [Applause.] Personally, I go further and state that he has been my friend and adviser, and to me, as chairman at the last session of the last Congress, he rendered invaluable service in drafting the appropriation bill that was put through this House.

I wish to say still further that the Military Committee of the House, I believe, is one of the most harmonious committees that there is in the House. There is less partisanship in that committee, there is less personal friction in that committee, in my humble judgment, than in any other committee of the House of Representatives. [Applause.] So that when we come in, which is on a very rare occasion, with two views, one expressed by the majority and the other by the minority, it is simply because there is an honest and a conscientious difference of opinion, not based upon partisan lines. [Applause.] I think that we should stop and consider really what is the issue between the majority and the minority, and I hope in a brief period of time, without any interruption, to state my conception of what is the real difference in the two views of the membership of this committee.

Now, let it not be forgotten that under the present law the President of the United States can fill up the Army first by using the volunteer system and then by using the draft to about 925,000 men. He can by using the provisions of the bill, as agreed to both by the majority and the minority, increase that by something like 148,000 men necessary as training units. Let it also not be forgotten that the War Department asks this committee for an appropriation to pay for 1,072,000 men. Add together the increase that I have given you—the 925,000 and the 148,000 necessary as training units, and you have the number that the War Department is asking you to appropriate for.

There has been too much misconception, Mr. Chairman, of the actual situation. What is the use of this country getting itself all wrought up over a question as to the method of getting 500,000 additional men? And that is exactly, putting it pointedly, putting it plainly, about the controversy that we have come to. It is a difference, finally, except on a question of principle of the volunteer or draft system, between tweedledum and tweedledee. The additional 500,000 men asked for by the War Department are not asked to be appropriated for in this bill if the War Department will build up the Army to war strength under the two branches now in existence.

I wish to say in this connection one other thing: While this bill was pending before the Military Committee of the House, and while we were endeavoring to the best of our ability to work out a compromise between the conflicting views that existed among the membership of this House, I was approached, and other members of the committee were approached, with the proposition that, "If you come upon the floor of this House with a conscript plan, without recognizing the volunteer system that has been traditional in this country, we will beat you on the floor of the House." That proposition was presented to me, was presented to my friends on the minority side that agree with me upon the plan that we finally worked out. I went to the President and I went to the Secretary of War, and I told both of them that it seemed to me to be the sentiment of this House that the traditional policy of this country in recognizing the volunteer system should be incorporated in this bill, and that I was willing to go as far as anybody in order to get unity of action and in order to get a bill under which the President could carry on the declaration of war that Congress had made.

And yet, what is the situation now? What is the situation that the committee has been placed in? What is the situation that I have been placed in when members of the committee have been told, since this report was made, when a majority of the committee had agreed with my views and had agreed with what we had every right to believe was the honest, conscientious sentiment of this House, "I can not vote with you"?

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I believe in the volunteer system. I believe in the traditional policy of this country. I believe in the traditional history of the Anglo-Saxon race when recognizing the fact that the Government is finally in all great wars to be defended by volunteers. I honestly believe in those policies, and I had some right to think the majority of the House believed in them. I know the majority of the committee thought so and thought so all along. I am asked in the eleventh hour to surrender my convictions and to surrender the convictions of the majority of the committee to support a bill that we do not believe in. [Applause.]

I said at the outset of my remarks when I undertook to explain this bill that if the argument that has been made on the floor of this House is the true principle upon which we shall act—that is, that in time of war the executive department shall draft its legislation and send it to Congress, and Congress shall not exercise the right to cross a "t" nor dot an "i"—then I for one am willing to surrender my commission in Congress. [Applause.]

And in that connection let me call your attention to this fact: Who is it that stands upon this floor to-day and favors the bill just as it was drafted by the War Department? Certainly no member of the Military Committee of the House has brought in any report to this House stating that that bill ought to be adopted just as it was written and just as it was presented to the Military Committee. Not a single, solitary soul has stated during all of this debate that he was willing to offer the bill prepared by the War Department as a substitute for the bill either presented by the majority or the minority of the Military Committee of this House. And yet the argument is made here that you are not standing behind the President when you support the proposition that the majority of this committee has brought to this House.

If you are standing behind the President, then some Member ought to offer as a substitute to the bill I have introduced the bill that was prepared by the War Department and presented to the Military Committee. In that bill it was provided that your soldiers should be drafted from the ages of 19 to 25. The committee unanimously repudiated that proposition. The committee unanimously decided that you should not have the right to draft a boy 19 or 20 years of age. [Applause.] The committee unanimously decided that you should also reserve the right to call to the service of the United States men between 25 and 40, whereas the War Department said that they were absolutely exempt. Is anybody willing to stand on the floor of this House now and say that the committee was wrong in offering that proposition, and that we ought to have drafted boys 19 and 20 years of age? I would like to see the man who is willing to support that proposition stand up on the floor of this House to-day. [Applause.] Yet if the argument is sound that we must stand by the President and accept everything that was written and given to the committee, then you are not standing by the President.

There was another provision in this bill that was sent down by the War Department to the committee, to the effect that all enlistments in the Army hereafter, or since the war, shall be in the Army of the United States. I asked the Secretary of War what that meant, because I saw as soon as I read it that that was the "nigger in the woodpile," and before the committee he stated that it meant the complete destruction of the present Regular Army Establishment and the National Guard during this emergency and the creation of a new Army of the United States, one solid Army, with the right on the part of the President not to permit the boys that were born and raised in the same community to go into the service with those with whom they were raised, but that it gave the right to scatter them throughout the United States with such organizations as the department thought necessary. The bill as originally proposed would have destroyed the State or local organizations of troops.

The committee repudiated that idea. The committee unanimously, I may say, repudiated that idea, and brought in a bill recognizing Territorial units and State designations and the right of young men to serve with the men among whom they had been raised.

Now, if we shall accept everything that is written in the War Department in order to carry on this war, why should we not have accepted that? And who is bold enough to-day to stand on the floor of this House and say that the committee was wrong and the War Department was right? I challenge any man to stand up now and so say. [Applause.]

Then, Mr. Chairman, whatever may happen, unless this Congress follows the argument that everything that is written in the War Department shall be accepted without question; unless this Congress follows that idea, you will be face to face with this proposition: Even though you may strike out the volunteer feature of this bill, you will be face to face with the proposition that over in the Senate the War Department bill has been practically accepted, and from the best information I can get it will likely be passed as the majority of the committee reported it. Shall we surrender our views as to the age limit in the bill reported by the majority and the destruction of State organizations? [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And also civilian tribunals to decide this whole matter.

Mr. DENT. Yes. I am glad my colleague on the committee, Gov. SHALLENBERGER, of Nebraska, called my attention to that. The bill as presented to the committee provided for tribunals that were not of a military character to pass on questions of eligibility and questions of exemptions and as to the so-called selective draft.

The committee opposed that proposition and amended the suggestion of the War Department with a provision to the effect that that tribunal should consist of three members, a majority of whom should be civilians and not military men. [Applause.]

Now, if we had not considered this bill at all, Mr. Chairman, and had accepted the argument that has been made here that we ought to do in time of war just exactly what the Commander in Chief tells us to do, see where you would have been and what sort of legislation you would be putting through.

I am going to close in a few minutes. However, before I close I want to say a few words of the volunteer system, which is the ancient doctrine of our people. It has been stated—and stated with a great deal of sophistry—that the Committee on Military Affairs of the House acted inconsistently with the duty it owes to itself and to its position when it provided for raising additional forces first by the volunteer system and then offered a resort to the draft. The answer to that propostion is so simple and so plain that it seems to me that it is hardly necessary to make it. The committee realized that the country was in a state of war which might last for some time. The committee realized that there were criticisms of the volunteer system. The committee realized that there were statements made by men of high military authority to the effect that the volunteer system was a failure. The committee realized that it was probable that this extra session of Congress, called for the purpose of declaring war and for the purpose of passing such legislation as would be necessary in order to effectuate that declaration, might adjourn before the war was over, and the committee, therefore, thought that Congress ought to give to the President the right, in the event he could not get a sufficient force by the volunteer system, to get it by the draft. That has been the policy of the Government of the United States from the infancy of this Republic. We wanted to put all the authority in one bill, so that when we left here, when Congress adjourned, there would not be any limitations upon the power of the President. But we decided that the ancient and traditional principle of voluntary enlistments in the Army of the United States should be preserved and should be recognized. [Applause.]

Now let us come right down to what is the real issue between the majority that made this report and the minority, the issue between those who are in favor of recognizing the volunteer system, which, as I repeat, has always been the policy of our people, and those who are opposed to doing it now. Let us see what is the real issue between us. I have heard a great many arguments here during this debate to the effect that there ought to be universal compulsory service. That is not involved here. That has nothing in the world to do with this particular bill, because this bill does not even attempt to compel universal service even in this particular emergency. The bill that was presented only proposes that young men between 19 and 25 shall serve, and that certainly is not universal, so that there is nothing of that kind involved in this particular bill.

The real question, as has been stated by two or three gentlemen on the other side of the proposition—one of them, I believe, my good friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who, by the way, made one of the strongest arguments in favor of the selective system that I have heard—is that it should be a question not of the individual deciding whether he will serve his Government and his country, but that the Government must decide which individual will serve. Now, that is the real question; that is the potential reason why I am standing here to-day opposing the plan of the War Department and the President, if you please. [Applause.] That is the issue, and you are going to face it. In six months every man who casts his vote upon this proposition must meet it with his constituents. The real issue is whether we shall repudiate the policy of this country, as adopted from its infancy, of fighting its wars through a voluntary system, or whether the Government shall say who shall be its fighters. In other words, if this new policy is adopted—and, mind you, while it is only temporary now—it will be a repudiation of everything that we have ever done in the past. If it is good as a temporary measure it is bound to be good as a permanent measure. If you decide that it is good temporarily you are obliged to come to the conclusion that it is good as a permanent policy. [Applause.]

Then the question which you are going to decide by your vote is this, that if the Government shall have the right to say who shall be a soldier, and the individual shall not have that right, your boy and my boy, when they grow up in this land, will not have the right to choose their careers or their professions? The selective plan of getting an army absolutely destroys the right to every American boy in this land to choose his career in life. [Applause.] If this plan is the correct plan, I repeat, it ought not to be merely temporary, but it ought to be the permanent plan; and if so, then what happens? Why, the boy who makes up his mind that he wants to be a civilian, and that he does not want to go into army life, will have hanging over him as long as he is within the military age the sword of Damocles, because he may be the particular one who is drawn out of the jury box in order to do military service. Whereas, another young man living in the same community and perhaps his next-door neighbor, who wants to be a soldier, will never be drawn out of the box.

Now that is your system. That is what you are voting for to-day when you adopt the selective-draft system, and that is the reason why I am standing here to-day and begging and pleading that you will stop and think what you are doing without letting somebody down in the executive branch of this Government tell you what you ought to do. [Applause.]

Then, in conclusion—because I did not intend to talk this long—permit me to say that the argument that has been made here that you must stand by the Commander in Chief has been broken down, because nobody, not a living soul, has yet been willing to say that he would stand sponsor for the bill as drafted in the War Department.

Let me say, furthermore, that when you come to cast your vote upon this proposition remember that you are adopting a new plan, you are inaugurating a new policy. You are placing this country upon the conscript system, and you are destroying the patriotism and the loyalty of the American people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled——

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNER. The first section of this bill consists of six different substantive propositions. I would like to know how the Chair regards it. In other words, ought amendments to be offered to each paragraph, or should they be reserved until the end of the section? What will be the holding of the Chair upon that proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. As a general rule, a bill of this character is considered by sections. While there are paragraphs, nevertheless they are portions of the section.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Chair pardon me for one suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Later on this is an appropriation bill and carries three thousand million dollars in round numbers. Therefore I suggest that it ought to be read and considered by paragraphs.

Mr. TOWNER. I think it will be agreeable to most, if not all, of the Members of the House if it be considered by paragraphs regardless of the precedents. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] perhaps is right in his construction. Certainly, if the Chairman shall announce that amendments may be offered to each paragraph, I think there will be no objection on the part of the committee. I simply wish to know what is the ruling of the Chairman.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, to obviate any misunderstanding I ask unanimous consent that the first section of the bill be read and considered by paragraphs.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. As a simple solution of the question, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] asks unanimous consent that the first section of the bill be considered by paragraphs.

Mr. DENT. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, a further parliamentary inquiry. I desire to call the attention of the chairman to the introductory sentence. It reads—

That, in view of the existing emergency which demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized—

It will be observed that that is in the nature of a preamble. If the word "whereas" were used instead of the word "that," there would be no question whatever as to its being a preamble. I do not know how the Chair will regard it. If it is to be regarded as a preamble, amendments to that particular part of the first section should not be considered until after the bill has been completed, under the rule.

Mr. MANN. But if the gentleman will notice, it is a substantive part of the bill. It does not say "whereas."

Mr. TOWNER. I am not arguing the question at all. It does not make any difference to me how the Chair holds, only we ought to know whether it is proper to offer an amendment, as I shall do, to this part of the bill, as soon as it is read, or whether it should be considered as a preamble and amended later.

Mr. MANN. It is plainly not a preamble. It says—

The President be, and he is hereby, authorized—

It is of the very substance of the bill.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman, of course, is correct so far as that language is concerned, but the gentleman will observe also that it says—

In view of the existing emergency which demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A preamble always precedes the enacting clause.

Mr. TOWNER. That is true. It does not make any difference to me how the Chair holds, only I would like to know whether it is to be considered as a preamble.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of the gentleman from Iowa relates to the language—

That, in view of the existing emergency which demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available—

The Chair suggests that those words are equivalent to—

Whereas, the existing emergency demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available.

The Chair must say that it seems to the Chair that the common sense of it is that that is practically equivalent to a preamble.

Mr. MANN. It is not a preamble whatever it may be equivalent to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A preamble always precedes the enacting clause. This is a legislative declaration and can not be considered a preamble, although the effect of the words may be similar to some other words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands perfectly well that a preamble precedes the enacting clause. The Chair restates what he said, that the common sense of it is that this is equivalent to a preamble. Yet technically the Chair is not going to rule that way. It is a distinction without a difference. The common sense of it is that it is equivalent to a preamble, but the Chair is going to follow the precedents. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in view of the existing emergency which demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available the President be, and he is hereby, authorized—

First. Immediately to raise, organize, officer, and equip all or such number of increments of the Regular Army provided by the national defense act approved June 3, 1916, or such parts thereof, as he may deem necessary; to raise all organizations of the Regular Army, including those added by such increments, to the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law. Vacancies in the Regular Army created or caused by the addition of increments as herein authorized which can not be filled by promotion may be filled by temporary appointment for the period of the emergency or until replaced by permanent appointments or by provisional appointments made under the provisions of section 23 of the national defense act, and hereafter provisional appointments under said section may be terminated whenever it is determined, in the manner prescribed by the President, that the officer has not the suitability and fitness requisite for permanent appointment.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. TOWNER: Page 1, line 3, strike out lines 3, 4, and 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That war having been declared to exist between the United States and Germany, which condition requires the raising of additional forces for the Military Establishment of the United States, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized "——

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, of course we all recognize that this is a war measure. I do not know when this bill was prepared, but very likely it was prepared before the condition of war had been declared. But now a condition of war has been declared. The language used in this statement as the reason why this legislation is passed is entirely insufficient and not appropriate. We are not enacting this legislation because of an existing emergency; we are enacting this legislation because of existing war. We want to use all of the war powers. We have a right to use all of the war powers that are called for under the terms of this bill. Wherever the word "emergency" is used in this bill, in my judgment, the words "existing war" should be substituted therefor.

An emergency is not the condition that now exists. An emergency is a sudden or unexpected occurrence or combination of occurrences demanding prompt action and urgent necessity. It is of necessity a passing phase, but we now are in a condition that may last for years. It can not be said that such a condition is an emergency; it is a condition of existing war, and therefore it would not only be inappropriate because of the language used, but it would not be just in substance if we do not place our legislation on the fact that war is now existing between this country and Germany. It would be most unfortunate that we should base all the things we expect to do under this bill on the fact that an emergency exists. We want to bring in support of its enactment all the powers of the Government in reference to war, and we ought to declare that we do it because war now exists between this country and Germany. It seems to me there ought to be no objection to this amendment if gentlemen desire to bring to bear all the forces and powers that we ought to use at this time.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Has the gentleman provided for any other amendment—for the enlistment of troops for the existence of the war, for instance?

Mr. TOWNER. No; but I think that would be proper.

Mr. McCORMICK. I think it would be, if the gentleman's amendment is adopted.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the use of the word "emergency" further on in this paragraph, as used as the first word on line 6, page 2, in reference to vacancies in the Regular Army. It says:

Vacancies in the Regular Army created or caused by the addition of increments as herein authorized which can not be filled by promotion may be filled by temporary appointment for the period of the emergency or until replaced by permanent appointments.

That is not what is meant; it is meant that the power shall last during the continuance of the war and not for the emergency. An emergency may pass, but war does not cease until it is ended by the action of the nations themselves.

Mr. McCORMICK. It may be followed by a temporary peace after a period of war, and some time thereafter, because troops can not be disbanded immediately on the declaration of peace, and there should be some adequate provision for the appointment of officers until the armies are disbanded.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; but we use these powers because they are war powers, and the matter the gentleman calls to my attention can be properly attended to when reached.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Congress having in a constitutional manner declared that a state of war now exists, is there any mistake in anybody's mind as to what emergency is referred to by this legislation?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know certainly; but the gentleman can easily see that an emergency might be one thing and war another. For instance, in the national-defense act it says that "whenever a condition of war exists, or whenever an emergency similar to that of war shall exist"—a distinction clearly made in the law by enactment of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. DENT. The question that the gentleman raises was thoroughly discussed in the committee with the Secretary of War, and the reason this language was adopted was this: That there might be a treaty of peace and still a necessity for the forces provided for in this bill after the treaty of peace had been adopted.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me suggest that that does not change the condition at all. The powers that are to be given under this bill are being supported by the war powers of the country and the Nation. If we expect to bring to bear, if we expect to support, we should base that on the war powers and not on an emergency clause. There is nothing to limit the continuance of the war power while war lasts, and these conditions as they then exist may be considered.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman has doubtless given attention to section 111 of the national-defense act of June 3, 1916, which is significant so far as the authority for raising the National Guard and the Regular Army beyond the peace strength is concerned, and that section begins:

When Congress shall have authorized the use of the armed land forces of the United States for any purpose requiring the use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army, the President may—

And so forth.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman will see, if he reads section 2 of the national-defense act, that the powers that are given are in cases of actual or threatened war, and then it says "or similar emergency in which the public safety demands it." That is, in case war exists it should be based on the war power, and in the case of a similar emergency it should be placed on the emergency clause in the act.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman can conceive of an emergency growing out of or incidental to war, and the whole constituting one common emergency.

Mr. TOWNER. But this legislation I have referred to distinguishes between emergency and war, and should in my judgment be distinguished in this case.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the framers of our Federal Constitution, among other duties and responsibilities, placed two upon the Congress which have come home to us with particular force and effect at this special session.

One of these is the power to declare war and the other is the duty to raise and support armies. No more serious and important responsibilities can come to any representative body of men; and at no time during this session have I ever doubted for a moment that the weight of these obligations is fully appreciated by the membership of this House. Differences of opinion there have been, and differences of opinion there are now about some of the features of this bill, but disloyalty to the United States and our flag there has been none, and there is none now among this representative body of the American people.

Freedom of discussion there has been and freedom of discussion there ought to be and must be if this is to continue "a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

I said a while ago that the Constitution of the United States conferred upon Congress the exclusive power to declare war and to raise and support armies.

We have already exercised one of these powers during this session of Congress by declaring that a state of war exists between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

I voted for that resolution.

I did not do it because I have any of the jingo spirit within me nor because I have any love for war.

God knows I recognized the full responsibility of my vote.

My heart aches at the thought of the bloodshed, the hardships, and the sufferings of war; but what else could the Government of the United States do? Should we have tried diplomatic negotiations with Germany longer? No; we had tried that to the utmost end, and plotting and intrigue went steadily on against us in our own country while yet we tried. Should we have continued to protest? No. We tried that even to the sending of the German ambassador back to his own country and the addressing of a note of protest to all the neutral powers of the world; but did that stop the outrages which were being committed against American citizens and American ships on the high seas? It did not. American ship after ship continued to be torpedoed without warning and American life after life sacrificed to the mad war policy of the Prussian autocracy.

Then, what else could we do? Should we have laid supinely upon our backs and have submitted to one outrage after another until it would have amounted to a confession to the world that we had no rights which we would fight to maintain? No! By the God of our fathers we could not do that; and therefore there was nothing left to us but to accept the gage of battle which had been insultingly flaunted in our faces and fight—fight like "the man who faces what he must with step triumphant and a heart of cheer, who fights the daily battles without fear, sees some of his hopes fail, yet keeps unfaltering trust that God is God and that, somehow, true and just His plans work out for mortals."

HOW SHALL THE ARMY BE RAISED?

And now that we are in the war and must fight, it becomes the duty of Congress to raise and support an army.

How shall it be done?

I hate that the necessity has arisen which plainly indicates to me my duty to vote for the selective draft based on the principle of universal liability to service in time of war.

I abhor everything that approaches to militarism, even as I abhor war.

I would to God that the prophetic words of Isaiah might come to pass in our day and generation, when nations "shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." That this blessed and glorious day will dawn sometime to comfort distracted and struggling humanity I do not doubt; but it would be foolish for us to indulge in this Utopian hope in this present hour of the world's Pentecost of calamity.

The only enduring peace that we can hope to achieve now is that which will come in the hour of victory, when the United States and her allies shall have fought this war to a successful conclusion, a conclusion which shall not have in mind the crushing of the German people, but the firm establishment of the rights of democracy, "for the rights of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own government, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free." This is the peace that, God grant, may envelop the nations at the end of this bloody struggle.

How remote that may be no one can tell, but now that the hour has come when this Nation shall be tried in the furnace, as if by fire, I want us to be ready. I want our Nation to rise like a giant aroused from his slumbers and, shaking his invincible locks at the full noonday sun, grasp with a Titan's arm the flaming sword of freedom and fight on, like the Archangel Michael fought when he drove the dragon from heaven, until Prussian arrogance and autocracy are brought to their knees and American rights on land and sea are fully acknowledged and established. How shall we make ready?

Many able and patriotic gentlemen in this House favor a continuance of the volunteer system in raising the army which all admit that we are bound to have in the present crisis.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the volunteer system is representative of the traditional policy of the American people, and, as for that matter, of the English-speaking race.

I recognize the force of the arguments which have been put forward in its defense by many Members of this Congress during this long and able debate. It undoubtedly has many points which make a strong appeal to the man of patriotism and valor. But I can not overlook the fact that warfare is not what it used to be.

In this day of the rapid-fire machine gun and the 42-centimeter artillery and the Zeppelin and aircraft, of the asphyxiating gas, liquid fire, and the bomb, the individual soldier does not register his prowess as prominently as he did in former years. War is more of a science now.

Time was when Miltiades, with 10,000 valiant Greeks, could sweep down from the hills of Pentelicus upon the plain of Marathon and rout a Persian host of 120,000 men. Time was when Leonidas, with 300 Spartan soldiers and a small band of Thespian allies, could hold the Pass of Thermopylæ for three days against Xerxes and his invading thousands. Yes, if you please, the time was when the embattled farmers, with their flintlock muskets and squirrel rifles, could turn back the trained and uniformed regulars of Europe and put them to ignominious rout and defeat.

But war is different now. We find ourselves engaged against a power which has not merely thousands at the front, but millions, and they are equipped with every modern implement of warfare and destruction and trained to arms to an extent probably equal to any army which ever went upon the battle field.

Therefore we must not underestimate the strength of our adversary and must prepare to meet it.

The success or failure of the volunteer system in the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, or the Spanish-American War, is not a controlling factor in the present emergency.

Congress is confronted with the immediate duty of raising and equipping an army which may be sorely needed, even before it may yet be trained. There must be no uncertainty about raising the army, there must be no guesswork, and it must be systematically accomplished.

I believe that reason, equitable distribution of military burden, and present-day experience are all on the side of the selective draft, and therefore I shall vote for that plan, and in so doing believe that I am helping to conserve the best interests of this Republic, whose welfare we all love so well.

FAVOR THIS AS A WAR MEASURE.

But, Mr. Chairman, I for one want it distinctly understood that I am voting for this bill as a war measure and not to commit this country to a policy of compulsory military service in time of peace. Therefore I favor the amendment which strikes out the words "during the existing emergency" and substitutes therefor the words "during the existing war." I want there to be no doubt about its meaning. During the able speech of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], in his conclusion, he closed by stating that he thought we were now voting for a system that ought to be permanently fastened upon the country. I do not agree with him, and if I knew that the passing of this bill meant to fasten upon the United States a policy of compulsory service in time of peace, I would feel compelled to vote against it and rely on the volunteer system with its admitted imperfections.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. My time is nearly exhausted, and I therefore must decline to yield.

Mr. BURNETT. Is not that just what this means?

Mr. BLACK. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that I think not. I believe that our great democratic United States has power enough in the people to adopt this policy in time of war and throw it off in time of peace.

I will agree with gentlemen who have spoken in this debate that in many respects an autocracy in time of war is more efficient than a democracy, but we should be warned that the very things that bring about that autocracy and sustain it set in motion the dry-rot of decay that will, if continued, eventually destroy your democracy. [Applause.] Therefore, while it is true that during the course of this war we will be compelled to forego some of our individual rights and pass some laws which we would not think of passing in time of peace, we should move with great caution and prudence, and hold in proper regard the Constitution and form of government which have made our country the greatest Nation in the world. Therefore, out of an abundance of precaution I am going to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] to strike out the words "during the existing emergency," so that it will be amended to say "during this existing war." [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. Chairman, my time has expired, and under the general leave to extend remarks in the RECORD I would like to say just these few words more. Despite the fact that we are living in a world of awful carnage, despite the fact that fields which ought to be green with the fruit of the harvest are running red with rivers of blood, despite the fact that the gold of the world which ought to be building the schoolhouses, the colleges, the churches, reclaiming the waste places, and providing homes for the people is being used to purchase shot and shell to destroy the labor and toil of centuries, despite this dark and tragic picture, still yet—

I trust that good will be the final goal of ill;
That nothing walks with aimless feet;
That not one single life will be destroyed
Or cast as empty rubbish to the void
When God has made the plan complete.

Therefore may we not hope that when the war clouds shall finally roll away, "when the shouting and the tumult dies and the captains and the kings depart," and the statesmen of the world shall gather to prepare for peace, a way will be found to stop the mad race for armament among the nations of the world, and that a permanent court of arbitration will be established with fixed powers and jurisdiction, its decrees to be enforced not by one nation nor by a single group of nations but by all the world powers, working in harmony for the integrity and preservation of democracy and civilization. Then might the glorious vision of Dumas be realized when great armies will vie for supremacy in acts of true charity and benevolence, the war cry being "The Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. We discussed this question thoroughly with the Secretary of War. Something may happen after a declaration of peace that might prove embarrassing, and I trust the committee will vote this down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second. To draft into the military service of the United States, organize and officer, in accordance with the provisions of section 111 of said national-defense act, so far as the provisions of said section may be applicable and not inconsistent with the terms of this act, any or all members of the National Guard and of the National Guard Reserve, and said members so drafted into the military service of the United States shall serve therein for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That when so drafted the organizations or units of the National Guard shall, so far as practicable, retain the State designations of their respective organizations.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Amend on page 2, following line 24, by inserting the following proviso:

"Provided further, That the President is authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment, to organize, and equip not to exceed four Infantry divisions, the officers of which shall be selected in the manner provided by paragraph 3 of section 1 of this act: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organization of the Regular Army: And provided further, That there shall be no enlistments in said force of men liable to draft under section 1 of this act: And provided further, That no such voluntary force shall be accepted in any unit smaller than a division."

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, this proposed amendment is to make it possible for Col. Theodore Roosevelt to carry out his patriotic offer to the American people of organizing a voluntary force of not less than a division to embark for France under the American flag, join our allies in defending this country and securing victory. This force of men is to be made up of those who served in the Spanish-American War, who have had necessary training and experience, who know warfare, and also men in this country who are not affected by the provisions of the administration bill on account of age, who have served in the standing Army or the National Guard. The adoption of this amendment does not mean a delay of three or four months to take a census of the fighting men of the country and six additional months of training. It means to place in the field not less than 20,000 men—in fact, a maximum number of 100,000 men—to begin fighting for America within 30 days.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it is to be composed of men not eligible to draft under section 1 of this act?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the gentleman realize that every man in those four divisions would have to be over 40 years of age?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; this amendment is the same amendment offered to the bill in the Senate by Senator HARDING.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, but the ages are different in the Senate and the House bills. In the Senate the ages are from 19 to 26, and in this bill, in section 1, referred to, the ages are from 21 to 40. Therefore there would be no men in those divisions under 40 years of age.

Mr. AUSTIN. I will change my amendment to meet the gentleman's wishes and secure his support.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the very next paragraph of the volunteer section would answer the purpose he requires for his amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; and I will ask the Clerk to insert section 3 of the bill and strike out section 1.

Mr. GALLIVAN. But we have not got to that yet.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman can not withdraw his amendment. He had it right in the first place.

Mr. AUSTIN. But I have not withdrawn my amendment, and I do not propose to withdraw it. I propose to have a vote upon it.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. MASON. I quite agree with the spirit of the amendment, but I would like to know whether the gentleman has the approval of the General Staff? [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. I will say to my friend from Illinois that if I secure the approval of the American Congress I am not going to worry about the approval of the General Staff.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman's amendment provides for four divisions, as I understand.

Mr. AUSTIN. It provides for not less than one and not to exceed four.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. As I understood the gentleman's statement it was to enable Col. Roosevelt to raise a division he wanted to raise.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Why make it four; why not make it one?

Mr. AUSTIN. Because Col. Roosevelt has already over 100,000 applications to serve in his voluntary force.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I understand, but, as I am informed, he does not want 100,000 but wants a division of about 25,000 men. I will say to the gentleman I am in full sympathy with that, and I would vote for a proposition that would enable Col. Roosevelt to raise such a division, but I am not inclined to vote for an amendment that carries 100,000, for four instead of one.

Mr. AUSTIN. This amendment has a minimum of one and a maximum of four divisions. If Col. Roosevelt wishes to raise but one division, he need not raise the additional divisions.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Somebody else might raise the other three.

Mr. MEEKER. If this was anybody else but Roosevelt, would the gentleman offer the amendment?

Mr. MASON. He is the only American who has offered.

Mr. AUSTIN. He has done more to arouse and create public sentiment for preparedness—for military training and service—than any man in America. He represents to-day an American who made good in the Spanish-American War and we ought to give him a chance to make good in this war. This is the wish of a great majority of the people we represent.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will.

Mr. BURNETT. Has not Col. Bryan offered to enlist and fight on the firing line as a private instead of being up on a hill with a field glass?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will put Col. Bryan in Col. Roosevelt's division.

Mr. BURNETT. He will have to do all the fighting if you do. [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. I am willing to include my colleague from Alabama.

Mr. BURNETT. Do not put me in; I am too short-legged to run and too short-winded to fight.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then I will assign the gentleman to the commissary department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. GARDNER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's time being extended. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it not a fact that Senator HARDING inserted four divisions instead of one for the reason that the President might in his wisdom think that there were other persons as well as Col. Roosevelt who could arouse the enthusiasm that Col. Roosevelt could, although this is avowedly only him?

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is correct. This amendment is a Roosevelt proposition, and the sending of this force to Europe will do more to encourage, arouse, and enthuse the American people, and satisfy the people with reference to the volunteer or draft system than anything the American Congress can do. It would in the end bring more men to the colors than any action we can take.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the gentleman if he will consider amending the resolution and going a little further—I do not know how you would exactly word it to provide that—but require that these divisions preferably be given to American citizens who had occupied the position of Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

Mr. AUSTIN. Pass my amendment and I will see that he gets a job or a commission. [Laughter.]

In conclusion, I wish to submit an interview with Col. Roosevelt, which appeared in to-day's afternoon papers:

NEW YORK, April 27.

Declaring he wanted to see an American division on the firing line in France within a few weeks, Col. Roosevelt to-day replied to Joseph Leiter, president of the Army League, who telegraphed him asking that he withdraw his proposal for a Roosevelt division.

The colonel arrived at Oyster Bay en route to Chicago, where he will speak to-morrow night. He declared it unpatriotic to oppose the administration's conscription bill and the Harding amendment to send a division to the front immediately.

"No man can misunderstand my position unless he deliberately chooses to do so," declared the colonel. "I most earnestly and heartily favor the principle of universal obligatory military service.

OUR PERMANENT POLICY.

"I wish to see it introduced immediately for this war, and I also wish to see it made the permanent policy of this Nation. I earnestly and heartily support the administration's proposal in this direction, because it is a step in the right direction, and am only sorry it is not a very much longer step.

"My proposal is to supplement this step by providing for the immediate use of some of the men who would be exempt under the administration's bill. It is simply silly not to encourage, instead of forbidding, the use of efficient men who otherwise would not be used at all.

"All opposition to the Harding amendment is opposition to the principle of universal service, and, however well intentioned, in its actual effect it is profoundly unpatriotic.

"Moreover, it is all wrong not to send an expeditionary force abroad within the next few weeks.

TO TRAIN OVER SEA.

"It is all wrong to propose not to send anyone abroad until we have a whole Army trained. As a matter of fact, half the training should be given on the other side of the water.

"We should put one division at the front at the earliest moment, keep its numbers full, and put other divisions with it just as rapidly as it is possible to send them over, instead of keeping the entire Army back to send over en masse.

"The only wise and patriotic course to follow is to vote for the immediate application of the administration's bill and also to vote for Senator HARDING'S proposition, or some similar one, as an addition, not a substitute."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the proviso in regard to the limit of the ages, and I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The amendment can not be reported in the way in which it is offered; there is no age limit in the amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, if we fail to mobilize Theodore Roosevelt in this crisis we are deliberately neglecting one of the greatest moral forces that the modern world has ever known. I am told that the War College is opposed to sending Roosevelt abroad in command of a division of soldiers because accession to Roosevelt's request would mean a deluge of further requests of the same nature. Are we so weak that we are afraid of making discriminations? Are we afraid that people will say that we play favorites? Suppose people make that accusation, what of it? If Roosevelt can help us, and other aspirants for commands can not help us, let us take Roosevelt and turn down the other aspirants. I suppose it is a fact that many of Secretary Baker's military advisers object to the Roosevelt plan. Did those same military advisers counsel the use of the National Guard? If so, they made fish of one set of volunteers and fowl of another, and, furthermore, they disregarded the reports of pretty much every Army officer who was connected with the border training last summer. Did I hear some one say that Roosevelt has had no military experience? At all events he commanded a regiment in the biggest land battle which the United States has fought since the Civil War. He commanded a brigade during most of the Cuban campaign, and in that brigade were two regiments of Regulars. How does that experience compare with the experience of the National Guard generals who are destined to command brigades and divisions?

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. Has the gentleman less confidence in the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER. I do not quite understand the question.

Mr. GORDON. Would not this amendment be an interference with the constitutional authority of the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy?

Mr. GARDNER. No; his constitutional powers are not invaded by this amendment.

But, my friend, are you going to vote for this bill?

Mr. GORDON. I will let you know after it is completed.

Mr. GARDNER. You are going to vote for it. And inconsistent as I may be in advocating a small volunteer force in addition to the Regulars and the conscripts, it is nothing to your inconsistency in voting for a volunteer force of 400,000 men in the National Guard in conjunction with conscription.

Mr. GORDON. I want all volunteers in this war.

Mr. GARDNER. No; you do not. Your own bill provides for conscription.

Mr. GORDON. I want to give them a chance to volunteer first.

Mr. GARDNER. I understand.

If you will turn to the files of old newspapers of 1898 you will find that exactly the same arguments were advanced against Roosevelt's Rough Riders as are now being advanced against Roosevelt's division. Yet any man, soldier or civilian, who fairly and squarely will examine the history of the Spanish War must admit that the Rough Riders—and they were a lot more rough than they were riders—were a conspicuous success. Roosevelt's experience in actual warfare and his deep study of military problems is more than the equivalent of many years of work as an officer in Fort Leavenworth, Fort Riley, or even in the city of Washington.

But leadership is God-given, and in that quality Roosevelt is supreme.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. DECKER. As a man who is going to vote for the selective draft, I would like to ask, in all sincerity, could not the distinguished gentleman of whom you speak be of more service in drilling and giving the benefit of his magnificent leadership to this selective-draft army of 500,000 men?

Mr. GARDNER. In my opinion he could not.

Mr. DECKER. I would like to know your reasons why he could not.

Mr. GARDNER. One of the reasons is that he is a fighting man and not a schoolmaster. [Laughter.]

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for five minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DECKER. Do I understand the gentleman to mean that these 500,000 drafted men will not be fighting men?

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, they will be the most superb "ironsides" when they are trained, just as the soldiers of Cromwell were superb. I am pleading for the small army of adventurers who will follow Roosevelt and make up in nerve what they lack in punctuation. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. COX. I am heartily in favor of the amendment, but I want to ask the gentleman this question, however: Is there anything in permanent law governing our military establishment to-day whereby ex-President Roosevelt could get under for the purpose of raising his brigade?

Mr. GARDNER. Well, possibly, as a citizen of the State of New York, he might be empowered by that State to raise a division of adventurous New Yorkers; but that would not permit him to gather adventurers from the whole country.

Mr. COX. By going in the State Militia of the State of New York?

Mr. GARDNER. If the State of New York will create a new major generalship, and if Gov. Whitman will create him a major general, and if he can settle with Maj. Gen. O'Ryan as to which will be senior, then he can raise a division of New Yorkers and have it taken in the United States Army under the decision recently rendered by the Secretary of War.

Mr. COX. Then, he could not get in under the proposed bill at all unless the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] carries.

Mr. GARDNER. He could be commissioned, of course, in any rank in which the President chooses to commission him; but he could not be commissioned except just as you or I might be commissioned for service with what I call the "army of ironsides." I believe in Roosevelt as an emergency man. That is what I am asking for.

Mr. COX. I am not seeking to interrupt the gentleman, but I want information. I take it that the President, being Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, would have and has power under the Constitution to commission Roosevelt himself; but under the pending bill, if it should become a law, without this proposed amendment, or something like it, would the President have any power to commission him as commander of a brigade?

Mr. GARDNER. Not without the consent of the Senate; but with its consent the President could commission Roosevelt as commander of a brigade under the present bill, if he so desired.

Mr. COX. He could go ahead and raise a brigade?

Mr. GARDNER. He could not raise a brigade.

Mr. COX. That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. GARDNER. He could commission him as brigadier general and assign him to this army.

Mr. COX. To be raised under this proposed law?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. He could do that if our volunteer proposition stays in the bill?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. CALDWELL. Is it not true that there is a law on the statute books that will permit the colonel to raise a division and go?

Mr. GARDNER. Not unless we authorize United States volunteers.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I will state to the gentleman that personally I am in favor of creating a division that Col. Roosevelt can command, but I do not see the occasion for the four divisions. I am not inclined to vote for the amendment if it is for four divisions. I would like to ask the gentleman why it provides for four divisions instead of for one?

Mr. GARDINER. I think the purpose was to give the President a little wider opportunity. I saw this amendment some time ago in substantially its present form. At the time when I saw it there was a blank left before the word "divisions." No particular number of divisions had at that time been decided upon, the reason being that it seemed advisable to consider whether it would not be wise to leave the President some latitude. If he felt disposed to commission Col. Roosevelt, perhaps he might feel disposed to commission some other leader of the same type. Personally, I should prefer to confine the amendment to one division, because I believe that Col. Roosevelt is the only man who can possibly fill the emergency bill which I wish to see filled.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Can the gentleman inform the House whether ex-President Taft, who is also an ex-Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, wants to enlist?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Well, we should like to have a cavalry division for President Taft. [Laughter.] I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHERWOOD. You do not mean four divisions? You mean four brigades in one division?

Mr. GARDNER. The way in which the Austin amendment is drawn, it reads four divisions, each of which would have three brigades of infantry, and other arms as provided by law for divisions of the Regular Army.

Mr. SHERWOOD. What would be the aggregate membership?

Mr. GARDNER. The aggregate war strength of a division under the national-defense act is about 27,000 men.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How is this division to be raised—by volunteers?

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, it will be raised by volunteering, all right. Every adventurer in the country will volunteer in the Roosevelt outfit. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I saw it stated in the paper that he was to pick out particularly well-qualified men.

Mr. GARDNER. He will have plenty to pick from.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. I would like to ask the gentleman if it will be necessary to raise four divisions before you can make use of one, as provided by the amendment?

Mr. GARDNER. No; it would not be necessary. The amendment provides for four.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am going to offer an amendment to reduce it from four to one.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman from Tennessee says he is going to offer an amendment to reduce it from four to one, as I understand it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I understand that in response to a previous question the gentleman has indicated that he does not believe that this division should be restricted to men over 40 years of age.

Mr. GARDNER. Correct.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then if this bill passes applying the draft to men from 21 to 40 and this amendment is adopted, as you suggest and favor, would it not result in the privilege of volunteering being given to this one division and denied to a million or two more? [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. No; because you are according the privilege of volunteering to 330,000 additional men in the National Guard——

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GARDNER. I should be glad to yield further, but I should also like to make my speech. I have given it to the press. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAMTON. You will get more time.

Mr. GARDNER. All right.

Mr. CRAMTON. As to this I am not certain; but does not the amendment that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has given us notice that he will offer to this bill provide that the enlistments, the additions to the National Guard, shall be under the draft as well as the enlistments in the new Army?

Mr. GARDNER. No. His amendment does not alter the bill in that respect. The bill calls, of course, for drafting in the National Guard if it can not be filled by volunteering.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is my impression that he has an amendment to offer to fill the National Guard.

Mr. GARDNER. The amendment differs from the bill in several respects.

Mr. CRAMTON. This is not the amendment that is shown in the RECORD?

Mr. GARDNER. The argument is——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from Massachusetts be granted 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. GARDNER. Now, Mr. Chairman, the criticism has been made that sentiment has no place in war, and that this proposal is sentimental. "Sentimental" is not the term by which to describe the effect of this Roosevelt division. Its effect would be moral, immeasurably moral and profoundly moral. I believe that the early arrival of our troops in the trenches would cheer the allies and hearten civilization as nothing else on earth could hearten it. Not all the bond issues, not all the wooden ships which we can vote, would awaken one tithe the enthusiasm of Roosevelt's great adventure.

We are told that he would subtract a few officers from the Regular Army. We are told that the service of all of these officers is required for training American armies, which, if need be, are to fight at some time in the future. We are told that it is wrong to send a half-trained force abroad; that we must await the burnishing of every buckle and the polishing of every strap. All that I grant you, so far as our main army of half a million men is concerned. But suppose that Great Britain at the outbreak of the European war had pursued the same policy; supposing she had withheld her little force of regulars and territorials in order to use the men and officers as schoolmasters for Kitchener's army.

The war might have been ended in a few weeks with Germany triumphant. Even supposing the thin French line could have withheld the German rush, what would the world have said if month had followed month and Great Britain had confined her sacrifices to the loosening of her purse strings and the patrol of her fleet? Have you forgotten how our newspapers jeered and how the pro-Germans here in Congress flouted Great Britain because month after month she held only 27 miles of the allied line on the western front? Have you forgotten the merry quips to the effect that "England is ready to fight to the last drop of French blood," and "England expects every Frenchman to do his duty"? Suppose that England had withheld her entire force and had left the defense of those 27 miles to her allies, what would the world have said then, what would history have said, and what is history going to say of us if the great bulk of Americans confine their share in this war to subscribing other people's money for the purchase of foreign bonds and to voting taxes out of other people's pockets?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I want to ask the gentleman, if it will not interrupt the thread of his argument, in how long he thinks this army could reach the other shore?

Mr. GARDNER. Assuming transportation available, I should say in four months from the time it is authorized. The division would, of course, require additional training in France before being put in the front line. The length of time required would perhaps depend on whether this country would be willing to have that army partly trained by French officers.

I am not unreasonably impatient. I realize as well as anyone the necessity for the complete training of an army; but a year from now the war may be finished. Germany may be the conqueror or the allies may have won. If, when that time comes, the judgment book shall show that America, except as a money lender, has struck no blow for civilization, what sort of history do you think that our grandchildren must read?

Let us, then, at once send to the trenches a small expeditionary force of Regulars or Marines. Let them show the spirit of our Nation. Let this small force be added to from time to time by volunteers, trained or half trained, perhaps, and then for the final blow let us prepare a great army of ironsides, not Regulars, not adventurers, such as would follow Roosevelt, but the plain rank and file of young American manhood, raised by conscription applied to every class in the Nation, rich and poor alike.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HULBERT. Does the gentleman believe they need anything on the other side more than aviators at the present time?

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, my Lord, man, I do not know! Our aviation story is one of the saddest parts of our military history.

Mr. HULBERT. One question further. Would the gentleman favor an amendment which would make it possible for some person to organize a volunteer aviation corps, or more than one, to be sent to the other side?

Mr. GARDNER. Bless my soul, anybody can offer any amendment to this amendment, if he will only vote for it.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. GARDNER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOWARD. One very serious thing that is worrying me about this amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee and about the Roosevelt army is this: You know the recklessness of the colonel about fighting and his reputation as a rough rider, and I was just wondering what in the name of heaven would happen to these four brigades if the colonel was to get killed in the first battle. Has the gentleman thought of that?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes; and if the gentleman realizes what the Rough Riders were in the Spanish War, he will remember that Roosevelt chose Leonard Wood for his colonel and all the way down the line he chose here and there a Regular, here and there an adventurer, but they were all men who could follow his lead.

Mr. HOWARD. It is a source of great comfort to me that Gen. Wood is going with the colonel.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to reach some sort of an agreement as to how long this amendment is going to be debated.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. TILSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes, and then that debate on this amendment close.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on this amendment, and the Chair has promised me recognition following the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. I hope the request of the gentleman from Connecticut will not be granted.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let us agree on a certain length of time. There are only two or three men on our side who want to be heard.

Mr. DENT. How much time does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] wish?

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope to say what I am going to say in five minutes. I certainly should not want more than 10 minutes at the outside.

Mr. DENT. Then I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be closed in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MASON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. DENT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs desire to indicate who shall control this 30 minutes?

Mr. DENT. To be controlled by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. Anybody who wants to speak should get his time from the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SISSON. Are the 10 minutes of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] to be taken out of the 30 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has not yet been granted 10 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. I renew my request that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Reserving the right to object, I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Kentucky may have the 10 minutes, but it ought not to be taken out of the 30 minutes. If it is to be taken out of the 30 minutes, I shall object.

Mr. LANGLEY. My colleague [Mr. SHERLEY] says he thinks he can close in five minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest that if gentlemen will allow me, I will be glad to proceed.

Mr. LANGLEY. That will be the better way, and at the end of five minutes the question of granting an extension of time can be settled.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENT. Is not this the parliamentary situation, that the committee having decided to close the debate in 30 minutes, Members can be recognized for only five minutes by the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the regular procedure.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to see Col. Roosevelt lead American troops in France [applause], but I do not believe that in order that he should lead them we need to adopt this amendment, or that those of us who have fought here for days for a principle can afford now to agree to the amendment. [Applause.] There is no reason why the Colonel may not be given a commission, and there is no further reason why it may not be possible to take of the existing army a sufficient force to France within a few months, and that force will be a trained force that can properly uphold the honor and glory of this country and give real aid to the cause we are fighting for.

We can send him with all of the prestige that would follow from his great name and from his giving thus an earnest of what the Nation intends to do, without undertaking to disrupt the whole plan for an efficient army by the proposal that is being made here. To send men to France except well equipped, equipped with everything necessary, is to put a burden upon our allies and not to aid them. To send men there gathered suddenly, insufficiently trained, insufficiently equipped, is simply to hurt and not to help.

I appreciate the value of sentiment in life. I desire as much as any man that America shall as soon as possible show her willingness to spend her blood as well as her money, but the way to do it is not the way that is here suggested. If the Colonel is sincere in his desire, as I believe he is sincere, let the plan take form by his receiving a commisson, and then let such a force as can properly be sent from the existing Army go under his command to France, and we will have accomplished all that is to be accomplished by the act of the former President of the United States leading our forces there, and we will not have accomplished it with any hurt to our allies by sending troops that would be a hindrance instead of an aid.

We ought not to throw down the barrier to this proposal, and if we do it we simply invite the same proposition from hundreds of other men, and we open up a vicious system against which we have been contending, and which many of us have consistently opposed for the few days past. [Applause.]

I beg the House not to be swept off its feet by any such appeal as was made by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. War is more than sentiment; war is a business of vast concern, and it behooves this Congress to remember that it is not permitted to simply give rein to its impulses, but that there is demanded of it sober, common-sense judgment. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my colleague [Mr. SHERLEY] appeals to those of you who, with him, have been opposing the volunteer system to vote against this amendment, because he says you have been, during the progress of this great debate, battling steadfastly for a principle, and that you would be abandoning that for which you have been contending if you support this amendment. I beg to remind him that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], who is perhaps the foremost leader on that side of the question, and certainly the most persistent and earnest advocate of selective conscription, is in favor of this amendment. He evidently does not think that it would impair the cause of conscription, which he has been so ably espousing.

Mr. Chairman, I am for this amendment, first, because I have every reason to believe, from what I have heard from most reliable sources, that unless it is adopted there is no chance whatever for that distinguished and patriotic American citizen, Col. Roosevelt, to get a commission to organize a division of volunteers, which he desires to do and which, in my judgment, millions of American citizens want him to do, and which the Kaiser, above all others, does not want him to do. [Applause.] If this amendment is adopted the administration will understand, just as the country will understand, that it was intended for this purpose; and while no names are mentioned it will be well understood in the proper place that such was the purpose of the Congress, and, backed as it will be by the overwhelming demands of the people, an acceptance of his offer would follow.

I am for the amendment, in the second place, because in the district that I have the honor to represent there are many patriotic men who are waiting for a chance to volunteer, and in a number of instances men have made preparation to organize units for the service, and many of the men have already promised to go with them, and in almost every case they have expressed their desire to have the honor of going with the Roosevelt division. [Applause.]

I am assured that in the famous city of Hazard alone [Applause] they are prepared to raise a battalion to join the Roosevelt colors, and half of the men have already had active military training and experience. I have received like assurances from other sections of my district, for there are no "slackers" there when the country needs them. That is why they want to go with Roosevelt. They know it means a fight if there is any fighting to do. He has had many devoted friends in that mountain country, and some who did not think so well of him, but this is a time when all differences must be buried and when we need our strongest and bravest men to lead us. [Applause.] The adoption of this amendment would do more, in my judgment, than any other one thing that we could do to give impetus to the American spirit and help to popularize this war with the great masses of the people.

I am for this amendment for still another reason. If the proposition of the minority of the committee prevails, this amendment would open some opportunity, and if the majority proposition prevails it would open a still wider opportunity for the brave boys of the country to volunteer. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as it is my purpose to address the committee when the selective conscription amendment is offered by the gentleman from California, later on, I would not undertake here, even if I had time enough, to discuss that question. I shall only make one or two observations to finish up the time allotted me. I listened with genuine pleasure to the magnificent speech of my distinguished friend from California [Mr. KAHN], whom I have for many years regarded as one of the ablest men in this great body. [Applause.]

It was, indeed, an eloquent and forceful presentation of the conscription cause, and yet it seemed to me, Mr. Chairman, that in the very outset of his argument he confirmed the contention of those of us who favor a trial of the volunteer system first, for the extracts that he read from Gen. Washington's letters showed that that distinguished American was advocating the draft as supplemental to the volunteer system, under which the Continental Army was organized and under which he was at that time conducting the War of the Revolution. This is identically the proposition which the majority report of the committee recommends. [Applause.]

Before I close I must challenge a statement which the gentleman from California made, or rather an inference clearly to be drawn from what he said. He quoted figures from the different Northern States, showing the millions and millions that were expended by those States as bounty to Union soldiers. His purpose was clear and I regretted to hear him use such an argument to support conscription and to refer to bounties in the spirit that he did. In the opening hours of this debate those who opposed the volunteer system were bold in their attacks upon the Volunteers. They were driven from that position by the repeated refutations presented by gentlemen on the other side who cited instance after instance of the splendid record of the Volunteers, and of the heroism, valor, and patriotism which they have displayed in all the wars in which our country has been engaged.

Now, instead of attacking them openly they call it an attack upon the "system," but it is really stabbing the Volunteers in the back to say even by innuendo that the men on the Union side who received a bounty took it as a bribe to induce them to volunteer to serve their country. I deny it, and in their names and the names of their descendents I resent it. Ah, Brother KAHN, and you gentlemen who applauded what he said, you misunderstand the true situation, you lose sight of the human side of it. You lose sight of the poor man's side of it. There comes to my mind now the picture of a lonely grave upon a Kentucky hillside where sleeps a soldier of the Union. A braver, truer man never rallied to the flag of his country. He did not volunteer at the beginning of the war. He had a wife and five small children who would be left defenseless if he volunteered, because they were very poor and lived upon his daily earnings. He wanted the Union cause to win and was anxious to go to the front. He was struggling between emotions of love, duty, and patriotism. When the bounty was offered by our State he accepted it, but he did not take it in his pocket to the front. He left it to help that little family and preserve them while he went forward to join the boys at the front, like the brave volunteer that he was. [Loud applause.]

Gentlemen, what was true of that man was true of thousands of others. Those of you who are talking so much about the importance of starting right in this war should remember that in this country there are millions of the sons and grandsons of these heroes of the Civil War and that you will have to rely largely upon——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am sorry. I will finish that thought later on. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I had expected to express very briefly at a later hour my views on the pending bill, but the amendment now presented causes me to say a word. For days the House and the Senate and the country have been engaged in a discussion of the question as to whether an army should be raised by the volunteer method of raising companies, regiments, and brigades in different localities or through different methods of voluntary enlistment, or whether universal liability to service should be the basis upon which the Army is to be formed. Those who are in favor of letting Col. Roosevelt raise a division can easily give him the opportunity by voting in favor of the volunteer method of raising an army. [Applause.] Those who are in favor of the draft system, in favor of universal liability to service, in favor of not permitting the individual to select the Army, are utterly inconsistent to maintain that position if they give a special preference to a few adventurers, as described by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not yield. If the volunteer system should be adopted, men hereafter and the children of men who go into the war will refer to the fact that they themselves or their ancestors volunteered in the service of the Government, and when the volunteer system has not raised sufficient men, and men are drafted, for all time in the family history there will be a blot upon those who have been drafted in. But if you adopt the system now that all men subject equally to liability for service shall be taken according to law, there can be no offense in the term "drafted in." [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER. I am addressing the Chair.

Mr. MANN. I do not care. I decline to be interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have reached the conclusion that, with the demands that may be made upon us in the war we are now engaged in, where for the safety and honor and dignity of the Republic we must smite our enemy, we ought to start right and make no exceptions, and that we ought to adopt the system that all men are equally liable to service. [Applause.] Then there can be no disgrace hereafter in having been drafted into the service of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I asked this time as a little prelude to what I wish to insert in the RECORD. Now, I am in favor of Col. Roosevelt commanding a division in the American Army to fight our battles if he so desires. I base that upon the fact that we have declared war against the greatest Empire on earth and as one of the means of bringing that war to a successful conclusion I am for adopting, enacting, and putting into force every measure possible at our command. [Applause.] And I will tell you another thing. I am for obeying the Commander in Chief, and I am for complying with his requests in the method of raising an army.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I have not the time.

Mr. BRITTEN. I wanted to know if the gentleman is in favor of this amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am going to vote for this amendment, if that is what the gentleman wants to know, and I am going to vote for the requests and desires of our Commander in Chief. Now, if he is big enough to command our armies in time of war, surrounded as he is with his great officers and having the counsel and advice that he has, it occurs to me he knows how he wants to raise this army.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How did the Belgians do; how did Switzerland do, pointed out as a model in warfare for our own troops; how did France do and England do? We have to keep at home the necessary men to supply munitions in order to help carry on and conduct this war.

I did not vote for Mr. Wilson, but he was elected President of the United States. That was a great honor, and with that came great tasks and great responsibility. I have heard it said by Members of this House that he was one of the greatest Presidents this country ever had and was the greatest living American. It is not necessary to decide that at this time. Besides being elected President he was elected Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy and of the militia of the States in time of war. No doubt of that, the Constiution says that.

We are at war. No one likes that, but it came without provocation on our part. It was forced upon us by an utter disregard of international law, by a violation of the laws of humanity, and the ruthless practice of barbarity.

We are at war with the greatest military power on the earth. He is already in the field with an estimated army of 15,000,000. It is composed of men of military training and experience, and they are fighting for the life of their nation.

To now win this war requires the best of our efforts and all our resources if need be. It is a great and important undertaking. Let no man be deceived into thinking that we entered upon alight or easy task. It may be a long war. I hope not, but we must prepare. Our duty now lies in one direction and leads to one purpose. Everything for victory.

The most essential thing is an army. We should have one of large number, well trained and equipped. We have appropriated $7,000,000,000. We should have an army with others in training of 2,000,000 men.

How to get them is the question under consideration. The method proposed in the bill is for volunteers, and then, if the men do not volunteer, draft them. The other method is to raise them by selected conscription from the beginning.

The President and Commander in Chief says to conscript the men in the first instance and not wait for volunteering. The War Department, our Army officers, and generals, War Colleges, and Chief of Staff, who must lead the men and direct the battles, are in favor of conscription.

We have in this country at the present time the great Gen. Joffre, who is directing the valiant French armies, and he says to conscript our Army.

We also have the general secretary of the British Empire, Mr. Balfour, representing the English Government in supplying men and supplies for the army. He says it will be a mistake if we do not select our armies by conscription, and that England made a fatal mistake costing thousands upon thousands of lives and millions upon millions of money by the volunteer system.

I have received letters and telegrams almost without number from the citizens of my district asking me to stand by the President. I am going to stand by my country. The President is strong for selective conscription. He is our Commander in Chief. He was elected to do the work. The job is on hand. Some one must lead. Shall we take the advice of the man who was elected for that purpose? Shall we permit the one the Constitution points out to say? Shall we take the advice of the Army officers of our land? Shall we profit by the experience of England and France? Shall we be guided by the requests from the great mass of the people of our States and districts? They ought to be permitted to speak and be considered.

After I had retired to bed last night I arose and was handed the following telegram, which is only a sample of many sent me.

DETROIT, MICH., April 26, 1917.

Hon. J. M. C. SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

We are in favor of general taxation and against a burdensome tax on industry. We are unalterably in favor of conscription and against the volunteer system. We believe this to be the sentiment of the whole State of Michigan, and ask that you stand firmly by these principles.

SPLITDORF ELECTRICAL CO., OF DETROIT.

We have declared war, and I for one am in favor of striking our enemy with might and main and bring it to a victorious and speedy conclusion. I am not going to vote for war and then hamper or impede or direct or command the Commander in Chief. That is his job.

I am going to render him and my country my best service in the great task of crushing our enemy. Now we are engaged in a great struggle to determine whether this Nation or any nation conceived in liberty can long endure; and it is as true to-day as it was when Abraham Lincoln declared it on the blood-stained hillsides of Gettysburg. We are at war and the issue is as great.

No one can imagine the consequences if our allies lose. Let us buckle on the armor. Let us aid in every way. The President wants an army. We must have an army.

We all agree as to that but seem to differ widely on how it shall be enlisted.

I believe that a selective conscription is the best for the citizen, the Army, and the Nation. When a person wishes to construct a building, a railroad, or carry on other diversified industry he does not have all the men work in one line or on one part or division, but he has the structural work done in part by the architect, a part by the engineer, a part by the mechanics, and a part by the unskilled workmen. An army must not only have the soldiers, but must have ammunition, provisions, and supplies. It is needless to have an army or a navy without guns, shot and shell, boats, clothing, or provisions. When a skilled workman, munition maker, or mechanic presents himself for enlistment or is enrolled, he should not be sent to the firing line, but he should be uniformed and sent to the factory to work as a skilled workman to supply the army.

England made this mistake at first by sending all her workmen and mechanics into the ranks, and after many of them had been killed others were recalled to carry on the munition factories to manufacture supplies. We are told not to make this mistake.

I am not in the least hereby criticizing the volunteer soldier. I praise him for the sacrifices he has made, for the victories he has won for our glorious Republic, our freedom, and our institutions. He holds first place among our citizenry, and I would not detract or dim the glory of his achievements or the result of his endeavor. But now we are confronted by a stupendous and terrible war, the greatest the world ever knew, where shot and shell fill the air each day, and millions to-day are engaged on each side as contenders; these are trained and seasoned veterans, and our Army must be carefully chosen. It must be supplied with ample munitions and supplies of all kinds. If all our mechanics and engineers go to the front, it will be a mistake in the first instance, such as England made, and many would either be killed or recalled to furnish the ammunition, guns, and implements for conducting the war. I think this can best be done by the selective conscription.

I notice ex-President Roosevelt has volunteered himself, but wants to select a battalion to follow. Ex-President Taft, Hon. Elihu Root, of New York; Col. Watterson, of Louisville; and many of the leaders of thought and industry of America think conscription best.

I think Mr. Roosevelt's request should be granted, and he be permitted not only to go but it would be clearly the best thing to do to send a number of our Army officers to the firing lines in Europe to study the art of conducting and carrying on the war, so that when our Army arrived they would have leaders familiar with European warfare.

The volunteer system has been tried. It would take a long time for us to secure an army of such proportion as we need for the European war.

I attended a meeting held in this city of Washington attended by thousands of people. There were moving pictures, the Marine Band, speaking, and singing. The evening was fine, and it was held out of doors. Washington is a city of about 400,000 people. Earnest appeals were made at this mass meeting for volunteers, but as far as I could observe none responded, and it is stated that out of the population of this large city of 400,000 there has been but 135 enlistments up to this time.

If we are to enroll an army of 2,000,000 men, enlistments at the rate of 1,000 a day would require 2,000 days, or about 6 years' time. We have been for upward of one year calling for volunteers to join our Army and Navy, to fill up the quota needed in the Army and Navy, and recruit up the National Guard, but we are short about 200,000 men yet.

I clip from the Washington Herald of April 27, 1917, this day, the following excerpt, showing that the enlistments are coming too slow to equip an army of large size within reasonable time:

The net total enlistments yesterday were 1,003, making the Navy's strength 81,269. Nearly 20,000 more men can be used, although the total for manning the fighting ships is within 3,300 of the mark.

Enlistments for the Regular Army numbered 1,684 yesterday, making a total since April 1 of 33,792. Pennsylvania led with 181, Illinois was second with 167, Michigan third with 116, and New York fourth with 107. Indiana and Massachusetts each had 75, Iowa 63, Kansas 63, and Texas 62.

Nevada is the only State which has supplied her quota, based on the census figures. Nevada was supposed to furnish only 162 men, but already she has sent 173. New York, which is scheduled to supply 18,226 men, has furnished only 2,784. Illinois's quota is 11,276 and she has furnished 3,359.

If the whole Army is to be raised by conscript, this certainly does not cast any odium upon any man in the uniform of his country. It was necessary to make four drafts in the War of the Rebellion.

Switzerland, which has a universal system of military training, conscripts for its army. France conscripts. England now conscripts. And in time of need no country would hesitate to conscript, and a man who fights for his country is no less a hero in the front rank because he is a conscript.

It has been said that a conscript and a convict were considered in the same class by some. There is no more connection between conscript and convict than there is between preacher and prisoner.

The word "conscript" is a compound of the word "con" and "scribo," meaning "written together," and if the term is not a suitable one, nevertheless it means enrollment for the Army.

By conscription a man's name is drawn by lot. If he is of suitable age and physically sound, he is chosen for the Army. This is fair, just, and equitable to all.

It is not fair to have a part of the people or a class fight for those who want to stay at home and who are as able and well equipped for service as those who volunteer.

In the time of need our country has a right to demand our services, our property, and, if need be, our lives. It has cost much of all of these. It is the duty of every citizen to serve his country, and that duty the Government has a right to demand, and it is not a right which the citizen has to refuse or make a choice when the life of the Nation is in peril. The duty rests on all.

We voted for war. The country is at war. We have elected the Commander in Chief. Now, let us supply him with the Army he calls for and provide him with the material he needs.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I favor this amendment because from the very beginning of this war we need in it sentiment and imagination to which reference has been made. The greatest genius of war that the world has ever known once said that men should be appealed to through the medium of imagination rather than of mathematics. When the First Consul proposed in his own handwriting to George the Third that a treaty should be concluded between France and England his offer was spurned. Indeed, the King of England did not even dignify the proposal with an answer. Then the genius of the Corsican in applying his theory of imagination in the practical affairs of life was superbly demonstrated. He desired to conclude a treaty with the Czar of Russia. As a first step he dressed up in good clothes all the Russian troops in France and sent them back home under parole. This was an act of chivalry and courtesy that the Czar could not well resist, and the treaty was immediately concluded.

The trouble with this war, as stupendous as it may be, and as painful and disastrous as its effects may be, is that it is liable to die "aborning." There is an uneasy feeling in certain quarters amounting to actual apprehensions that the declaration of war by the Congress has not met and will not meet with a hearty response from the people.

The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] said a few days ago that this was a holy war, a war of righteousness; and referring to this statement, my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] on yesterday said that Congress knew that it was a sacred war, but that the people had not yet learned it. He insisted that in a few months the people themselves would recognize the seriousness of the undertaking and the character of the holy war they were called upon to wage. What an exquisite compound of irony and humor this, that we have proclaimed a holy war which the people themselves have not yet come to comprehend!

But if my friend from Massachusetts is right it can not be denied that we need at once to inject into the conflict the elements of sentiment, imagination, and enthusiasm. We need to proclaim a crusade, and in the American Republic there is no man comparable to Roosevelt as a creator of sentiment and enthusiasm and as an organizer of political crusades. Above all things we need at the very beginning of this war Roosevelt's indomitable energy, superb optimism, and boundless enthusiasm.

Mr. SHERLEY stated that he would not consent to upset a system, to destroy a design or a plan by an exception. We did this quite well, nevertheless, in the War with Spain. We had a Regular Army, and still we sent Roosevelt there.

It should be understood that Roosevelt will not operate as a part of a machine and that he will not serve under anybody. Moreover, he should not be asked to do so. He is an ex-President of this Republic, and one of the greatest that ever occupied the presidential chair. His brilliant and superb public record entitles him to exceptional consideration. He is the grandest combination of conscience, heart, and brain beneath our flag. He is America's magnificent contribution to the manhood of the race and to the civilization of the earth. We can afford to make this exception in his favor, and the unanimous judgment of the people will be that we have done well to make the exception. No other man in the Republic could ask such a commission, and no other should be granted it. We shall certainly make a sad mistake if we fail to adopt the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I want only just one minute. Notwithstanding the fact that my conviction is firmly in favor of the volunteer system, that issue has been fairly and squarely drafted in the bill, and I do not think it ought to be disturbed by a general provision authorizing the call for volunteers in separate brigades or divisions. And if we do agree to adopt the volunteer system we ought to agree to adopt it under some specific provision of law, as is done in section 3. I think it ought to be specific under the law, and for that reason I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as to read as follows.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of page 2 insert the following:

"The President is further authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment, to organize and equip not to exceed one Infantry division, the officers of which shall be selected in the manner provided by paragraph 3 of section 1 of this act: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organization of the Regular Army: And provided further, That no such volunteer force shall be accepted in any unit smaller than a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment before the House is displaced by the amendment which is now at the desk and which is the amendment now to be voted on. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 153.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DENT and Mr. AUSTIN took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 106, noes 170.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Third. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to call for 500,000 volunteers under and in accordance with the act of Congress approved April 25, 1914, in so far as said act is not in conflict with any of the provisions of this act. That said act of April 25, 1914, is hereby amended so as to give to the President full and complete authority to refuse to accept and to discharge from the service any and all persons designated in section 3 of this act. That in the event it becomes necessary to raise an additional force of 500,000 men as specified in subdivision 4 of this section, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to call such additional force by volunteers in the same manner. Such volunteer army shall be apportioned among the various States and Territories and the District of Columbia according to population, raised in regimental units or parts thereof in addition to the National Guard in such States and Territories and the District of Columbia already authorized by law: Provided, That such volunteer forces shall be recruited in local units as far as practicable and company officers may be appointed from such units upon passing such reasonable and practicable examination as to fitness as the President may direct. All other officers to be appointed as specified in this paragraph. That upon the completion of the enrollment as provided in this act, and in the event the President decides that such additional force or forces shall not have been effectually raised and maintained under the call for volunteers as herein provided, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to raise by draft as herein provided, organize and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men, or such part or parts thereof as he may at any time deem necessary, and to provide the necessary officers, line and staff, for said force and for organizations of the other forces hereby authorized, or by combining organizations of said other forces, by ordering members of the Officers' Reserve Corps to temporary duty in accordance with the provisions of section 38 of the national-defense act approved June 3, 1916; by appointment from the Regular Army, the Officers' Reserve Corps, from those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903 (35 Stat. L., 775), from the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, from those who have been graduated from educational institutions at which military instruction is compulsory, or from those who have had honorable service in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or in the Volunteer forces, or from the country at large, by assigning retired officers of the Regular Army to active duty with such force with their rank on the retired list and the full pay and allowances of their grades; or by the appointment of retired officers; and enlisted men, active or retired, of the Regular Army as commissioned officers in such forces: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organizations of the Regular Army: And provided further, That officers with rank not above that of colonel shall be appointed by the President alone, and officers above that grade by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Page 3, line 8, after the word "accept," insert the word "in."
Page 3, line 12, after the word "fourth," insert the word "four."
Line 17, after the word "population," insert the word "and."
Line 19, strike out the word "already" and insert the word "now."
Line 24, strike out the word "to" and insert the word "shall."
Page 4, line 1, strike out the word "enrollment" and insert the word "registration."
In same line, after the word "in," insert the words "section 4 of."
Line 4, strike out the words "and maintained."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire at this time to offer a substitute for the amendments to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. A substitute for the entire paragraph?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it is in order to dispose of the committee amendments first.

Mr. MANN. The committee amendments have to be disposed of first, but this is in order at any time.

Mr. AUSTIN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON. But we are entitled to a separate vote on each one of the committee amendments.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; but the gentleman has a right to offer a substitute and have it pending.

Mr. CANNON. I submit the first committee amendment is to be acted upon as a single proposition.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, if that is so, the substitute would come after this amendment is disposed of. He could offer an amendment to the first committee amendment perhaps if he desired.

Mr. MANN. I will say to my colleague he can offer the substitute at any time. That is pending. The first original paragraph has to be perfected by disposing of the amendment to that.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman desires the committee amendments settled en gros?

Mr. MANN. Nobody has asked for it.

Mr. CANNON. It will have to be by unanimous consent if the substitute is now offered to the committee amendments.

Mr. MANN. He is not offering it to the committee amendments, but to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is offered. The committee amendments will be acted upon and the substitute will be acted upon in relation to the paragraph as affected by the committee amendments.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the committee amendments.

Mr. MANN. Let the substitute be reported first.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have an amendment I desire to offer to section 3 on page 3, and I wish to offer my amendment before I am cut off with this motion to vote upon the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will not be cut off. He will have ample opportunity in which to offer his amendment. The Clerk will now report in order the committee amendments.

Mr. MANN. The substitute has not been reported.

Mr. CANNON. What is the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the substitute for the paragraph, offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 3, lines 1 to 25, and page 4, lines 1 to 6, strike out the following:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to call for 500,000 volunteers under and in accordance with the act of Congress approved April 25, 1914, in so far as said act is not in conflict with any of the provisions of this act. That said act of April 25, 1914, is hereby amended so as to give to the President full and complete authority to refuse to accept in and to discharge from the service any and all persons designated in section 3 of this act. That in the event it becomes necessary to raise an additional force of 500,000 men, as specified in subdivision 4 of the section, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to call such additional force by volunteers in the same manner. Such volunteer army shall be apportioned among the various States and Territories and the District of Columbia according to population and raised in regimental units or parts thereof in addition to the National Guard in such States and Territories and the District of Columbia now authorized by law: Provided, That such volunteer forces shall be recruited in local units as far as practicable and company officers may be appointed from such units upon passing such reasonable and practicable examination as to fitness as the President may direct. All other officers shall be appointed as specified in this paragraph. That upon the completion of the registration as provided in section 4 of this act, and in the event the President decides that such additional force or forces shall not have been effectually raised under the call for volunteers as herein provided, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am informed by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] that his proposition is to amend paragraph 3 instead of presenting a substitute for the entire paragraph. I suggest that he withdraw his amendment, so that the committee amendments can be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that this was a substitute. The Clerk will report the committee amendments in their order.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, there is no disagreement in the committee on the subject of the amendments. They are merely to perfect the language. I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be considered as adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the committee amendments may be voted on en bloc. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments which have been reported to the House coming from the committee.

The committee amendments referred to were agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Now the gentleman from California offers his amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. And, Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will be recognized first, as a member of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Let the amendment be read again, Mr. Chairman, because, for one, I have not followed the proposed amendment of the gentleman from California. I want to follow it in connection with the language of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from California will again be read.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I asked the Chair a few minutes ago whether, after the disposition of the amendments offered by the chairman of the committee, I would have an opportunity to offer an amendment to this section and have that opportunity in advance of the substitute offered by the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it was put that way. The gentleman said he had an amendment. The Chair said he would have an opportunity to offer it. Of course, if the gentleman from California should offer an amendment, under the rules of the House he would have that right.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It was so stated at that time, as I understand it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. AUSTIN. My amendment has no reference to the substitute offered by the gentleman from California, but has to do with the original of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It is an amendment to some other portion of the paragraph?

Mr. AUSTIN. This amendment that I propose to offer can not be offered as a substitute for the amendment that the gentleman from California offers. It applies simply and alone to the volunteer system carried in this section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman's amendment will not be affected by the amendment of the gentleman from California?

Mr. AUSTIN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. If not, then you would be entitled to offer it. Of course the recognition must go ordinarily first to a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. AUSTIN. My amendment is to the original.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, is not the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] entitled to a preference in offering an amendment to perfect the paragraph, whereas the amendment of the gentleman from California is to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course if the matter to which the gentleman from California offers an amendment will be stricken from the bill as the result of the amendment of the gentleman from California, and the gentleman from Tennessee has an amendment which proposes to affect that original matter, his amendment would be in order now.

Mr. MANN. The amendment of the gentleman from California is offered and should be reported first. Then the gentleman from Tennessee, before that amendment is voted on, is warranted in offering a preferential motion to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. That is precisely what the Chair was trying to develop.

Mr. MANN. So I supposed.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Tennessee has a perfecting amendment, he will have the opportunity to offer it. The Clerk will again report the amendment of the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. I notice, so far as the language of the amendment of the gentleman from California was read, that his amendment contains the original language that was stricken out by the committee. For instance, the word "enrollment" is used in his amendment, whereas we have just voted on and adopted the language "registration." What effect will the adoption of the gentleman's amendment have on the vote we have just taken on the committee amendments? His amendment changes the original language of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. And other language?

Mr. KAHN. No. My amendment strikes out everything on page 3 excepting the word "third," and on page 4, lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, and up to the syllables "thorize," including the syllables "thorize" on line 6, and leaves the rest of the paragraph intact.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that bring you down to line 11, on page 4?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; line 6.

Mr. KAHN. Line 6. The last two syllables of the word "authorize."

Mr. BRITTEN. It capitalizes the word?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from California is to strike out and insert?

Mr. KAHN. No; just to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the first motion?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the gentleman from Tennessee has an amendment designed to perfect that language that you propose to strike out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair state what the amendment of the gentleman from California is?

The CHAIRMAN. It is to strike out this part of the paragraph, is it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has not been stated from the desk yet just what is proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; it is proposed to strike out all on page 3 and then on page 4, down to line 6; that is, down to the words "to raise," in line 6. The motion of the gentleman from California is to strike out that matter in the paragraph, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] has an amendment.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is going to have the amendment reported. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is to perfect the language which is proposed to be stricken out, and the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee will be reported from the desk.

Mr. AUSTIN. It is to insert, after the word "law," in line 20, page 3, the following——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 3, by inserting, after the word "law," in line 20, the following:

"Provided, That credit be given to each congressional district for the total number who volunteer or have volunteered under the provisions of this act: And provided further, That if the quota assigned each congressional district has not been furnished within 30 days after the call for volunteers, the President shall proceed to enforce the drafting provisions of this act in such district."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to withdraw my first amendment and to substitute another in place of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to withdraw his first amendment and to substitute one in its stead, which will be read from the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all of page 3, after the word "third" in line 1, and on page 4, down to and including the word "authorized," in lines 5 and 6.

Mr. DENT. And I suggest to the gentleman that the word "to" ought to begin with a capital letter.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to strike out the language indicated.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman from California desire to be recognized on his amendment now?

Mr. KAHN. I do not desire to address the committee on my amendment. The matter has been discussed for four days. By striking out this language it leaves the section so that it will provide for an additional army of 500,000 men, who shall be brought to the colors of the country under a system of selective draft. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. One moment, Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] proceeds. I do not care to address the committee on this subject. The announcement was made that a number of gentlemen on both sides of this question had been prevented from discussing it during the general debate, for one reason and another, and I would like to see if we can get some understanding that the debate may run on this proposition until those gentlemen have had a chance to be heard.

Mr. KAHN. I have no objection.

Mr. DENT. Personally I am ready for a vote, but I would like to accommodate these gentlemen who have not had an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. MANN. How many are there?

Mr. DENT. I see a number of gentlemen holding up their hands.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. LANGLEY. I judge from what I can hear that about the same number of gentlemen are crying "Vote" who have had a chance to be heard in general debate.

Mr. MANN. It is half past 5 o'clock. Can we not reach an agreement that debate on this proposition may continue until half past 7 or 8 o'clock—that there shall be no vote before 8 o'clock?

Mr. KAHN. I have no objection.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HARDY. Those who have been heard ought not to ask to be heard again.

Mr. CANNON. I think this amendment will dispose of the contest as to whether we shall have a selective draft or whether it shall first be by volunteers. I myself would like to have 15 or 20 minutes upon that proposition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] be permitted to address the committee for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire if some arrangement can be made now so that those who have not had an opportunity to speak upon this question can be accommodated? While other gentlemen have had that opportunity, I and several Members of the House have been concerned at the Agricultural Department on the food question. Now, we would like to have an opportunity to discuss this matter.

Mr. HARDY. Cutting out those who have already spoken.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the House is the request for unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] may have 20 minutes in which to address the House. Is there objection?

Mr. HULBERT. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Regular order! If anyone wishes to object, let him object.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Now, if my colleague will yield, may we have an understanding that there will be no vote before 8 o'clock, and give everybody a chance to talk who wishes to do so? We do not get into a war every day.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman couple with that the proposal that those who have not already spoken shall have preference over those who have been heard?

Mr. MANN. I think the Chair will take care of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will try to do so.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that we have an understanding that there shall be no vote until 8 o'clock, and we might run later.

Mr. LANGLEY. That would not close the matter at 8 o'clock.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, of course I have no objection——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Is it not a fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was recognized for 20 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then I insist on the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. This is proceeding with the consent of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. But not with the consent of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The House can not hinder the gentleman from allowing it to proceed in his time.

Mr. CANNON. I hope it is not proceeding in my time.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has the floor, and with his consent the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is endeavoring to submit a request.

Mr. DENT. I ask unanimous consent that debate on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] run until not later than 8.30 to-night.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Nine o'clock.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman had better ask unanimous consent that there be no vote before that time.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is to submit the request of the gentleman from Alabama. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] requests——

Mr. DENT. And I couple with that, Mr. Chairman, the further request that there shall be no vote on this amendment prior to half past 8 to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate shall proceed not later than half past 8 to-night. Is there objection.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Reserving the right to object, why does not the gentleman from Alabama extend the time so as to give everybody an opportunity to speak, in order to have a vote on this proposition to-morrow afternoon? If we do not do that we will be in the same position to-morrow as we are now, and we might as well wind it up to-night.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if it is the intention to have the House sit late to-night?

Mr. DENT. It was not my intention, and that is why I made the request that debate should proceed until half past 8.

Mr. MANN. Why not make this request, that the vote shall be taken to-morrow immediately after the House goes into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and then stay here to-night and continue the debate without fixing a limit?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I make that request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the vote on this amendment be taken immediately after the House goes into Committee of the Whole to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if that includes all amendments on the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The request is made with reference to the pending amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Alabama will yield——

Mr. DENT. I yield.

Mr. KAHN. I think it best to advise the House that under the parliamentary situation it is advisable that this bill be passed by the House before 6 o'clock to-morrow. The Senate has agreed to vote before midnight to-morrow, and if we have no action in the House before that time the Senate bill will come here and will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House. The House bill will be reported to the Senate and will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate. In other words, the two Houses will be compelled to take up the bill of the other House and we will have this whole fight to make over again.

Mr. MANN. I think we can finish this bill to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the vote on the pending amendment be taken immediately after the House goes into Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. HASTINGS. Reserving the right to object, does that contemplate that anything else will be considered to-night, any other amendment to any other part of the bill?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. FOSTER. That includes all amendments?

Mr. MANN. We could not do that; but there seems to be a consensus of opinion that those of us who stayed last night until we adjourned this morning might get away a little earlier to-night. The gentleman from Alabama said he would not ask us to stay later than half past 8 o'clock.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman from Alabama will yield, I want to say that this is the only proposition in the bill over which there is any controversy. After we have passed this point it will only take a short time to dispose of the bill, and I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that inasmuch as there are so many men who would like to be heard, that he make his request that no vote shall be taken on this proposition before half past 2 to-morrow afternoon. [Cries of "No!" "No!" "No!"]

Mr. BARNHART. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I demand my right to address the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POU. Is it the understanding that the session to-night will be devoted entirely to debate, and that no vote will be taken on any amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to quite a number of speeches in the short time that I have been in the House during the progress of this debate. I have listened to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] and to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. Most of the week I have been, by order of the House, practically in the committee room helping to prepare legislation for the consideration of the House in the early future. I do not know that I can add much to what has been said. Possibly I have heard the matter presented fully by the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Alabama. I am not going to pledge my devotion to the United States. It is not necessary that I should do so. [Applause.] Nor am I going to impugn the motives or the patriotism of any Member upon either side of the House who does not agree with me. I think we are all equally patriotic.

As I see it, the whole matter in dispute touching this bill is as to whether we shall primarily, without further notice, proceed to take a census and to draft from the people, subject to the operation of this bill, a sufficient number of citizens to service with the colors, cutting out from the time this bill passes further enlistments to the colors. Am I correct in that?

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman understands that the only volunteer enlistments that will be left is to fill up the National Guard to the war strength and to fill up the organization of the Regular Army to the war strength.

Mr. CANNON. That is my understanding of it, and it is confirmed by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. In reference to the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut, I call the attention of the gentleman to the provision in the bill that authorizes the President to consolidate them all in one army at once, and there will be no vacancies to fill up.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; before the units are full the President can consolidate if this bill passes. He can take the National Guard and consolidate regiments and companies that are not full at once, when this bill passes. That is my understanding of it, and by the silence of every one I am convinced that I am right.

Mr. Chairman, my investigations for a week past in committee—and I think I am not to be censured for making this statement—shows that 500,000 men can not be equipped for service after you get them, including the equipment, for at least six months, and I am not sure but nine months will be required. That would be the first 500,000 that are to be authorized by this bill. So that I do not know but that we better proceed with the volunteering as it is progressing now while we are getting ready to draft if the volunteers are not forthcoming and we are providing the material for the increase—clothing and the munitions and the arms. I just put that to you as a practical proposition. When this bill passes the whole matter of volunteering, except in the Regular Army, ceases. That is my understanding of it. This bill as it was reported from the committee provides that immediately upon its passage the President may call for volunteers, and volunteering will proceed. How fast American citizens may volunteer I do not know. I am somewhat enthusiastic, and I believe that before we could possibly take a census for a draft the volunteering would have proceeded to a point where the draft would be rendered unnecessary. [Applause.]

Let us not be thin-skinned. Some gentlemen on one side have said that to be drafted at any time is a disgrace. I do not agree with that proposition. The people who are in favor of legislation that will stop volunteering will say, "Oh, if the volunteering fails in whole or in part to fill up the requirements of the country, to prosecute this war, and you have to draft, then all who are drafted will be disgraced." I do not think so. Nay, nay. I do not think gentlemen were in good faith and were frank in stating that to the House, and I question whether they really believed what they said touching the matter.

My own judgment is that when this bill passes and the volunteers are called for, as they could be at once, if volunteers do not come at once, the census for the draft being taken in the meantime, with the knowledge that there will be a draft, from that very standpoint I think people who will be subject to that draft will be satisfied that it is necessary for the citizens of the United States, for the protection of the flag and to perform our duty—they are not sure about it now—to volunteer and thus not put the Government to the trouble of drafting. Perhaps I am mistaken about that, but it can not do any harm to try it, can it? [Applause.]

Much has been said about public sentiment. The telegrams and letters we receive and the newspaper articles we read. I think, might be likened frequently to the thunder that comes when there are but few clouds and is not followed by rain, and we are apt to mistake that thunder for a storm or a hurricane. [Laughter and applause.] In the earlier days of my services in this House I was frequently frightened in that way. My God, how sentiment runs! I would be frightened because I might get a dozen telegrams in a day. A tolerably vigorous campaign, I think, has been carried on on the part of somebody. I have not had a dozen telegrams from what they call pacificists. Nay, nay. They have kept quiet, so far as I am concerned, but I must have received as many as 30 or 40 substantially in response to this little printed memorandum, which I will read to you, as follows:

Support the President. Pacificists, slackers, and proenemy agents are inundating Congress with letters and telegrams. If you do not want this anti-American propaganda to succeed, write or telegraph to your Senators and your Congressmen to support the President. Do not wait, but do it now.

I just mention that—not to abuse anyone, of course. The American citizen has a right to communicate with his Senator and Representative. The right of petition is secured to him. He has the privilege of writing letters and sending telegrams, but I have served long enough in this House to know that the round robin that comes to us has been inspired by somebody, and generally a very few bodies. So that I am no longer frightened. I used to be frightened when I was a small kid if I heard an owl hoot in the forest. It is an awfully lonesome sound! Of course, I am not comparing these people to owls.

They have the right to petition, but we would be foolish indeed to take for granted, if you please, that the letters or petitions amount to anything more than the mere opinion of the individuals who send them, although they profess generally to speak for a whole State. [Laughter.] Why, do you know I have received a number of telegrams in the last week, covering two Sundays, last Sunday and the Sunday before, inspired by resolutions passed by churches, and they are all of the same tenor. I fancy that Hobson or ex-Gov. Hanly or some of these people must be getting up a propaganda. These telegrams run about as follows: Oh, for the protection of the flag and the country and for efficiency, pass a law, and do it now, to stop the making of liquors.

They want us to pass a prohibition law for the sake of efficiency. Well, there are about 200,000,000 gallons or more of whisky in bond. It ought to bring, if we put another dollar a gallon tax on it, $300,000,000 for the Treasury. I am not in the whisky business. I never drank a gallon of whisky in my life, put together, but, after all, I suppose they will take it out of bond if we do not pass a law prohibiting it. I only refer to that to show how easy it is, if you do not understand it, to get up all kinds of petitions and letters and so forth. I wish now to speak a little word about the publishers of the United States. I am not speaking of the editors; I am not speaking of the correspondents, for they are the people who write the articles and who send the dispatches; but the real fellow is the publisher, and publishing is the second industry in the United States. My God, how they do watch the advertising columns [laughter], for they furnish the money, you know, and they have a right to, I suppose; but I wish they would just say when they write these editorials and when the correspondents send these dispatches that they are doing this at the command of the owners. So much for that.

Now, much has been said about the failure of the volunteer system—much has been said. I lived through the period of the Civil War. Do you know how many men were drafted in that war? I have got it here. There were 43,000 drafted; 73,000 furnished substitutes; 83,000 paid the $300 commutation. The 43,000 were drafted and the 73,000 served, so it yields 116,000 men.

Mr. HOWARD. One hundred and ninety-nine thousand in all.

Mr. CANNON. This comes from The Adjutant General's office—116,000 which were added to the Army. What were the enlistments? In round numbers 2,200,000 who volunteered. Oh, well but that 116,000 which were added—oh, they were slackers and dodgers. No; some of them may have been. They were probably men of families and from one reason or another did not feel called upon to go. You know there has to be somebody to raise the corn crop, to raise the cotton, and somebody to raise the provisions, and somebody to operate the railroads, and all of that. They can not all fight. Now, in my judgment, and it is after something of an investigation, the great block of those people who were drafted were performing valuable service in that great struggle to preserve the Union. Yet my good friend from California [Mr. KAHN]—oh, he says, "That is of little consequence; volunteering was a failure." Over 2,200,000 men enlisted, and enough of them reenlisted to make 2,800,000 in that great struggle, if you count the reenlistments—the best soldiers who ever made an army since the sons of God shouted for joy at creation's dawn up to that time. [Applause.]

Now, what is the use of sneering at them? I think my friend did not intend to sneer at them, but I wish he would look over his speech when it goes in the RECORD to-morrow and mark out some things that were put in. That great army, or that part of it that followed Grant to Appomatox and down on the Atlantic coast, there never was a better army in the tide of time than that army was, and a volunteer army. [Applause.] So it was not a failure. Let us be honest with ourselves. Well, but they say, some of these slackers will not go. Well, I know a capitalist, and I was told to-day they were employing a press agent, who belongs to one of these organizations and there seems to be many of them. They have got this kind of an organization and they have got a security organization and they have got this board and that board and the other board, self-constituted. [Laughter.] Well, I picked it up and here is so much and this is so much and the other so much, and I read it. I do not know more than one-tenth of them probably, but from my knowledge of some of them they had better pull the beam out of their own eyes before they undertake to pull the mote out of the eyes of most of their fellow citizens by denouncing them as slackers. [Applause.] I have received telegrams; I have got one here from a Chicago man; I will not give his name—a manufacturer. He had read the Senate bill; he had read the bill that if the volunteers are stricken out and it is to be written into law where the exemptions are from 19 to 25, and I asked a man whom I knew was acquainted with the individual, "Do you know So-and-so?" "Yes." "Well, what is the matter with him?" "Why, he has got some boys that the Government would exempt under the Senate bill—one or two of them over 26, and he has got one boy under 17." "Well," I said, "where does the old man come in?" "No; he would not come in, but these kids do." "That would not make him send me this telegram." "Oh, no; but you see he is the employer of several hundred men, and he thinks that under the power of the President to draft by this proposed legislation, whether we have volunteering or not, that they might come under the exemption of people in industrial occupations." And by the way, the Senate bill, I notice, which is the Staff bill, as I am informed and believe, goes a little further than the House bill, which exempts the industrial people but does not by word exempt the farmers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am nearly through. Now, if the amendment of the gentleman from California fails we will have volunteering until the draft census can be taken, and then we will not have to draft if the volunteers are sufficient. [Applause.] I hope they will be. Does it cost anything? No; it does not cost anything. You can call for volunteers without taking a census, and this bill might pass on a Monday, and the call could be made on a Tuesday as it provides. As a matter of fact it would probably take a week to issue the call, because we have got to find out how many people the President is going to exempt under the selective volunteering or the selective drafting; both of them are selective. He can exempt the farmers—one-third of the people. Do you know—and I just want to stop a minute and then come back, because I happen to have the thought now—I believe that we can do more good in this great struggle by feeding ourselves, by feeding our allies, by furnishing them munitions, and by strengthening our Navy, from every standpoint, than we can by sending our Army across the sea before it is properly drilled and prepared for the service.

Somebody will say, "Why, CANNON, I guess you do not want any army to go there." Oh, I do not want an army of my fellow citizens to go to the other side unless they will do more good than harm. [Applause.] If it is necessary to go in order to protect the honor of the flag, the safety of the home, then I am not afraid but that they will go. But they have got to be prepared in order to go. We are so busy making munitions for our allies that we can not utilize the private factories without canceling great contracts where they need munitions, though we can utilize the Government-owned factories.

So let us keep our heads. It does seem to me, however, that the gentleman from California in his closing remarks had something in view which was, in his opinion, bigger than this war and to last longer than this war. I believe I do not misquote him when I say that he said that he wanted a policy now entered upon that in the future would produce a condition where we would have no need for volunteers, but that we would call for the citizens by conscription so that we could get rid of the slacker. There are slackers now and then, but, my God, I do not believe there are as many slackers in the United States as there are thieves. [Applause.] That is my judgment about it. I have not taken any census. [Laughter.]

Why, if you sit down and think about it in cold blood, this slacker proposition appears ridiculous. It is easy to say "slacker." But can you point him out? "Well," says somebody, "your volunteer proposition is going to fail." No; it will not! No; it will not! The boys that come here and fill up our hotels and boarding houses, go to Chicago, go to New York, and to Boston, the boys that have been to military schools, the boys that have been to college, with a little bit of training, come as the winds come, do you not see, to go into the reserve class to be ready to be commissioned as officers? Now, I have no doubt they ought to be officers. I have no doubt many of them will be.

Well, how about your people that are going to volunteer? Let me tell you something. I said that I was older than most of you. Let me read you an extract from a letter from one of the foremost citizens of my county, and I have received five or six letters like it, two of the men having been in the War with Spain and two of them down on the border:

We believe that the present apathy in recruiting is due to the fact that men are not disposed to go into service in strange units under strange officers. There is a mutual responsibility between privates and officers who come from the same community and will go back to the same community to live in civil life after the war is over.

[Applause.]

It is natural. You may wipe out State lines, but you can not destroy that feeling. Why, I was almost scared when I heard the eloquent gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] talk about the failure of the volunteer system for the Civil War. He said, "What about the mother whose five sons were killed, to whom Lincoln wrote the letter? Oh, what a shame that was. The five sons ought not all to have gone." It may be true. Why they went I do not know. They evidently were patriotic. But stop and think a minute. The Representative from California did not live in central Illinois, as I lived; was not conversant with southern Ohio or central or southern Indiana; did not know about Missouri; did not know about Kentucky. Why, Lincoln had to go slow, with the immigration coming from the Southland, as it did, and settling up along the border of the free States. There they had their sympathies with the home people from whom they came and their prejudices against the African. They were divided nearly half and half. Battles were fought in Illinois and in Indiana, not as severe as some, but quite severe, and many men were killed and many men assassinated. I will not say that anybody laid in wait for them and assassinated them, but I am referring to the conduct of men where members of the Anglo-Saxon race disagree. Why, gentlemen, Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois went Democratic, you know, and legislatures were Democratic. I do not wish to speak disrespectfully or revive any heartburnings, but they called them "copperheads" in that time. In Indiana they refused appropriations to carry on the State government, and Gov. Morton had to pledge his own credit and that of his friends in order to get the money to carry on a State until 1864.

How would a draft have resulted at that time? And, yet, when Lincoln called for soldiers, substantially during the whole of the war, in 1861 and 1862 and 1863, the only draft that was had in Illinois was in 1863, and but a very small number were drafted then. The volunteers came from the other half of the population that stood with Lincoln. [Applause.]

Now, you have got to have sentiment. The gentleman from California read to you what George Washington said. He read the letters that George wrote, under different conditions than now exist, and he spoke about the letters that Thomas Jefferson wrote. [Laughter.] In those times of the revolution for our liberty there were less than 3,000,000 people in the colonies, and a large percentage of those were Tories.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illionis has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 minutes more.

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; we are getting information that we may not have a chance to get elsewhere. Let the gentleman proceed without limitation.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. CANNON. Why, the gentleman from California was not contemporary with Washington and Jefferson and was, if living during our Civil War, but a mere child. [Laughter.] He did not know that the Chicago Times and the Pomeroy papers—one in Wisconsin and one in Illionis—were outrageously abusing President Lincoln. He did not know that the St. Louis Republic and other papers on the border line—the principal papers in Indianapolis, Democratic papers—he did now know that the New York Herald, the New York World, and other metropolitan papers were abusing President Lincoln. If you will turn back upon those files and read them, where they denounce Lincoln as a mountebank and a perjurer, you would find that by means of every possible word in the language that could heap opprobrium upon him they were abusing him. The gentleman from California did not know that, finally, when the draft had to go into the great city of New York there were riots. Yes. But, my God! if you had tried to draft there in the first year of the war it would have been very sad, indeed, so far as the city of New York was concerned.

I am not abusing those people. They acted according to their lights. The gentleman from California did not know all those things. I think that the assembling of those volunteers, 2,200,000 strong—most of them, more than two-thirds of them, being under the age of 20—in the northern Army under all those conditions in that great struggle was the most marvelous happening, so far as I know, in all the tide of time. [Applause.]

Now, when you go down South you had the same thing. You were devoted to the Confederacy, even more so than we were to the Union up North—to the United States. You did not have much trouble down there. Some of the people in North Carolina did not want to secede, but they all went. West Virginia furnished some soldiers in the northern Army. Kentucky and Missouri furnished soldiers for both armies. But you did not have any trouble in Alabama or Georgia or Mississippi or Florida or in South Carolina. No; no. You were much more nearly a unit in the Southland than we were in the Northland, and while you did not have a great population, as we had, your colored people, being about 4,000,000, took care of the women and children and raised the provisions. If they had not done it, the war would not have lasted anything like four years. I think those colored people are a kindly people. You understand them better than we do. They are the principal labor that you have down there. But I repeat, you were more nearly a unit than we were. By volunteering and, if you choose, by drafting—you know about it better than I do—it was a saying that you took your army from the cradle to the grave. But we, with greater number and greater wealth and greater resources, prevailed, I thank God, and you thank God, and so that it is all behind us. So that it does not lie in the mouth of the gentleman from California or in the mouth of any other man to say that the volunteer system was a failure during that war for the Union. [Applause.]

Now, in conclusion, I shall vote against this amendment that the gentleman from California offers. [Applause.] I am willing to let this volunteer system be tried between this and the time that the President can conclude his census for a draft. And if this is done I am satisfied there will be no necessity for draft. [Applause.] That is all I want to say. I thank you, gentlemen, for your attention. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized for half a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks recognition for 30 seconds. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would like to be recognized, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of inserting in the current debate some telegrams.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the matter indicated may be inserted in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. The statement has been made on the floor of the House, and denied as well, that great financial interests were back of the propaganda for the selective draft and furnishing the money for the flood of telegrams which have been pouring in on Members of the House and Senators the last few days. Perhaps these telegrams will throw some light on the activities of eastern banking interests and the Kansas City Clearing House Association:

KIOWA, KANS., April 26, 1917.

Hon. DANIEL R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
Washington, D. C.:

"Please telegraph your Senator and Representative, also D. R. ANTHONY, at Washington, urging them to vote for the selective draft bill. Congress can not realize western sentiment. We believe it the patriotic duty of all Americans to express convictions at this time. Please deliver copy to each bank in your city, also to business men, urging prompt action at our expense, if necessary."

The above message was sent to the banks in this vicinity by the Kansas City Clearing House Association; and the men in Kiowa who yesterday wired the Kansas Representatives to support the bill, not one, so far as I know, will come within the provisions of the draft law, nor have they a child that will. Wire if you desire petition against bill.

E. W. MERCER.

CONCORDIA, KANS., April 24, 1917.

Hon. DANIEL R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
Washington, D. C.:

Eastern banks are wiring Kansas bankers to wire Congressmen at their expense to support the conscription bill. The fellows who make the loud noise are not expecting to be drafted. Ninety per cent of the population of Cloud County think the draft an outrage.

W. H. BEATTY.

LOVEWELL, KANS., April 24, 1917.

Hon. DANIEL R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
Congress, Washington, D. C.:

This bank and entire community is opposed to any conscription or draft bill. Kansas is patriotic to the core, as you well know. You can not faithfully represent your constituents and vote for the bill. This is our reply to the Kansas City Clearing House message urging all banks to wire you to support the bill.

LOVEWELL STATE BANK.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair make to the committee a statement that relates to the interests of the members of the committee. This is intended to apply to those gentlemen who had not opportunity to speak in the general debate. The Chair has about 30 names that have been handed in to him. At 5 minutes apiece that will carry us down to about 9 o'clock. It is the purpose of the Chair to recognize these gentlemen in succession, and, as we are operating under the five-minute rule, only for five minutes each. If the committee desires to extend the time, it is competent for the committee to do so, but it must have in mind that when they do that it will either cut somebody out of recognition or extend the time beyond 9 or 10 o'clock to allow every Member an opportunity to speak.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, will gentlemen who have already spoken in general debate be recognized in their order, or will gentlemen who have not addressed the House be given the preference?

The CHAIRMAN. This does not apply to gentlemen who have already spoken in general debate. It applies only to those who have not spoken.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Chair alternate among the Members who have not already spoken, between those who favor the amendment and those who are against it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not do that exactly, because a considerable number of those who wish to speak are in favor of the Kahn amendment.

Mr. LANGLEY. The Chair can do it pro rata.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state precisely the plan that he will pursue. The Chair has a list that has been handed in by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and he has a list of other gentlemen who came to the desk and asked the Chair to put down their names, and the Chair expects to alternate between these two lists. It would not be exactly right to take first those on the Kahn list or to take first those on the other list. So the Chair will alternate between the lists, recognizing gentlemen in the order in which their names appear, first a name on one list and then a name on the other. That is as fair a method as the Chair can work out.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the Chair state how many there are on the two lists?

The CHAIRMAN. About 30, and if they speak five minutes each that will occupy about two hours and a half.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARLAND. The Chair has stated that he has a large number of names, and that their remarks will probably take a certain length of time. There may be others of us, of whom I am one, who desire to get into the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee will sit, there will be opportunity for every gentleman to speak to-night.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not care to take up the time if I may be allowed to extend.

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee wants to sit till half past 9, there will be no difficulty about everyone getting recognition who wants it. The gentleman has the right to extend if he desires to do so.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to make a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I rise for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. My name is first on the list.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is first on the list of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I understood the Chair to say that he would alternate the recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will do so.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] spoke on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not undertake to alternate between the sides which gentlemen will take in the debate, but he will alternate between the two lists.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am to be recognized next?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is to be recognized after the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understood the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] was to be recognized first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did not get that understanding from the Chair.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No; but I got it from the gentleman who prepared the list.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman who prepared the list could not fix the order of recognition for the Chair. The Chair has already stated, and he will state again, that he has a list handed in by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], on which the names appear in a certain order. He has another list of gentlemen who came to the desk to ask for recognition. The Chair put down the names in the order in which Members asked for recognition, and he is going to recognize first a gentleman on one list and then a gentleman on the other list, and so alternate until all those on both lists have spoken. If any gentleman can suggest a fairer method than that, the Chair will adopt it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think it makes a bit of difference in what order gentlemen speak. This joint debate is simply a test of endurance, and perhaps the youngest of us had better be put at the end of the list.

The CHAIRMAN. If any gentleman who is on the list desires to speak later, he can have the privilege of doing so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am not speaking in the hope of convincing or converting anybody upon this question. I simply wish to express very briefly my own views, and I suppose that is the reason which actuates most of the Members who are now to speak.

I hope no one will misunderstand the enormity of the task upon which the United States has entered. We have shown some appreciation of it in the arrangements that have been made for the financing of the war. There should be no misunderstanding or mistake in the arrangements we will make to supply the men, if that be necessary.

It makes little difference what our experience has been in the past, we should act now upon the light of the information we have at present. I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. [Applause.] Not because I fear that the volunteer system would be a failure, but because I fear that perhaps it would be a success.

Nothing could be more unfortunate than to have a million men taken from the industrial life of the United States and placed in the service with the colors without any consideration whatever given to the line of industries in which they were engaged at the time.

The task upon which we have entered is so great that few can realize it. I have been reliably informed by a man who has been connected with the working out of the matter that 500,000 men with their equipment will fill a train reaching from Washington to the city of Boston.

I have been informed upon absolutely reliable authority that the British Government has 7,000 employees in the civil establishment of the recently established munitions department. Battles and wars are not won to-day by soldiers alone. There is something even more important than the men who do the actual fighting, and that is the organization of our industrial system in such an efficient manner that munitions, foodstuffs, and supplies of every essential character will be available at all times and under all circumstances.

We should not ignore the lessons of the present. Great Britain took back from the trenches 30,000 skilled workers who had volunteered and gone to the front, and she would have sent back many thousand others of the same class if it had not been that they had already passed beyond recall.

In the early stages of this contest the Russian Army, composed of magnificent soldiers, were driven across a great extent of territory by the German Army, not because of lack of courage, not because of lack of capacity in their commanding officers, but because Russia had not been so organized industrially as to supply her men in the field with the necessary munitions to make them effective fighters.

We have something more important than the mere raising of men to fight with the colors. We have the tremendous task of doing what has never yet been done in this country; that is, of so organizing the industrial system of our country that not only will the necessary munitions and supplies and foodstuffs be made available for our own men but so that the supplies that have been going to the allies will not cease to go to them.

Last November I made the statement that there was a world shortage of food. I repeated it in December, and again in February. The statement was ridiculed; but within the last seven weeks Lloyd George has made the announcement that there is a world shortage of food, and he has appealed not only to the people of Great Britain but to the people of all the allied nations to conserve the foodstuffs or the army of the allies will be beaten, not by superior military forces but by inability to feed the armies in the field.

We ought not to make any mistake at this time. I am among those who hope that this war may be of short duration; that before the time we can raise a great force, trained and equipped, the necessity for it may pass. But we must not start upon this undertaking upon any such theory. We must prepare and equip on the theory that it will be a long war; that it will be a hard war; and that not 1,000,000 men but many million men will be required. If we organize upon that theory and if we legislate upon that theory, the duration of the war will be much shortened and losses in life and treasure will be much less than otherwise.

Who should the President of the United States consult as to how to raise an equip an army in the United States if he did not consult and accept the views of the trained military men of the Nation? We have been spending millions every year to train and educate men and equip men for just such an emergency, and the unanimous military judgment of those men is that we should resort to the selective draft system, so that men shall not be taken from positions where it is much more important for them to be in industrial life than in the Army, and only put those in the Army who can be spared for that purpose. I hope that we shall not make the mistake of ignoring at this time expert military opinion, but, like wise men, follow their judgment on military matters. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOWARD). The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a telegram from a constituent of mine in answer to a statement made by my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegram follows:

TERRELL, TEX., April 27, 1917.

Hon. JAMES YOUNG, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

We resent as a reflection upon our patriotism and intelligence statements of Representative MCLEMORE that mass meetings promoted by and resolutions indorsed by commercial organizations in Texas are prompted by propaganda from the American Defense Society. We have never been approached, directly or indirectly, by that organization, and gave you in letter and telegram a true reflection of the sentiment of this community. We respectfully request this message read on floor of House, and read into the RECORD.

BEN F. STOLLENWEIRCK,
Secretary of Terrell Commercial Club.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, we find ourselves in war with a nation having the best organized, the most determined, and the most effective military system that the world has ever known—a system so successful that for more than two years and a half it has defied the combined military power of Great Britain, France, Russia, Italy, Japan, and a number of smaller countries, and now challenges the 100,000,000 American people to a further test of strength.

It is no longer any use to discuss the reason which prompted us to take up arms against Germany. All questions relating to the declaration of the existence of a state of war were put to rest when we took that step. It is sufficient to say that we were forced into war with Germany in the performance of the most elemental function of government, namely, the protection of the citizen. John Fisk never wrote more wisely than when he declared that a nation which fails in this fails so utterly and so completely that it no longer has any excuse for existence whatever. We have therefore gone into this war to perform this simple elemental obligation to the citizen, an obligation which, if omitted, would forfeit the love and affection of our people, and without these no nation can long continue to exist.

When the great war across the sea began, so great was the daily sacrifice of life and treasure that most people believed it could not last more than a few months. It has now gone on for more than two and a half years, with constantly increasing sacrifice of both men and money. We are therefore standing on the threshold of war with a powerful and resourceful nation, which has been in training for war for nearly half a century, and we do not know how long we will be in that war or how much sacrifice we may be called upon to make before it is ended. One thing, however, I think is certain—we will be in the war until we have made America safe for Americans, and until we feel sure that the menace which has threatened us shall not reappear in the future, perhaps more strongly fortified, to threaten the peace of our children. [Applause.]

As the Representatives of this great people we are here considering ways and means to best carry on this war. We are here to-day considering the best method of creating an army of a million men. We are consulting together and searching out the minds and hearts of one another in order that we may arrive at a consensus of opinion as to the best method of raising this great army. It is but natural that there should be differences of opinion among us upon a matter of such great moment. This difference of opinion is not, however, any indication of a difference in patriotic purposes. The majority of the Committee on Military Affairs, headed by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], stoutly maintains the wisdom of retaining the historic volunteer system in raising this army. In defending the volunteer system the majority of the committee is supported by the distinguished Speaker of the House, a man whose patriotism, loyalty, and integrity make him worthy of the high office which he holds. [Applause.] In a notable address yesterday, the Speaker pointed to the fact that volunteers secured our independence from Great Britain; that volunteers won our second war for independence; that volunteers achieved our success in the Mexican War; that volunteers saved the Republic in the Civil War and won the War against Spain. The Speaker pointed to the brave and heroic men who served their country as volunteer officers and privates from the beginning of the Government down to the present hour, and asserted that a system which gave us our independence and sustained us as a Nation should not be lightly set aside. On the other hand the minority of the committee, headed by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has proposed as a substitute for the volunteer system a system of selection born out of the experience of the nonmilitary nations engaged in the great war across the sea. This system of selection is supported by the Commander in Chief of the Army and by practically all of his military and civil advisers. We are called upon to choose between these two systems. No other question of importance presents itself in connection with the legislation before the House.

Whatever system we conclude to adopt, it must not be forgotten that in the end this great army which we propose to raise must be drawn from the homes and the hearths of America. Whether the response be made to a general call for volunteers or to a personal appeal to the individual, those who respond will be the sons of America. [Applause.] This being true, I want this army to be organized, officered, and equipped under that system which will insure the least sacrifice of American life. [Applause.] I do not want to see a single American boy sacrificed upon the altar of an inefficient military system. [Applause.] I have read all the testimony given before the Committee on Military Affairs on this subject. I have read or heard nearly all the speeches that have been made during the course of this debate. I am familiar with the experience of Great Britain in raising armies for this war. I have read history probably as extensively as the average Member of the House. Taking everything together, I have come to the conclusion that in spite of the glories of the volunteer service in days gone by, it has always exacted a heavy toll of human life chargeable to the account of inexperience and lack of knowledge of the art of war. [Applause.] It must be remembered that the volunteer system embraces not only the volunteer soldier but the volunteer officer as well. I do not believe that the two can be separated in actual practice. And to me this is a weakness of the system, inherent in it and incapable of being cured. I know that this bill provides that the President may appoint the officers to command the forces to be raised, but as a matter of practice this provision must be heavily discounted. The men who interest themselves in the several States in organizing companies and regiments in the very nature of things will continue in most cases to command these companies and regiments. In some instances such officers will have but little training or experience in military affairs. Of course, I am not unmindful that some of the most heroic figures in American history have been volunteer officers. I would not take away a single star from their well-deserved crown. Nevertheless I am fully persuaded that during the Civil War thousands of boys were sacrificed because of a lack of experience of those in command during the early years of the war. Some of our best manhood, North and South, sleeps on the hillsides and valleys of the South because of a lack of understanding of the science of warfare on the part of those in command. If possible, we should save our sons from this frightful experience in making our plans for the war in which we have recently entered. [Applause.]

If I had any doubts before upon this proposition, they were dispelled yesterday by the distinguished Speaker, when he gave the reasons advanced by Gen. Grant as to why the South was victorious during the first two years of the Civil War. Like the distinguished Speaker, I am willing to rest this case on the opinion of Gen. Grant, the foremost general of his or any other day. No American knew better than he how to bring into being an efficient fighting force. [Applause.] The veterans that marched down Pennsylvania Avenue at the close of the war, in my opinion, constituted the greatest Army that ever stepped to martial music. [Applause.] You will recall that the reason given by Gen. Grant for the early successes of the South, as pointed out by the Speaker, was that the southern army at the very beginning of the war had the advantage of trained officers, while the armies of the North were under volunteer commands. When the war broke out the officers and men in the Regular Army whose homes were in the South very naturally withdrew from the Regular Army organization. They went back home into the Southern States and organized companies and regiments for the Confederate service. This great body of trained soldiers became, in large part, the teachers and officers of the Confederate army. [Applause.] On the other hand, the officers and soldiers of the Regular Army whose homes were in the North remained in the Regular Army organization, and the volunteer troops which formed the armies of the North were officered largely by volunteers, who at the beginning of the war had little or no Army experience. This is the explanation given by Gen. Grant for the success of the Confederate armies during the first two years of the war, or until the northern armies became trained and skilled in the bitter school of experience and defeat. This is the best illustration of the inherent weakness of the volunteer system that has been furnished in this debate, and proves conclusively that a system which in practice is tied up, not only to volunteer soldiers but to volunteer officers, is not such a system as can be relied upon to meet the trained armies of the most powerful military Government in the world. [Applause.]

To raise an army of a million men to take part in the most destructive war in the history of the world is a horrible thing to contemplate. From this, however, there seems to be no escape. But if we are to call upon the youth of America to defend the flag of the Republic let us see to it that nothing is lacking in guns, provisions, and other equipment, and, above all, let us see to it that they are not lead into battle by men unskilled and inexperienced in the art of war. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Chairman, the President is the Nation's leader, chosen by the people, in possession of all the facts relative to the Nation's safety, and protector of its inheritance, and is the one man in the United States equipped and under the Constitution expected to suggest to us plans for the Nation's defense.

Owing to delicate diplomatic relations of the world, present and future friends and foes, our only safety, present and future, rests in adequate, efficient, and sustained preparedness, both by land and sea.

The present situation affords the apparently innocuous opportunity for such preparedness that will insure our place in the sun whatever the outcome of European troubles.

What was the impelling cause that made our President, in direct opposition to the Republican, Progressive, and Democratic platforms demand of Congress the repeal of the free toll of coastwise trade through the Panama Canal, "else he hardly knew how to handle the delicate diplomatic situation that might arise"? The reason for such action will bear no little consideration in the present crisis, and if the cause is understood will point the necessary great preparedness. As I see the situation, the real threat to the safety and security of the United States also leads back to and explains the Mexican situation. Our slinking home from the Vera Cruz fiasco, hooted by the picayunish nation as gringoes, forced to be content with a salute of 5 guns instead of 21, as we demanded; our meekly withdrawing from Mexico after our soldiers had been shot down in cold blood, our property destroyed, our women outraged; our ignominious submission to the order that we could go any direction except south, east or west—no man thinks it was weak, anarchistic Mexico made us do that. The cause for such action and the insulting attitude of the Mexican people to the United States, had its effrontery in the menace which has so long threatened the United States, impatient for an excuse to break the Monroe doctrine which our President, in his great wisdom would not furnish, realizing our complete inadequacy of defense.

We have less than the strength of one great battleship on our western coast. Our coast fortifications, including the defense of the Panama Canal, have guns that shoot only 23,000 yards, while any up-to-date war vessel carries guns that shoot better than 30,000 yards. Ex-President Taft says 500,000 troops could be landed in Mexico in six weeks.

Artillery and munitions of war are now being made in Mexico by other hands than Mexicans. There are in secret organization in Mexico to-day over 25,000 troops other than Mexican.

If Russia makes peace, and there is no small fear that she may, it is quite possible that a change of alliances in Europe may follow which will further threaten the future safety of America.

What caused our President to say a year ago last February that we were liable to be attacked on both coasts simultaneously?

It took us six months to get 25,000 men on the border. We must have efficiency. We must discard the yoke of oxen for the locomotive system.

The men to-day intrusted with the Nation's heritage should stand unflinchingly, regardless of uninformed public opinion, which can not, owing to the peculiar diplomatic relations existing, have means of ascertaining the real facts and underlying situations that threaten the United States, and I am therefore in favor of unshackling the President and leaving him free to maneuver for the safety of America first among the deceitful web of intriguing diplomacy that beclouds the apparent situation and shall follow the President and the war council in their demand for a selective system, believing that we should profit by the lessons written in the blood of patriots across the sea.

I shall vote for the minority amendment and uphold the hand of the President. Our President must be relied on in this crisis to choose what is best. Slow to get into war, even to the verge of seeming disaster, he has proved his desire for peace. Had he wished for war he had no lack of excuses. And only under the pressure of the future safety of America has he finally taken a stand. He is not proanything but pro-American, and he has taken and is taking, in my judgment, the course to insure the future safety of the United States and the ideals she represents.

The condition of war is not of our making, but has been forced upon us, as it seems to me, by the providence of circumstances, for in no other way could the people have been startled from their commercial apathy to place an insurance policy of adequate preparedness upon the country that will guarantee our future safety when the European pot has ceased to boil.

In unison with the Republican policy, we have repeatedly urged and voted for preparedness. We have been exasperated and appalled at the apparent lethargy in this matter of the Democratic Party to secure our Nation in maintaining and defending its policy of peace. And every understanding heart rejoiced when the President, at last pushed to the verge, came forth on April 2 in his immortal declaration of American ideals and human rights.

He should have the undivided support of every loyal American, for the issue is the Nation, and it is with no little satisfaction that I behold a Republican, the distinguished Member from California, leading the fight for the President and his plans.

It will take at least a year and a half to train and equip the Army contemplated and by that time the war in Europe may be over and we shall have the war equipment necessary to maintain our peace and demand our rights in the adjustment of international affairs.

If not, by the same method we can draw one or two or three millions as the case may require without disturbance of our economic conditions.

If the volunteer system were a success, our Army would now be recruited up to full strength. The unfilled militia and the standing army need about 400,000 men to-day, which affords ample opportunity for all qualified volunteers. Our brush with Mexico taught us with what painful effort a few volunteers are secured. The other day Maine recruited one man. So did South Dakota and one or two other States, while Illinois boasts of 230 men as a great record.

We do not need to look into the past—to Egypt, Greece, Persia—to find how swift is the downfall of the nation which lacks preparedness. We have only to consider the example of England in the present war. With war at her very door, Britain could not make up her mind to universal service. Much valuable time, streams of money, many valuable lives were lost, and the war needlessly prolonged by her hesitation. England began to win when she abandoned the volunteer system. The enemies of universal service predicted riots. There was nothing of the sort in England. No one complains there now that it is undemocratic. The pioneers who dared advocate it are considered the true friends of their country.

It is the skilled worker, the farmer, the mechanic, the railroad man, that the nation can not spare, who first goes to war. Our people and our troops must be fed, clothed, and transported. In England these were the men who volunteered first. The most valuable to the nation were the quickest to respond to her needs. They had to be brought back from the trenches and set to work at their proper tasks again. It would be best that the Government assign each man to the duty for which he is best qualified.

The volunteer system disrupts our industrial foundation, takes the very man who would make our warfare effective. It saves the coward and the slacker, but takes the willing patriot—even the boy of tender years whose enthusiasm carries him away. The selective system will prevent him from entering before he has reached the age of 21, and I would support the bill if for no other reason than that it keeps the boyish hands from being shaped to the gun before they have lost the dimples of childhood, gives opportunity to complete their education and fit them for the battle of life, and does not submit them to the immoral influences of an army before their character is shaped. Why should a boy be required to serve his country before he is a part of that Government by his vote?

Should the public-spirited citizen bear all the taxes? Should we finance the war by voluntary contributions? Why should brave fathers do the work that unmarried slackers should be doing? To oppose the selective system is unnecessarily to condemn brave men to death for a period of ineffective warfare. In a few months, after lives have been wasted and the thing has proven itself a failure, we shall be forced to get down to business.

It is the old instinct of selfishness that fights against the selective system. The word has a horrible sound to the ears of men. Some think it implies that their patriotism has been called in question—that they are denied the right to offer. It is not a lack in the people, but in the Government, that should leave to the will of the people whether it and they should be protected or not. Service is not servitude.

The volunteer system coerces by scornful glances and the finger of contempt. Everyone who does not enlist runs the danger of being considered a slacker. The selective system assumes that all men are patriots. It recognizes the equal liability of all, regardless of station, to answer his country's call. It uses modern census and efficiency methods instead of haphazard choice. All citizens owe to their country in this crisis such service as is most effectual. Under the volunteer plan some go to fight who would render better service if they remained at their jobs; others fail to go who would well be spared.

Universal training is self-preservation. It is worse than murder to send raw troops against trained troops. Universal training will build up an efficient army without sacrifice and with immense benefit to the body and mind of the indivdual. Universal service will provide efficiency in factory, in kitchen, on the farm, and on the railroad as well as at the front, while a graduated tax on incomes and excessive profits will put the burden of the war where it can best be borne and make this an efficient, pay-as-you-go enterprise.

It will do away with divided allegiance and make of us truly a united people.

Our enemies rely upon our rejecting universal service and training. They think we shall not have the courage, in the face of the almost universal disapproval of the people, to take this step. The pacifist element in this country will not have suffered a change of heart or method, even though we are in a state of war. If we adopt the volunteer system, they will do their best to render it a failure. Our enemies openly boast that they can rely on their friends in this country to harass and impede our Government.

Now is the proper time to show that there is no pro-anything party in the United States, except pro-American; that when it comes to America as against any other nation it is America first.

There is no reason that universal service shall be made ruthless. There is wide latitude in this bill for exemption for religious and ethical as well as physical reasons. There are approximately 22,000,000 men between the ages of 21 to 40, so that the greatest latitude can be exercised.

While no one desires war, men differ in their method of avoiding it. Being in, let us bear ourselves that the opposed may beware of us. Pacifist and militarist alike have hoped against hope that something may avert war from our shore. War, however horrible, we have accepted as less horrible than a dangerous peace, an unresisting acceptance of injustice. That being our condition, an army we must have. Let us take the best way to get it, not the worst. The best, most efficient means should be grasped to bring the war to a successful, rapid close.

We are a modern nation. Our life is highly specialized. Civil War conditions no longer confront us. Yet even then conscriptions and large bounties were necessary, though the war was within our own boundaries and our Army lived off the country. Industry was then in its infancy. The miller, the shoemaker, the cabinetmaker, the joiner, in leaving his trade did not break up a chain that would cause a trade snarl. But business in our day requires its scientists. War to-day is a war of nations, and it is vital to our success that our economic conditions be kept normal.

Short is his vision who taunts that our only object is to save big business and the profits of the munition maker, appealing to class hatred and class envy. It takes all of us to make the Nation; it matters not whether we are shooting bullets or making them. It is our duty to protect big business and little business and all business from farm to factory; it is our life we are protecting and the life and comfort and safety of our Army. All honor to the volunteers, but sentiment and tears do not make efficiency and can not win in modern warfare.

If the President could but show the world a united people behind him, to whom love of country should mean more than personal ease or envy, lest they were being exploited, it would be a blow at the very heart of this great conflict. If the spectacle of internal dissension could cease to give aid and comfort to the enemy, it would be the quickest way to end the war. Our present action is to have a most serious effect not only upon this war but also the trouble of our own that looms in the offing.

Citizens of the United States, awake! Be united, for the time of trial that lies ahead. Forget class hatred and class envy in the stern, grim test that is to grip the very vitals of us all. We have been long enough delaying. Let us not hesitate to gird us as strong men should. It is a man's war and men should fight it. The burden should rest equally upon all able-bodied men who vote and enjoy the privileges of this land—the high, the low, the rich, the poor, all stand even before the bar of the selective system. If that is not fair, not right, not just, not democracy, then I have lost the power to judge.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I shall vote for the selective conscript plan to begin at once. I would like to give my reasons very fully, but shall only briefly state a few thoughts, because, though I have tried to get 20 minutes for the last two days, I have been unable to do so, and now have only five minutes. I have heard many fallacious reasons urged in behalf of selective draft, as it seems to me, and I hate to see a just cause founded on a false reason. It has been alleged that the selective draft is equality. No; it is not equality. I would hate to tell the mother who bends above the body of her dead child brought home to her from the battle front, while she sees her neighbor's son in life, that her son had borne but an equal burden when he died that others might live. Neither is volunteering equality. The truth is that both the conscriptive and the volunteering systems rest upon a principle higher than equality of burdens. They both rest upon the principle of duty and a consecration to that duty, and if I were to undertake to defend the conscriptive as against the volunteer plan I would simply say that each and every citizen of our country owes a supreme duty to the land, not especially to fight for it, but to serve it in whatever way he may be able best to serve it, and to leave it to his country to select the way. So I would say that it is the duty of the whole country not to ask this boy and that boy by his sacrifice voluntarily made to consecrate himself—no; but to let the whole country take the baptism of fire and consecrate itself and sacrifice whatever and whoever may be necessary to the cause of humanity and the preservation of its liberties.

The essential thing is victory, and the property, the happiness, the pursuits, the rights, the very life of every individual must be subject to the will and judgment of the Nation to attain that end. If this war were to be fought under conditions prevailing in the past, I would hesitate long before resorting to conscription; but to-day the armies in the field are not all or near all that are concerned. There is a bigger army back behind the lines, the administrative, the industrial army, that feeds and munitions the fighters in the field. To-day the nation that starves must surrender, and the army that is not supplied with munitions approximating those of the enemy must retreat or surrender, and in every walk of life there is a duty connected with the war on every citizen that must be fulfilled. To permit individual men to choose the path that they will take and then appeal to them on the idea of higher duty and higher patriotism involved in going to the trenches is unjust to the individual of proud spirit, and it is to forget that this country is one whole, and like the human body has a proper function for each member. The eye and the hand and the foot and the belly are all essential, and all must work under the direction of the head. To-day he who performs his duty well, though he be far from the front, is doing a no less noble service to his country than he who goes to the front and sacrifices his life. Yet they are not equal—no. He who sacrifices life makes the greater sacrifice. First consecrating itself, the Nation selects the sons whose lives are to be sacrificed, since all can not die, though all be willing to die, and then God in his mercy will accept the sacrifice and a grateful country enshrine it.

I would not say to the mother whose son was taken to bear the Nation's burden that he only bore an equal burden, but I would say to the mother whose son was so taken that he had served his country well; that he did his duty nobly; he died that others might live. I would say to her, "Shed a heartbroken mother's tears on his grave; his country mourns with you." That is all, and at best it is but little, and yet it is better so, because in that way fewer lives will be lost and fewer mothers weep.

If this were a brief war, if it were to last but six months, if we wanted only a few soldiers, I would say take the volunteer system, because that would readily secure all we need to fight, and would take none whose places could not be filled from other places. But this war if it lasts six months is likely to last years, and if it should last three years, after we have begun with an army of volunteers we would have to supplement that by conscription and then you would have the distinction between the volunteer and the conscript, and I want nevermore to hear the word "slacker" applied to an American soldier. I want every American soldier to stand before the world equal in honor and deserving with every other American soldier, and that can only be by commencing in the beginning with the conscription service.

If we start in with that there will be no odium attaching to the conscript. This war is likely to be the greatest war that America ever fought, for if Russia should step out, as she may, then on America's back must be placed the burden, and not 500,000 but five or even ten millions of American sons may be called upon before the war is ended. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

The foregoing are the remarks made by me on the floor of the House. Under leave to extend, I use the privilege of giving more fully and coherently my reasons for my vote. While I voted for the selective draft at the beginning and against a first resort to the volunteer plan, words can not measure my contempt for the criticism that attacks the patriotism of those who favor the volunteer system, or for any critic who charges, as some here and elsewhere have charged, that the volunteer soldier has always been a failure. The man who makes the charge is no true son of America, and every page of our history as a Nation refutes the charge. No stronger, braver, truer, grander soldiers ever lived or died than the volunteer soldiers of America in every war they ever fought. I would like to pay a special tribute to the southern volunteer soldiers in the War between the States who fought for their rights and their homes, but space forbids, and it is not needed. I do not hesitate to say that my sympathies were and are with the volunteer side of the arguments which for days rolled like contending waves through the Halls of Congress, but my judgment was and is the other way.

If war were still, what it has been, a matter mainly of personal initiative, endurance, dash, and bravery, and military strategy, and genius displayed on the battle front, I would hesitate long between the two systems even in the face of the stupendous numbers of men involved in the fighting. We might hope to win before resort to conscription was necessary. But to-day organization back behind the lines, transportation, sanitation, machinery, food, and clothing of the armies and the nations and supplies of all kinds and superiority of arms and equipments will do more perhaps to win than personal valor or military genius.

This war is being fought as much in the inventor's brain, in the workshop, in the laboratory, in the factory, in the mine, and on the farm as it is in the camp, the trench, and on the battle field. The administrative genius that marshals, conserves, and mobilizes the resources and credits of the Nation must uphold and sustain the Army and the Nation. The Army itself becomes but one of the essential parts of the vast machine, and the soldier more and more the dumb servitor of the master engineer. Tactics and strategy have become largely dull brute force in massed obstruction and destruction and construction. Individual initiative, skill, and genius is still an element, but what strategy is there in an explosive shell that destroys the strongest fortification or sinks the greatest vessel with one explosion, or a submarine that hunts its prey in the darkness and security of the deep sea? Destruction must be met by construction and production and greater destruction.

The nation or army that starves must surrender, and the army or navy that can not nearly match its adversary in equipments, in guns, and munitions must surrender or retreat.

On the sea, under the sea, on the land and in the air, at the battle front and back in the home, every limb, every nerve of the body, every capacity of the mind of every individual and every resource of the Nation is to be taxed to the uttermost, and all must be subordinated and coordinated to one supreme end—victory. The more completely this is done the surer and quicker the victory and the lesser the aggregate and ultimate sacrifice and suffering of the Nation.

We are in this war; we must lay our all upon our country's altar. Defeat for us means subjugation and the imposition of unthinkable humiliations and burdens, or at least living for the future in terror of Germany, whose official utterances have more than once expressed her purpose to make her enemies bear the burdens of her own losses by way of indemnities.

Victory means enduring peace and freedom for the world.

There is a hope that the struggle may be ended in six months. If it is not, it will, in my opinion, last years. If Germany should make peace with Russia or with Russia and Italy, as she may, it will last many years or end in a truce to be followed by a more horrible war. Looking, then, squarely into the face of the future and preparing for the worst while hoping for the best, what is our wisest policy? If the best soldier, the best fighter, the best army, up to a limited number, alone were to be considered, I would not hesitate one moment to declare for the volunteer soldier, but the other things I have named must be considered.

I do not try to fool myself or my people by claiming that conscription is placing the burden equally on all or is universal military service. The very words "selective draft" denies the claim of equality or universality, and the illustration so often used, that military service should be compulsory since taxation is, is an unhappy one, since taxation is uniform and universal, and the very idea of selective taxation—taxing a few and exempting the many—would be abhorrent to us all. The principle on which the selective draft must rest is higher than that of equality of burden. It rests solely upon the duty of the citizen, of each and every citizen, to sacrifice his property, his life, if necessary, for the salvation of his country. Neither does volunteer service rest upon the principle of equality. It also rests upon duty and sacrifice for the salvation of the country.

I would not tell a mother whose heart was breaking when her boy lay dead before her that he only bore an equal burden with those who never served in the Army, whether that boy went as a volunteer or by the selective draft, but I would tell her that he served his country at the demand of her highest call, and died a sacrifice that others might live and be free, and if he had borne himself bravely I would ask her to cherish the proud memory of her boy and her sacrifice and know that her country sorrowed with her and was proud of his deeds.

Since, then, the basis of principle is the same in each case, what are the merits and demerits of the two systems? In favor of the volunteer system it may be said that by it—

First. We get the very best soldiers.

Second. We get them quicker.

Third. We get them without friction, because his loved ones blame no one for his taking. These three virtues of the volunteer system only hold good when the numbers required are few and come gladly.

Fourth. The volunteer goes with his friends and preserves more of his individuality and self-respect. He carries with him the pride of his State and community and fights under or by the side of his kinsmen or friends.

Against that system—

First. It always takes of the best at first, and takes none of the worst, the selfish shirkers, and slackers.

Second. It is unjust because it allows a citizen to enjoy all the blessings and refuse to bear the burdens of his Government.

Third. If enough to meet the needs do not gladly come, then badgering and heckling are resorted to, and many, by moral compulsion, are driven to the Army who ought not to go, while the real shirker and slacker still hangs back and remains at home.

Fourth. It casts unjust reproach on those who stay at home because their highest duty and best service require them there.

Fifth. At last when conscription does come—as come it must if the war lasts—it divides our soldiers into two classes, one the volunteer, the other the conscript, with all that that division implies—of pride and bravery in the one and shame and cowardice in the other.

Sixth. Volunteering is more uncertain in its results; less steady and regular in meeting the needs of the service as they arise. A fault fraught with the gravest perils in every great crisis. That this is true all our history teaches.

In favor of the selective draft—

First. It prevents the exclusive sacrifice of the generous and willing.

Second. In a measure it removes the temptation to shirk.

Third. It removes the stigma and odium of coward and slacker from any part of our Army and leaves every soldier to win honor and promotion by doing his full duty under equal conditions with every other soldier.

Fourth. It is slower in the beginning, but more sure and dependable in the end.

Fifth. It creates less disturbance of industries and helps coordinate and conserve all our resources and is more economical.

Sixth. It makes the unwilling shirker take his equal chance to serve and sacrifice for his country.

Seventh. It calls to service, in all the walks of life, military and industrial, and by the same principle all the property and the liberty and life of every individual is held ready for the sacrifice, so that all may and do the better recognize the principle.

Against this system the one great evil is the unavoidable inequality, when one is taken and another left, when one son is sacrificed and another spared, and the heartbreaking that must follow when mother or sister or father or brother must see their loved one chosen for the sacrifice.

It is a fearful thing to doom a man, a boy to die, but war itself proclaims the doom that waits a thousand or a million sons. Would to God there were another way, but there is none. It only remains for the Nation as a whole to say whether her sons must themselves make the choice and immolate themselves or whether the Nation first shall consecrate itself and then for the greatest good and the greatest mercy to all lay its hand on the sons to be taken. In that way fewer lives will be taken, in that way the Nation is stronger, in that way the end comes sooner and victory surer. And since that way must come in the end, better that it come in the beginning.

In all matters relating to it since the great war began in August, 1914, I have tried to think calmly and act soberly, without hysteria, without passion, and always with common sense.

More than ever before do we now need to use to the full sound judgment and common sense in what we do and what we do not do. There are some things we have been doing and are doing we ought to leave off. We ought to leave off every work now that does not add to our strength as a Nation and help us to win this war. I will just instance one. We are spending vast millions to build great battleships. I ask why? What assistance will they be to us in this war? Our allies have naval strength that so far excels the German that it is childish to speak of our present need of a navy. Then why are we using the shipbuilding facilities and labor of our people to build these useless ships? There are many things we ought to do. We ought to produce every article that our skill and all our industry and labor can produce that will help sustain the strength of ourselves and our allied nations, and then we ought to bend all our efforts toward getting the things we produce to our allies who need them.

If I could decide it, no shipyard to-day would be building great war vessels, but they would be building all the weapons our genius can devise to meet the German submarine first, and then they would be building ships to run the German submarine blockade. Applying common sense, I would not build one of these blockade runners with over 5,000 tons carrying capacity, and most of them would be smaller. The submarines can not find a small ship as readily as they can a larger one. They can not see it as far, and it is not so fair and large a target when found for their shells. On the other hand, armed with guns these small ships are as likely to sink a submarine as is the larger ship. Moreover, if a small ship is sunk the loss is only a fraction of what it would be in the case of a larger ship being sunk. Germany has given us a lesson in the building of submersible merchant vessels, and we might build some of these. If the Government gets under it, we can in six months' time build small ships faster than the German submarine can sink them, even if we never find a means to seek out and destroy the submarine. With these small ships we can carry our corn, our meat, our clothing, and our munitions, as well as our soldiers, to Europe. Common sense tells me that is what we ought to be doing.

I have wandered from the subject of conscription, but to a subject related and no less important. What good will our soldiers and our resources do if we can not get them across the water? We are taking over and putting into service to-day all the German ships interned here, nearly a million tons, and that is common sense. We can build millions of tons of these small ships and they, as nothing else can, will save the day for us and our allies, and when the war is ended and when, as I pray God, the nations have leagued together to preserve peace and humanity, these ships will carry the products of our quickened and intensified energies to the still hungry, naked, burdened, and crippled nations of Europe. Peace—peace with justice and humanity is my prayer. While we are at war and in war may we play a man's part—a great Nation's part. But when peace comes then may America, while her own wounds are healing, prove as never before the shadow of a great rock in a weary land to the stricken nations of Europe.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is no opportunity in which to make an extended speech or to enter into a careful discussion of the proposition pending. It is, however, an opportunity for some of us to give a few reasons for the faith which we maintain. I am going to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], for many reasons, the chief of which is, I believe, that it is the only scientific, sensible, and patriotic course this Government can take at the outset of the war. On Tuesday of this week, during this debate, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] endeavored to establish as a proposition that the reason the armies of Greece, small in number, overcame the mighty hosts of Persia was that the Greeks were volunteers, while the Persians were conscripts. I took occasion, offhand, to question the truth of the statement that the Greeks were volunteers. Since that time I have had opportunity to make further inquiry, and I desire to read as a part of my remarks two quotations from the Encyclopedia Britannica, which on historical matters is one of the best authorities in the world:

> In historic times all this is changed. Greece becomes a congeries of city-states, each with its own citizen militia. Federal armies and permanent troops are rare, the former owing to the centrifugal tendency of Greek politics, the latter because of "tyrannies," which must have relied very largely on standing armies to maintain themselves, had ultimately given way to democratic institutions. But the citizen militia of Athens or Sparta resembled rather a modern "nation in arms" than an auxiliary force. Service was compulsory in almost all States, and as the young men began their career as soldiers with a continuous training of two or three years, Hellenic armies, like those of modern Europe, consisted of men who had undergone a thorough initial training and were subsequently called up as required.

Again—

> So much is in common to the various States. In Sparta the idea of the nation in arms was more thoroughly carried out than in any other State in the history of civilization. In other States the individual citizen often lived the life of a soldier; here the nation lived the life of a regiment. Private homes resembled the "married quarters" of a modern army; the unmarried men lived entirely in barracks. Military exercises were only interrupted by actual service in the field, and the whole life of a man of military age was devoted to them. Under these circumstances the Spartans maintained a practically unchallenged supremacy over the armies of other Greek States; sometimes their superiority was so great that, like the Spanish regulars in the early part of the Dutch War for Independence, they destroyed their enemies with insignificant loss to themselves. The surrender of a Spartan detachment, hopelessly cut off from all assistance, and the victory of a body of well-trained and handy light infantry over a closed battalion of Apartiates were events so unusual as seriously to affect the course of Greek history.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have only five minutes, and three of those are gone now.

Mr. HARDY. That hardly applies to Athens.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The first part I read applied specifically to Athens, and was descriptive of the conditions of Athens; the latter altogether to Sparta. Much has been said about American womanhood and motherhood during this debate. We have had much said of the tears of the bereaved. If we should think of the silent, heroic womanhood of America, we do not need to wonder how American womanhood stands on the question before us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. One minute, just to read this.

The CHAIRMAN. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I must say there are about 30 Members to speak, and no one is going to get time to make a set speech, and I shall be obliged to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Woman generally begins to fight last and quits fighting last. The Daughters of the American Revolution, in their recent annual convention in this city, just before they closed on Saturday night adopted the following resolution:

> The Daughters of the American Revolution, in congress assembled, urge that the Congress of the United States cease to retard legislation on the measure for selective draft as recommended by the President of the United States, and, furthermore, the Daughters of the American Revolution urge that the Congress of the United States proceed without further delay to pass the provision for selective draft.

That, my friends, is where American womanhood stands on this proposition.

Our Nation is at war. We must turn from organization for peace to organization for war. We must turn quickly. We must raise a huge Army, one that will become efficient in the shortest time. This is not an hour that will justify experiment or half-way measures. Nothing but the best will do. At the same time we are exceedingly fortunate. Our enemy is confined to a distant land for the present. Were he at our gates we would be compelled to use every expedient, but he is at arm's length, held there by the ships and the armies of our allies. He will be held there until we can organize from peace to war. We have time to adopt that plan which will result in the greatest efficiency, and we have time to put that plan into effect. The time is opportune in the extreme. It remains for America to demonstrate her capacity to wage war scientifically and effectively. Democracy must now demonstrate its capacity to organize its military forces on sound and scientific principles. We Americans have much to be proud of, but we have some fatal weaknesses. We are prone to trust altogether too much to chance. We are inclined to rely too much upon fortune and providence. We are given to braggadocio and to spread-eagleism. This tendency fills us with joy on festal occasions, but has produced sorrow and shame in the severe struggle of war. If we do not at this time give heed to the lessons of our own experience and accept the wisdom of those skilled in military affairs we must stand convicted before the world of incompetence. There is no inherent reason why democracy should not wield the sword with supreme power. Democracy can and will, provided those who shape her military policy will follow the course dictated by reason and experience. In this hour I can not escape the feeling that both democracy and America are on trial. Not many of those of us here to-day will join the ranks on the battle field, but those citizens who will fight the Nation's fight should be sent to battle organized and equipped in the manner best calculated to promote their efficiency and to avoid unnecessary sacrifice of life. It will be criminal for us to take any other course. We are about to shape the military policy of our country, and upon our decision may rest not only whether victory shall be ours, but also whether there shall be an unnecessary and needless sacrifice of human life and treasure.

It was said of old, and wisely said, that the only path our feet should follow is the path of experience. Reflect, I ask you, upon the experience of this country during the five wars we have had. The evolution of a sound military policy for this country has been a slow one, but has now reached the point where the right step can easily be taken.

At first, during the days of the Revolution, it was thought we could win our independence and our liberty by marshalling the State militia. Sad and humiliating was the experience after the first few glorious days at Bunker Hill. We see by this system the independence of this Nation and the liberty of our people resting upon a handful of starved, poorly equipped men at Valley Forge, whose numbers were changing with the quickness of shifting sand. From the agony of his heart Gen. Washington was compelled then to say:

> The jealousy of a standing army and the evils to be apprehended from one are remote and, in my judgment, situated and circumstanced as we are, not at all to be dreaded; but the consequence of wanting one, according to my ideas formed from the present view of things, is certain and inevitable ruin; for if I was called upon to declare upon oath whether the militia had been most serviceable or hurtful upon the whole, I should subscribe to the latter.

And a little later, in writing to his brother, he penned the following words that definitely warn us of the way we should not travel:

> I observe what you say respecting voluntary enlistment, or rather your scheme of raising 2,000 volunteers, and I candidly own to you that I have no opinion of it. These measures only tend to burden the public with a number of officers without adding one jot to our strength, but greatly to confusion and disorder. If the several States would but fall on some vigorous measures to fill up their respective regiments, nothing more need be asked of them.

It would seem that our sad experience during the Revolution would have given us wisdom when we entered upon the next war, but not so. We were not yet ready to profit by our mistakes. We entered the War of 1812 calling for militia and volunteers. Two years of inglorious war on land resulted, and but for the brilliant exploits of our young Navy upon the sea and the splendid achievements of Gen. Jackson and his men at New Orleans after peace had been declared the War of 1812 would remain a most humiliating epoch of American history. Although we called and called for volunteers and hastily tried to organize militia, we never did get all we asked for, and those we did get were unable, though numbering several hundred thousands, effectively to combat with the handful of British regulars on this continent. Painful and sad and humiliating in the extreme is the thought that comes to us all of the capture and burning of our Nation's Capital by a mere handful of British against the horde of volunteers who fled at the first shot and deserted our Nation in the moment of her peril. The volunteer system in this war having failed, draft was ultimately resorted to.

The Mexican War is a war of glory to the American armies, but not glory to the volunteer system. From the time war was certain until war was declared so many months elapsed as to make possible the training of a force such that it became veteran in character, but above all it was officered in large number by graduates of our Military Academy. These young officers fought the Mexican War and became the great commanders of the Civil War. Respecting them Gen. Scott said:

> I give it as my fixed opinion that but for our graduated cadets the war between the United States and Mexico might and probably would have lasted some four or five years, with, in its first half, more defeats than victories falling to our share; whereas in less than two campaigns we conquered a great country and a peace without the loss of a single battle or skirmish.

In the Mexican War a distinct step in advance was made by forsaking State militia, untrained and undisciplined, and adopting national volunteers officered by those commissioned by the President.

The sudden bursting of the Civil War in 1861 found both North and South alike unprepared. Both at first had resort to a call for volunteers. Early in the war the South clearly saw volunteering could not be relied upon, so in 1862 adopted the draft system. By doing this she unquestionably gained many months, perhaps a full year, upon the North in military efficiency. Within another year the North, hopeless of recruiting sufficient forces of volunteers, adopted the draft. The great Lincoln, burdened with the weight of grave responsibilities and heroically struggling to produce armies that would save the Union, clearly saw the failure of the volunteer system and, determining upon draft, expressed himself as follows:

> At the beginning of the war, and ever since, a variety of motives, pressing, some in one direction and some in the other, would be presented to the mind of each man physically fit for a soldier, upon the combined effect of which motives he would or would not voluntarily enter the service. Among these motives would be patriotism, political bias, ambition, personal courage, love of adventure, want of employment, and convenience, or the opposite of some of these. We already have and have had in the service, as appears, substantially all that can be obtained upon this voluntary weighing of motives. And yet we must somehow obtain more or relinquish the original object of the contest, together with all the blood and treasure already expended in the effort to secure it. To meet this necessity the law for the draft has been enacted. You who do not wish to be soldiers do not like this law. This is natural, nor does it imply want of patriotism. Nothing can be so just and necessary as to make us like it if it is disagreeable to us. We are prone, too, to find false arguments with which to excuse ourselves for opposing such disagreeable things. In this case those who desire the rebellion to succeed and others who seek reward in a different way are very active in accommodating us with this class of arguments.

In each of these wars, after the first burst of patriotic enthusiasm had subsided, volunteering declined immediately and our Government had to resort to artifices in an effort to secure soldiers. In the Revolution, in the War of 1812, and in the Civil War our Nation tried to buy the military services of her citizens by giving them bounties. No one can make me believe the safety and perpetuity of a nation should ever rest upon a military system under which service is bought from her own citizens. Military service to the country is the duty every citizen owes and for which every citizen should be liable.

In the Spanish-American War again we had to resort to volunteers, but the number we called for was never secured. Fortunate for us the nation against which we were pitted was weak in a military way and success came notwithstanding our own unmilitary conduct, but the lessons of that time were learned by those of us now living and should not be forgotten. We should never let pass from memory the confusion, the uncertainty, the haphazard character of our organization and the efforts we made to produce an army. In fact, the lessons of that war were not entirely forgotten. Shortly thereafter, in 1902, we undertook to strengthen the National Guard and in a way to federalize it. This effort was continued further in the national-defense act of 1916, but that was recognized by all military experts as a makeshift and unsatisfactory. It had become the settled conviction of every man competent to judge that the only safe military policy for this country was that the military forces of the Nation should be Federal in character, organized and officered in a Federal way, responsive to Federal control.

We have now a chance to avoid the mistakes of all previous wars and to adopt a policy that will be scientific, sensible, and patriotic. The volunteer system having failed in every war of our history and having notably failed in England during the present great war, common sense tells us to abandon it and seek a better plan. The military experts of this country, the Commander in Chief of our Army, the President, the Secretary of War, and every man of either military knowledge or experience in our land earnestly urge that Congress adopt selective draft as the method by which we shall raise the main part of our Army now. The system that is thus recommended by every man competent to judge should commend itself strongly to us. I have heard it said during this debate by Members earnestly advocating the volunteer system that they were in no measure impressed by the fact that our military experts, to the man, urge the selective draft system. I can not entirely repress the amazement I felt at such an attitude. Has reason left its throne? Has judgment no place in our deliberations? Has knowledge no value? If one of these gentlemen were sick, would he employ a quack or a skilled physician? Were he in business distress, would he seek the aid of successful and experienced men, or from those who had made a failure of everything? I can not help but feel this attitude is born of American braggadocio and American recklessness rather than of American reason and American discretion.

It seems to me that every fair consideration of the problem demands that we adopt selective draft. This system is fair and just. It distributes equally the burden among all our citizens. The benefits of citizenship are enjoyed by all. There is no reason why one man should enjoy protection to life and property, enjoy the glorious privilege of American liberty, and ask some other man to do his fighting for him. The duty is universal. If occasion requires, every citizen should perform the duty. If the occasion is less urgent, let those perform the duty who can best perform it and let them be selected by the Government itself.

Again, this system is efficient in that it will secure the numbers necessary. The volunteer system, at its best, is uncertain and unsatisfactory and in the end always fails. Volunteering is never uniform. It varies from day to day, month to month, and year to year. In one section men freely volunteer; in another they do not. One class of society often volunteers. The other declines. Military science is exact in these modern days and military organization should be scientific from top to bottom. A scientific military organization can not rest upon uncertain, haphazard methods of recruiting. Selective draft will furnish the exact number of men needed at the exact time. Furthermore, will furnish that number of men trained to the exact degree of efficiency required. Certainty is essential. To secure military efficiency the selective draft is the only method that can possibly result in certainty.

It is further to be observed that this method is essential in a general military organization. Proper organization of a people in a war like the present requires distribution of the personnel so as to supply the farms, industrial establishments producing necessities, munition plants, and the armies of the field with those men who are most efficient in their respective departments. The volunteer system sends men to the Army who should be kept on the farm or in industrial life, running trains, or supporting dependent people. The volunteer system makes it impossible for a people to acquire maximum efficiency; consequently prevents them exerting their military force in the highest possible degree. I have heard it not infrequently observed during the progress of this debate that the volunteer system is the true system for democracy. Nothing could be wider of the truth. The volunteer system is the class system. The volunteer system is more in harmony with the government under which the military clique or class is formed. Democracy gives to all its citizens equal benefits and imposes upon all equal burdens and obligations. Democracy requires not that those who want to go shall fight in its defense, but that all shall go, or as many as may be needed shall go, and it remains for democracy, in its organized form, to determine when and how many. Nothing is more democratic than such a system of military service. It means that all are placed on the same level. It means that the rich man's son and the poor man's son will stand side by side, wearing the same clothes, eating the same food, digging the same trench, and obeying the same order. It means that patriotism shall not be confined to a few or a portion of the inhabitants, but that it shall animate every citizen to do his part.

Objection has been raised to the selective system because numbers of men who desire to go will not be given the chance. Especially is this true of those who may be above the age limit placed in the draft. That objection has no force at the present time. In order that the Regular Army or the National Guard may be recruited up to the strength authorized by law, it is proposed to receive volunteers for this purpose numbering 725,000. I can not escape the conviction that a call for volunteers now will hardly result in producing more than enough men to make up this 725,000. We would then be driven to the necessity of a draft to raise the great army that is to follow. Should we adopt the volunteer system and, as a matter of fact, opportunity be given our people to volunteer in the proposed new Army, I doubt very much if it would be possible to increase the Regular Army and the National Guard in the manner contemplated by the administration. To my mind it is of immediate importance that our Regular Army be at once recruited up to its full strength and that the National Guard likewise be raised to its maximum power. These two organizations will furnish the seasoned troops first to be relied upon. Their organization already exists. The addition of recruits will, after a reasonable period of training, place at the disposal of our Government practically a million men, constituting a whole organization and trained Army, but men will not enlist to fill up the Regular Army or National Guard if they can volunteer in another force. They will know that enlistment in either of these organizations will mean hard work, rigid discipline, and the loss of many personal privileges volunteers are apt to cling to, even to the sacrifice of their military efficiency. Gen. Upton, in his great work, has this to say, as a result of his observation, study, and experience:

> That when a nation at war relies upon a system of regulars and volunteers, or regulars and militia, the men, in the absence of compulsion, or very strong inducements, will invariably enlist in the organization most lax in discipline.

This warning should give us pause, were we inclined at this time to adopt the volunteer system purely.

Some gentlemen are expressing reluctance at placing in the hands of the President as much power as the selective-draft system will. Let their alarm subside. The conduct of war in its very essence is executive and administrative. The function of a legislative body is to provide the authority and the funds and stop there. The sooner we understand this, the better. To be efficient in a military way the Government must be centralized. There must rest in some one mind power to move the Nation's forces that those forces may exert their maximum military efficiency.

The adoption of selective draft now will show to our enemy and to the world that Uncle Sam means business; that he is in deadly earnest; that our entrance into the war is not that of empty words and high-sounding phrases. It is the determination of a mighty people to perform a mighty task. It will show to the autocracies of the world that democracy, when finally aroused to the combat, can and will be as scientific and as efficient in her war might as theretofore she has been just, generous, and true in her dealings with men. We need to convince the world, and especially our enemies, that we are in this war with all our might and power. We can accomplish that in no way as well as by adopting the scientific military policy for the organization of our armies. If we adopt selective draft at the outset, I believe it will be the greatest single military achievement in the history of our Nation. It will be the renouncement forever of the haphazard methods heretofore followed, of the mistakes oft-repeated and a determination that, while we are slow to war, nevertheless, if driven to war, we will wage it with scientific accuracy and the very maximum of our power. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] is recognized.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I voted against a declaration of war because I did not think that our Government had exhausted every diplomatic possibility to retain peace, but now that the Congress has declared a state of war it is our solemn duty to provide a large and efficient army in the shortest possible time along lines suggested by the highest American military authorities.

I am profoundly conscious that we have embarked upon the most stupendous task which has yet fallen to the lot of our people, and that we must concentrate every ounce of energy, every dollar of money, and every available fighting man, if need be, in order to prevent defeat and dishonor to our Nation.

With war upon us, it would be almost criminal to resort to the utterly discredited, unfair, undemocratic, volunteer system, in support of which no military authority is adduced, and which could only promote delay, extravagance, tremendous personal sacrifices, and unnecessary slaughter, which in the end must of necessity be discarded in favor of compulsory military service.

It is now up to Congress to mold the entire Nation into an effective fighting organization for the attainment of victory in the shortest possible time, and it is the duty of every man, woman, and child to do their share in some capacity.

The idea that this should be a donation war, fought by men who will consent to sacrifice themselves for the benefit of those who insist on staying at home, must be repulsive to every American mind.

It is said that conscription is undemocratic. To my mind democracy means the equality of obligation as well as of rights and opportunities, and these are entirely destroyed when the burden of defending their country does not fall equally upon all the people, rich and poor, high and low alike.

Conscription will raise the moral and physical tone of the Nation and will do more to eradicate the feeling of sectionalism which still exists than all the other laws combined.

If I were confident we could recruit 2,000,000 men under the volunteer system, I would still oppose this plan, because it would permit some men to shirk a duty they owe to their country, and because it would permit certain sections of the country to reap glory or shame at the expense of others.

No man is worthy to enjoy the rights of citizenship who is too unpatriotic or too cowardly to fight when his country calls for help. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, nearly three weeks have passed since Congress passed the declaration of war against Germany, and we are still debating the manner in which we will raise the forces with which to carry it on. August 1, 1914, Germany declared war. Three days later an army of more than 1,000,000 men, fully armed and equipped to the minutest point and trained to the highest degree, swept through Luxemburg and demanded admission to Belgium. For two and one-half years the conflict has raged. Before the irresistible onslaught of the German Army forts thought to be impregnable have crumbled, whole kingdoms have been swept away; all Europe under arms has not been sufficient to wrest from its iron grasp the territory which it has occupied. When peace is mentioned the German chancellor proudly says, "Look at the map." Never was a braver, never a more efficient army. Yet speaker after speaker has told you upon this floor that a conscript army can not and will not fight, and it has even been said that one volunteer was equal to three of such a force. Let us hope that no American general will labor under any such delusion.

The German Army is to-day larger than ever before, weakened only because its youth and strength lie beneath the soil of a hundred battle fields. It never will be defeated except by an army which is superior in numbers and equipment and at least approaches it in efficiency. I have called it a conscript army, for it is assembled by conscription carried to the last extreme and is supported by a conscription of the prisoners it has taken and the people it has subdued, if, indeed, conscription be not too mild a term for the servitude they endure. The army which we are about to assemble must meet that of a foe which has carried the science of war well-nigh to perfection and stops at nothing to accomplish its aims. To meet such an enemy the highest preparation can not be more than adequate.

Mr. Chairman, no republic can ever hope to equal the efficiency of a military autocracy. We debate because we are free, but in that same freedom we have pledged all the resources of this Republic to the support of the war, and he who surveys the conflict with clear eye and impartial opinion must say that it were little less than criminal folly to prosecute it with anything short of the highest efficiency and power of which we are capable.

I glory in the spirit and patriotism of the volunteers of our Army. I honor and shall honor to the end of my life the sacrifices that they made, and revere the noble women who encouraged those whom they loved and upon whom they were dependent to offer their lives for their country. But he has read the history of our country in vain who says that the volunteer system in this or any other country has ever produced the highest degree of efficiency and power of which the nation was capable. In the Revolutionary War this system, time after time, reduced Washington almost to despair as he saw his army melting away, not so much through the bullets of the enemy as through the refusals or neglect to serve in it. The volunteer system deepened the furrows of care in the face of Lincoln and left the fate of this Nation trembling in the balance when he was unable to fill the ranks of his armies so sadly depleted in the dark days of the Civil War by death and disease. It was not because there were not men enough to fill these ranks, but because there was, as there always will be, men who will perform their duty only under compulsion.

What are the objections to the system of selective conscription? I have listened as they have been made upon this floor with open mind, only to be convinced of their insufficiency. They tell us this system is not democratic. Why? Is it not true that as a democracy ought to provide an equal opportunity for all, so it ought and must place upon all alike the duty of service to the State? Who can say, who will say, that this is unjust and undemocratic? "We admit that," says one speaker. "What of it?" Just this: What value is the admission if the obligation is not performed? Another gentleman said, "I am for universal compulsory training, but not for conscription." Universal training! What for? For pink teas and croquet? What value is universal military training without universal service? If we are not going to call the men trained into the Army, why give them a military training? Of what value is the training to the Government if they are unwilling to perform military service? He who refuses to admit this obligation or is unwilling to perform it has no title either to the care and protection which his country has given him or the legacy of freedom which the valor of our ancestors has bequeathed him, and is not worthy of the name of an American citizen.

Some say that the selective draft will place a stigma upon those who are brought thereby into the service. Again, I say, why and how? Because it has done so in the past under a system which at first exhausted every method of persuasion, until he who had refused to volunteer had thereby evinced his unwillingness to perform his duty? This has no application to the proposed plan by which the Nation at the outset fixes the position and duties of its citizens. Who can truly say that any stigma attaches to the man who says "I am ready when the call comes, tell me when and where you want me"? Rather the stigma will rest upon the man who denies that his country ought to call upon him for service and who sullenly and unwillingly obeys the call, protesting that others should perform the duty which by every principle of right and justice rests upon him.

What can be fairer than to ask that each citizen be ready to do his part, and what can be more unfair and unjust than to lay upon the shoulders of those willing to perform their duty, not only their share of the burden, but also the load that should be carried by others. Yet the volunteer system does exactly this, for if the slacker and the shirker fails to do his part it must either be done by others who have already taken up their full task or the Nation will fail, as it always has failed under such circumstances, to receive the support from its citizens which will enable it to exert its highest powers. Because the patriot has undertaken in the past to do more than his share, sometimes succeeding, sometimes failing, is no reason why he should be called upon to do so again. Such a system imposes a cruel and unnecessary hardship upon those who instead of being rewarded by their country are crushed by burdens greater than they can bear. The injustice of the volunteer system is showing itself to-day just as it did in a greater degree in the time of the Civil War. Child as I was at the time of that conflict I saw it experienced in those days. I saw then bitter suffering endured by the volunteer soldier and his dependents—the volunteers who set no limit to their sacrifice, while at the same time I saw sturdy loafers and grasping money makers refuse to perform their obligations to their country. It is the same to-day. In my own district the very flower and pride of the community are enlisting, while many of those without ties and without occupation give never a thought to their duty to their Government, and they never will if the volunteer system prevails. They say that conscription will take the boys. This is true in part. One of the saddest things about war is that it can not be effectually prosecuted without the youth and strength of the Nation. Experience shows that to form an army of elderly men is but to fill the hospitals and graveyards, and the country that undertakes to fight with men of mature years would quickly find itself vanquished in a contest where first of all physical endurance is required. But if it were otherwise the objection would be intensified by the volunteer system which always gathers in the youth and the extreme youth such as will not be reached under selective conscription.

Look at your pension rolls. Remember that the Civil War began 56 years ago and that it is more than half a century since the last gun was fired. Consider the natural depletions by death and you will find who fought in the Civil War. It was the boys who carried on that war, and without which it could not have hardly been begun on either side, much less maintained afterwards. Is it any answer to the charge to say that the volunteer system takes only those who are willing to perform their duty, when the shirker and slacker are profiting by their patriotism and protected by their sacrifice? No; it merely shows how great injustice can be thereby perpetrated. But some one has said that the rich and influential who are above the age of conscription are fostering this plan. What of it? Have they no sons? The fact is that the system of selective conscription must often take the rich, while the poor are exempt. The son of the banker can not say that he has a widowed mother who needs his support. The son of the wealthy manufacturer who now spends his time on the tennis courts, the golf links, and in social entertainments can not plead that he is needed to make munitions, for he never helped to make any. The son of the wealthy merchant, who is now dashing about the country in some high-powered motor car, can not offer the excuse that he is needed for any useful purpose. Selective conscription is the method, and the only method, that will effectually protect the poor boy in his rights and bring into the ranks those who can serve without the least sacrifice and the least injury to the ability of the country to carry on the war. Right here arises another point against the volunteer system. It will be useless to assemble a great army if it can not be fed, transported, and supplied with munitions of war. If we do not consider these things we would be so far behind our opponents in efficiency as to either paralyze our efforts or make our armies the helpless victims of our enemies. Yet all these considerations are ignored by the volunteer system. It takes those most needed for the support of our armies, alike with those who may properly go, and demoralizes our industrial organization with no corresponding benefit. If we continue to adhere to it, we must acknowledge that we alone of the great nations of the world have made no progress in the science of war and its efficient maintenance.

This does not mean that we should discard or fail to complete the units already formed or fail to make a place for those who prefer the roll of a volunteer. We need a force now and must have it. We ought not to discard the National Guard and the plans already made for its development, and the proposition offered by the minority of the committee does not discard it. It is idle to say that volunteering will not be permitted when it is now going on. There will be ample room for all who wish to volunteer, and from present indications for many more in the 600,000 which will be required to fill the ranks of the regulars and mobilize the guard as provided by law. I decline to assume that the law will be violated simply because the Secretary of War properly holds that the present units of the guard must first be filled. With every freedom given volunteering the records plainly show that eventually we must come to some form of general conscription or enrollment, and even the bill proposed by the majority of the committee practically concedes it by making provision for it, in the judgment of the President. Why should we not have it now? Why wait in the presence of a foe that acts with almost superhuman swiftness and energy?

A lady said to me yesterday, with a woman's natural sympathy and compassion, "Would you send our boys to the trenches of France?" "Ah, Madam," I said, "if the French boys had not come to the trenches of America a different flag would be floating over you to-day. It was a French boy that led them, Lafayette, one of the greatest heroes of the Revolution, then barely 20 years of age." I might have added that the kindling fires of liberty which have since lighted the world would have been extinguished and the clock of the world's progress set back for centuries. We will never be able to do more for France than she has done for us; nor is it likely so much.

I hope it will not be necessary to send any of our soldiers abroad, but if the country needs them there they will willingly go. More than 100,000 of our citizens have expressed their desire to go to France with Col. Roosevelt. I hope permission will be granted them, and will vote for an amendment to the bill for that purpose. Such a movement would be an inspiration to our allies and to our recruits, and would show that Americans are willing to risk their lives as well as their fortunes in support of the just cause for which we have declared war.

Gentlemen of the House, we need courage to-day. We need courage not only to be willing to offer our own dearest and best but, what is sometimes far harder, to call upon others for sacrifices. We need courage to tell the people of this country that by blood and treasure their liberties were bought, and by blood and treasure only can they be maintained. We need courage—oh, we need courage most—to resist that false sentiment which would make the war on our part an opera bouffe farce, in which soldiers and generals alike do everything but fight and whose heroes faint at the smell of powder. Such a course would expose us to the deserved contempt and derision of the world and make the name of our country a byword and hissing among nations. Lastly we need, and as a body I trust have, the courage to disregard the effect on our political fortunes of the enactment of a bill which will anger and antagonize many, as this conscription will when enforced. And let us pray God for ourselves and our country that we may have that nobility of soul that looks above the tears and agony and blood of the conflict and finds its greatest reward in the knowledge of service performed, of duty done, of America and her rights, first and forever. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT] is recognized.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, personally I have never had any doubt of the merits of universal service, which I believe is the only plan to secure a trained citizenry consistent with our democratic ideals under our republican form of government.

If we were considering this measure in a time of peace, I believe that I should oppose the incorporation of the principle of selective draft, but on April 6 this Congress, by an overwhelming majority, recognized that a state of war existed between the German Empire and this Republic, and on the 14th of April, without a dissenting vote, the Members of both Houses signified their confidence in the Chief Executive and Commander in Chief by placing at his disposal a credit of $7,000,000,000, the greatest amount ever appropriated by any legislature in the world's history, for the purpose of enabling him to prosecute the war vigorously to a speedy and successful termination.

Supported undoubtedly, and availing himself of the wisest counsel to be had, the President has urged upon this Congress the authorization of the selective draft, and it seems to me that this is no occasion for any Member of this House to hazard the success of this war and the future of his country upon his individual guess whether we should experiment with the uncertainties of securing a sufficient number of troops under the volunteer system before exercising, as a majority of the committee themselves concede the possibility of our being compelled to do, recourse to the selective draft. Rather do I conceive it to be my duty, as I wish some of my colleagues could perceive it to be theirs, to demonstrate by a unanimous vote to our common enemy and the world that, whatever our opinions may have been before that solemn and sacred hour when on Good Friday morn the die was cast, we are now united in spirit and in purpose to prosecute the war vigorously, relentlessly, and unitedly to a complete and decisive victory.

So, Mr. Chairman, my vote will be for conscription; but I hope that I shall be afforded an opportunity to support an amendment appropriating the money to enable the War Department to pay those who have received commissions and those who are candidates for commissions in the Officers' Reserve Corps while undergoing intensive training at the training camps, in order that patriotic young men who lack the means will not be penalized by their limited financial resources, and denied thereby the opportunity, no matter how great their merits, to serve the country and the flag, except in the line under their more fortunate, but perhaps less able, brothers in arms, whose financial independence would otherwise make it possible for them to monopolize the appointments as commissioned officers, thus fomenting class distinction and the inevitable friction that flows therefrom.

Mr. Chairman, while many references have been made to the writings which the fathers of 1776 and 1812 have bequeathed us as a patriotic heritage concerning the merits of the volunteer and conscription systems, no single reference has been made, and I dare say none can be made, touching upon the aerial destroyers which we realize from day to day are proving a most potent factor in the course of this war's determination. They no more conceived its inevitable development and indispensable necessity than they could anticipate the vast expanse of our dominions or the fact that in 1917 free America would be allied not only with France, our savior, but with Great Britain, whom they twice fought to establish our independence, to now replace autocracy with the enlightened spirit of true democracy throughout the world; yet more than three-fourths of a century ago no less a man than Alfred Lord Tennyson wrote with prophetic vision:

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the vision of the world, and all the wonder that would be;

Saw the heavens filled with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales;

Heard the heavens filled with shouting, and there rain'd a ghastly dew
From the nations' airy navies grappling in the central blue;

Far along the world-wide whisper of the south wind rushing warm,
With the standards of the peoples plunging thro' the thunderstorm;

Till the war drum throbb'd no longer, and the battle flags were furl'd
In the parliament of man, the federation of the world.

The opportunity for a realization of the prophecy of Tennyson has been afforded by American inventive genius, which in the creation of the flying machine, has established a new vision for military operation, just as American genius furnished, by the invention of the submarine, the new vision in naval operations. We have decried and condemned the latter in its inhuman application by our enemy; shall we not avail ourselves of the glorious opportunity to be achieved by the former, as already demonstrated by our allies?

Our honored guest, Right Hon. Alfred J. Balfour, some time ago stated on the floor of the House of Commons:

The time is here when the command of the sea will be of no value to Great Britain without corresponding command of the air.

A great military figure, the late Lord Kitchener, stated that a well-trained and equipped aviator was worth a whole army corps.

And Marshal Joffre, idolized upon his arrival in the Capital City last Wednesday with no less enthusiasm than he was received at the gates of Paris upon his return from the Marne, after he had stemmed and turned the tide against the destruction of civilization, declared on the deck of the Mayflower as he passed historic Fortress Monroe:

The French idea of an American participation calls for a fighting force supported by auxiliary services and a strong aviation section.

We hear expressions of opinion daily that the present war will be decided in the air, and we know that the recent allied victories have been due to the fact that the allies have proven themselves to be the masters in aerial navigation; yet every cable dispatch of aerial accomplishment fills us with a thrill of pride because some valiant and brave American has been a participant. Only a handful they have been, but they have proven the statement that an aviator is worth a whole army corps. To-day we are to decide what our first contribution to the common cause is to be. We are to select the most powerful, the most effective weapon with which to strengthen the hands of our allies. It is conceded that it will require from nine months to a year to train and put a substantial American force in the field, but there is no doubt whatever that we could train and equip and send to Europe 5,000 aviators within a much less period; moreover, while many of you have expressed your doubt with reference to securing a sufficient number of volunteer soldiers, and others question the propriety of invoking the selective draft, it is a conceded fact that there are thousands of young men waiting to enlist in the air service, inspired by the novelty and fascination of aerial activity, so that we have no fear of the success of the volunteer service and no need of conscription so far as the air service is concerned. They are men of the best type, men like those brave and daring American aviators, William Thaw, Norman Prince, Elliot Cowdin, J. R. McConnell, C. C. Johnson, Lawrence Rumsey, R. Luffberry, Kiffin Rockwell, Bert Hall, Didier Masson, and other members of the Lafayette Corps, who fought side by side with the French and British aviators for the past two years; therefore I want to urge this House to-day to go on record in favor of a plan to make our first contribution to the common cause 5,000 well trained and equipped aviators.

Our allies appreciate the fact that we can best help them by sending aviators, and they have already suggested, in fact, that it be done.

The prominent naval strategist, Rear Admiral Bradley A. Fiske, in a recent communication to the board of governors of the Aero Club of America, as the representative aeronautic body in this country, suggested that the club point out the advisability of sending to Europe a large unit of aeroplanes with well trained aviators and appropriate armament; and in response to an inquiry cabled by the French and British newspapers to the Aero Club of America, Mr. Alan R. Hawley, its president, replied:

We have thousands of applications for aviation training from college men who are anxious to join the Army and Navy Reserve or would like to join the American aero squadron in France or the royal air service. Large aviation camps could and will undoubtedly be established immediately where students will be given their preliminary training in aviation and in military matters in general. The Aero Club has received a large number of offers of extensive tracts of land to be used free of charge as aviation training camps, and it has also received liberal offers of funds from patriotic citizens for training aviators in large numbers. But I believe that to give the best results and avoid confusion the training of 5,000 aviators to be sent to Europe should be undertaken by the United States Government. The suggestion comes at the most opportune moment, and you may rest well assured that there will be no lack of cooperation in the United States to make the plan effective. In the light of the situation here one is safe in predicting that if all of the forces to be dispatched from this side to the European battle field the strong probability is that amongst the first will be a large number of representative aerial squadrons, consisting of the very best material that America can furnish, all fired by patriotic enthusiasm at the prospect of flying under the "Stars and Stripes."

Mr. Chairman, under the leave granted to extend my remarks I include the following:

A year ago when Villa's raid brought out the fact that we had only 12 aviators and 6 aeroplanes available in the Army air service to meet the emergency, an appeal was made for aviators and aeroplanes by the Aero Club of America, which very patriotically undertook to train and equip aviators for the national defense and build up the very important branch of the Army and Navy.

The response to the Aero Club's appeal was amazing. Applications came from all over the country, by telegraph, mail, telephone, and personal calls of the applicants. The energetic officials of the club, who, by the way, have been the patriotic, far-seeing men who started and supported with all their might and to the fullest extent of their means the movement to build up our national defenses, arranged for the training of over 100 aviators, some of whom have actually become Army aviators, and others are to be found in the Aerial Reserve Corps, the Naval Reserve Flying Corps, and in the aviation sections of the militia throughout the country.

But the response to the appeal brought such a flood of applications that it became imperatively necessary for the Government to take up and deal with it promptly and substantially. I had the pleasure of being a member of the committee which called on President Wilson on June 29, 1916, to bring to his attention the fact that there were 2,000 patriotic young men who had been waiting patiently—and impatiently—for a chance to enlist in the air service. When you consider that at that time one of our greatest national problems was, as it still is to a great extent, the problem of getting men to enlist in the Army and Navy, you realize why the Aero Club of America, of which I am proud to be a member, realized the importance of bringing the matter to the attention of the President of the United States, who, realizing the importance, immediately authorized the creation of the Aerial Reserve Corps, as provided for in the national-defense act of June 3, 1916.

The Aerial Reserve Corps, which is part of the Officers' Reserve Corps, was authorized on July 13, 1916, and a few days later, when, with the committee of the Aero Club of America, I called on Secretary Baker and at the offices of the aviation section of the Signal Corps, we were advised that the plan of the department was to immediately select 297 men to be trained as officers and aviators in the Aerial Reserve Corps, and to send them to some 10 private aviation schools, which were in a position to arrange for their training. Unfortunately this plan was not accomplished through the summer and fall, and the winter conditions were considered too difficult for student aviators to face, so the establishing of aviation training camps and the training of hundreds of aviators for the Aerial Reserve Corps was postponed. Several aviation training schools are being established by the Army and the Navy, and while the plans are being made, I want to emphasize a condition existing which, if taken advantage of, will cause the thousands of aviators whom we should have as soon as possible, not only for national defense but also to send to Europe as our first contribution to help our allies, to wage this fight for humanity and civilization.

I know of many Members of Congress who have received applications from young men desirous of joining the Aerial Reserve Corps, the Naval Reserve Flying Corps, and who on applying to the War and Navy Departments have received the same answer that I have received, and thousands of young men have received, to the effect that the Army and the Navy are not in a position to take care of these thousands of patriotic young men who want to give their service for the upbuilding of our aerial service. The departments advise that the aviation schools are filled to the limit of their capacity, which is roughly estimated at less than 300 aviators, being trained, including the Navy Aviation School at Pensacola, the Army schools at San Diego, Cal., Mineola, N. Y., Memphis, Tenn., and the two new temporary aviation schools established at Chicago, Ill., and Essington, Pa.; and the private schools being conducted for the Army at Miami, Fla., and Newport News, Va.

I am advised that the War and Navy Departments and their recruiting offices have been flooded with applications from men who want to join the air service, and that to put the estimates of those who have applied for training in the past few months at 20,000 would be conservative. The Aero Club of America alone has received about 4,000 applications in the past three months, including hundreds of applications from college men, some of whom have already been partially trained at private expense.

In some cases young men, after waiting for months for action, undertake to pay for their own training, and there are to-day about 200 young men learning to fly to prepare themselves at private expense to be ready for the Army, Navy, or Reserve air service. A group of patriotic men, headed by Mr. H. P. Davison and Mr. Lewis S. Thompson, and with the cooperation of Messrs. Alan R. Hawley, Rear Admiral Robert E. Peary, John Hays Hammond, jr., and Henry Woodhouse, are establishing a school to train 100 young men in aviation. Last year they founded Aerial Coast Patrol Unit No. 1, which gained distinction in the Mosquito Fleet maneuvers last September, and has been doing pioneer work in naval aeronautics. When war with Germany appeared to be inevitable, these young men left Yale University, where they were studying, and 29 of them reported to the aviation school in Florida, where they have been undergoing intensive training in aviation. They will now return to New York in a few weeks, and 100 will train at one single large aviation school. Two other groups of 12 patriotic men have formed Aerial Coast Patrol Units Nos. 2 and 3, and are taking aviation training at their own expense. Recently some Columbia University men formed Aerial Coast Patrol Unit No. 4, and within a few days they had 200 applications from Columbia men, and they are now making efforts to raise sufficient funds to purchase aeroplanes for training.

On March 10 an official of the Aero Club of America, Mr. Henry Woodhouse, delivered two addresses—one to Princeton University men and one to the alumni of Georgia Institute of Technology, and recommended that they form aerial coast-patrol units. To-day, thanks to patriotic men who presented the aeroplanes, a unit is training at Princeton. The suggestion to form an aero unit at the Georgia Tech. resulted in some 350 Georgia Tech. men applying for training. The officials of the college presented the names of these men to the Chief Signal Officer several weeks ago and told him that the Georgia Tech. will be glad to give the grounds to establish an aviation school and to also establish a course in the theory and application of aeronautics in the institute. Another patriotic man, a member of the Aero Club of America, last summer established an aviation training camp at Governors Island and paid tens of thousands of dollars for preparing men for the Aerial Reserve Corps. Those men and the men trained at Mineola, also at the expense of citizens fired by patriotic impulse, are now all that we have for the aerial defense of the third naval district. Still another member of the Aero Club of America, Mr. W. Earl Dodge, has been supporting an aviation training camp for training men for the Aerial Reserve Corps and has spent over $100,000 to help the upbuilding of our defenses.

Mr. Emerson McMillin, another veteran worker for national preparedness connected with the Aero Club of America, gave $34.000 toward the training of those aviators who are now available for the aerial defenses of the third naval district. And a few days ago a group of patriotic ladies formed the Aerial Aid Society for the purpose of paying for the training of 12 men and forming a unit of the Aerial Coast Patrol. The ladies of the National Special Aid Society have also contributed from time to time during the past two years toward the training of aviators. In fact, there was contributed the sum of $59,000 to train, equip, and support the First Aero Company of the New York National Guard before the War Department contributed a cent toward their upkeep. I know that this was also true in Massachusetts. Mr. T. Jefferson Coolidge, of that State, contributed close to $10,000 for training militia aviators in Massachusetts and New York. Amounts were also raised in Rhode Island, California, Michigan, New Jersey, and other States.

I could go on quoting case after case of demonstrations of practical patriotism, including offers of seaplanes and seaplane stations for use by the Army and the Navy, by Rodman Wanamaker, J. P. Knapp, August Belmont, Mrs. William H. Bliss, Mr. Floyd Jones, and others; and I also could give the names of those patriotic young men like F. Trubee Davison, Robert A. Lovett, G. G. Depew, Frank Goodyear, David Clinton Backus, J. F. Knapp, Charles B. Wrightsman, Duncan Forbes, and others, who are not only paying for their own training but are also organizing units of the Aerial Coast Patrol.

It is not necessary for me to point out that the country at large appreciates the necessity of upbuilding our aerial defenses and the national demand that steps be taken immediately to train and equip at least 5,000 aviators. The action of the Sixty-fourth Congress in voting appropriations amounting to about $18,000,000 for the Army and the Navy for aeronautics proved that the country had just begun to appreciate the need of developing our aerial service.

I dare say that if a canvas were taken it would be found that the country demands that prompt action be taken in building up an air service equal to the air service of the first-class European countries.

The air service to-day is the balance of power which decides the daily victories of the armies in the present war. Several weeks ago, before the present drives of the allies started, there took place a succession of aerial engagements which lasted for several days, until the allies were victors. Having mastered the enemy in the sky, it was easy to drive them from their intrenchments. Having supremacy in the air, the allies could prevent the German aviators from following the movements of the allies, whereas the allied aviators had free access over the German lines.

We are going to ship billions of dollars' worth of supplies to the allies, and we shall have to protect every dollar's worth of those supplies and every ship employed in transporting them from the attacks of submarines and from submerged mines. Nothing else is so well adapted for protecting our harbors and shipping lanes from submarines and mines as the sea plane, dirigibles, and observation balloons, a fact which has been amply demonstrated in the present war. Great Britain has 107 aeronautic stations along her coasts, and yet the coasts of Great Britain total only about 1,500 miles. With thousands of miles of coast we should have at least as many stations as Great Britain has, extending from Maine to the State of Washington. The National Aerial Coast Patrol Commission, of which I have the honor to be one of the commissioners, has been pointing to this vital need for the past two years and urging action.

On April 13 I presented to this House the plan for the aerial defenses needed for the third naval district, a basic plan of aerial defenses suitable for the 13 continental and 2 insular naval districts, prepared by the advisory committee on aeronautics which is cooperating with the commandant of the third naval district in the organization of the Naval Reserve forces. This plan shows what must be done to establish an aerial coast patrol substantial enough to protect our shipping. I pointed out in that report that Sir Edward Carson, on February 21, 1917, reported to the British Government that since the commencement of the war the British Navy, with the cooperation of its most efficient aerial coast patrol, has examined 25,874 ships. During the first 18 days of February 6,076 ships arrived in ports of the United Kingdom, and 5,873 ships had cleared from United Kingdom ports. Practically every ship that arrived and every ship that cleared was inspected as it neared the ports and convoyed by dirigibles or sea planes. Sir Edward Carson is authority for the statement that from the beginning of the war up to October 30, 1916, the British Navy transported across the sea 8,000,000 troops, 9,420,000 tons of explosives and material, 47,504,000 gallons of gasoline, over a million of sick and wounded, and over a million mules and horses, and so forth.

It cost Great Britain approximately $350,000,000 to build her present air service, half of which was spent for the naval air service and aerial coast patrol.

What would the fate of the allies have been if Great Britain had hesitated in investing large sums in a substantial air service?

And, now that the United States is about to undertake to ship billions of dollars' worth of supplies, we need a substantial air service and aerial coast patrol to protect our ships from U-boats and mines.

Our neighbor, Canada, sent 600 aviators to England since the beginning of the war, and is now spending $80,000,000 in aeronautics and in training and equipping 20 aero squadrons. The allies know the valor and daring of the American aviators. So the allies hope for that kind of assistance and cooperation; they need thousands of them, and we should not lose time in training and equipping and sending them.

To train these thousands of aviators to be sent to Europe and the thousands more needed here for national defense, to protect the billions of dollars' worth of shipping, will take an extensive organization and administrative force. We have been attempting for over a year to do within a few months what should have been done during the past 10 years, with a few men. The overburdened Signal Corps in the Army and the Bureau of Operations in the Navy have been trying to attend to the development of aeronautics besides doing their other duties. As a matter of fact, their other duties require more than all of their efforts and all of the time and efforts of a staff many times that of the present one. So we must extend our administrative organizations; and I therefore urge that the time is ripe to establish an independent department of aeronautics, which shall coordinate and develop the aeronautic resources of the Army, the Navy, the Coast Guard, the Post Office, and so forth, and also the civilian developments, including aerial transportation, which is bound to come in the very near future.

In establishing a department of aeronautics, with a secretary of aeronautics, who will be a member of the Cabinet, we shall only follow the example of European countries. Great Britain and France, after trying every means and way, finally had to come to the conclusion that a separate department of aeronautics, with a secretary of the air as a member of the cabinet, was the only solution to the problem. Surely we Americans, who are known to be practical people, will not fail to learn by the experience of these other countries, which are now our allies.

There is now a bill before the Congress, known as the Sheppard-Hulbert bill, providing for the creation of a department of aeronautics, with a secretary having a portfolio in the President's Cabinet, upon which I hope Congress will act favorably at this session.

The story of establishing the British air ministry and some very convincing facts about the importance of air power was given in an article contributed by Rear Admiral Robert E. Peary, chairman of the National Aerial Coast Patrol Commission, to the monthly magazine, Flying.

If our aeronautical activities are developed with good judgment and scientific skill, I predict it will be the deciding factor in the war, thus fulfilling Tennyson's prophecy, and so complete that those of us who survive will live to see—

> The fair white-wing'd peacemaker fly
> To happy havens under all the sky,
> And mix the seasons and the golden hours,
> Till each man find his own in all men's good,
> And all men work in noble brotherhood,
> Breaking their mailed fleets and armed towers,
> And ruling by obeying nature's powers,
> And gathering all the fruits of earth and crown'd > with all her flowers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COMSTOCK] is recognized.

Mr. COMSTOCK. Mr. Chairman, having grown up in the belief that one who makes to his country the offering of his life should live ever after in its grateful memory, I have not been prepared to learn from leading newspapers that those who favor a volunteer system of raising an army are incompetents, if not traitors, giving aid and comfort to the enemy.

The impression formed in youth has been emphasized in later years by reading in the platforms of all political parties and hearings proclaimed from the stump by unnumbered orators that none deserves so well of the Republic as he who fights in its defense.

With all these utterances has been associated the idea of volunteer service. On fateful fields of the Republic monuments are erected, on which are raised, in bronze and marble, figures of the volunteer soldier and sailor, in honor of the defenders of our common country—not one to the conscript. The volunteer system has been characterized on the floor of the House as archaic, and even as vicious.

High praise has been given to the volunteers of 1861. They were volunteers, without distinction of age or sex. On both sides of the line men, women, and boys entered into honorable rivalry in aiding the cause in which they believed.

> The wife whose babe first smiled that day,
> The fair young bride of yester eve, and matron gray
> And aged sire, all saw the loved warriors haste away
> And deemed it sin to grieve.

The result of that spirit, the hearty discharge of duty, converted an age which had become commonplace and sordid into one of heroism and self-denial.

Archaic is of Greek origin, and means old. I admit the charge. The immortal three hundred who defended the famous pass; Horatius, who held the bridge; Curtius, who threw himself into the breach to save his country; the young American who fired "the shot heard 'round the world"; the heroes of Concord and Lexington; the men who fought with Warren at Bunker Hill; the victors at Kings Mountain; those who gave "The Hornets' Nest" its name; Francis Marion, the "swamp fox"; the illy fed, illy clothed, and poorly paid men who constituted an army—an army in name only—and followed the Father of His Country through the vicissitudes of the Revolution until privileged to see the banner of the proud mother country lowered to her victorious and rebellious sons; and the brave men who died in defense of the Alamo were volunteers. It has been truly said that all our wars, practically, have been fought and won by volunteers. All that is past—it should not be forgotten.

In the great war in which we are engaged we are going to furnish, either as volunteers or conscripts or as both, all the men necessary to its successful prosecution. In essentials we are all standing by the President; and the only question now is, Shall the army be raised by the volunteer or conscriptive system? All are agreed as to the end, but differ as to the means.

The selective conscription is conscription; the selective conscript is a conscript still. It is not a question of universal military training—we are a unit on that subject—nor of sending untrained troops to battle—all are opposed to that—nor of the disparity between raw and disciplined and seasoned soldiers. Everybody admits the difference. The advantage of drill and discipline will be reaped alike by conscript and volunteer. All these conditions referred to are things apart. We are at this time only to decide the best way to recruit an efficient army.

By the bill under consideration, the volunteer and the conscript come from the same classes of citizens. Their qualifications are required to be the same mentally, physically, and as to age. The rules of exemption which make the word "selective" apply alike to men under both methods. The time required to assemble recruits is of great importance. Other things being equal, that should determine our choice in the selection of a method. The estimates coming to us from those qualified to speak fix the time in which the draft can be made effective at from three to five months; and while the matter of expense should not weigh where principle is involved, it would be vastly greater under the draft system than under the volunteer plan. Under the volunteer system it is apparent that troops may be raised in the shorter time and at less expense. The claims that the volunteer system is a failure, with all respect to those who make them, are not borne out by the facts of history, as shown in the able arguments heretofore made. I have no doubt that the number contemplated by the bill can be recruited much earlier under the volunteer than under the conscription method. Our citizens of to-day are devoted to the principle of representative government. To admit that they will not volunteer their services would be but to say that they are not in sympathy with the war or that patriotism has touched low-water mark in the Republic.

A reference to the first American, the only Washington, always awakens interest and commands respect. This is due to the fact that we cherish his memory with religious gratitude. In whatever position or attitude history presents him, we look upon him with veneration and affection. As just as Cato, without his austerity; as brave as Cæsar, without his sinister ambition; what views he expressed upon any subject are accepted as almost conclusive. The letters of the great Washington read by my distinguished friend from California on the subject must be read in connection with the times and conditions under which they were written. That time was when the country was impoverished, when Tories were busy in conspiracies and work against the Colonies and the future of the struggling Republic looked dark. Bad men were sowing dissensions in the colonial ranks, attacking even the character of their unselfish leader, challenging his integrity as a man, and denying him merit as a soldier. Such conditions do not exist here.

The absence of soldiers from their proper commands in various important engagements in the Civil War on the Union side, referred to by my eloquent friend, the gentleman from California, may have been caused in part by sickness, in part by dereliction of duty. His figures are no doubt correct. How many of the absentees were volunteers and how many drafted we do not know, but I will venture to say that the drafted men were in an overwhelming majority. The history of the "bounty jumper" may serve as an object lesson in this war, but the "bounty jumper" is not yet an issue. The volunteer system does not promise immunity for physical ills nor will it always keep men faithful to a pledge. It affords to those who seek an opportunity to fight for their country without fear or duress.

Certainly it is proper to take into account the spirit of the men, as soldiers, who offer without compulsion to serve, and those whose service is enforced. Heretofore we have thought it worth while to permit men to volunteer and serve their country as units, continuing the associations of civil life; boys that grew up on adjoining farms, perhaps attended the same school, to continue the associations in the same regimental and company units. It has worked well in the past. The proposed conscription does not contemplate the continuance of these relations; and men and boys, however intimate and close their associations were, may be separated and sent to widely different fields.

Service in war in defense of our representative Government is a duty, but it need not be devoid of sentiment. With the service, if we would make it most effective in connection with the discharge of duty, may also go along the amenities of war, the comradeship growing out of mutual toil and suffering. The "martial courtesy which lends to danger grace, to valor pride," relieving and mitigating its sad offices.

The volunteer system has been criticized as undemocratic and unfair. The criticism can not be sustained where the people are permitted to exercise their choice in the character, whether volunteer or conscript, in which they shall serve their country.

Indiana will raise her quota of volunteers before the same number can be obtained by conscription. I do not claim she has a higher sense of her obligation than the other States. Granted they will do as well. What more is wanted? Shall it be insisted that men shall be humiliated by coercion, when they are ready to act upon their own motion? It will not be claimed that enforced service is better than that freely rendered, nor that the conscripted man is braver than he who volunteers. A draft has never heretofore in this country been the first move to recruit an army. If by mismanagement the volunteer method fails, under the bill it need not if rightly applied delay conscription. And the end will be accomplished within the time anticipated.

I have the honor to represent the most intelligent constituency, as I believe, in Indiana. Upon the question of conscription or volunteer system they are divided. They are willing to accord to one another the right of private judgment. There is but one end in view—the raising of a sufficient army. I would not deny to those who may be about to give up their lives for the flag the privilege as volunteers of maintaining the patriotic traditions of the country. Nor would I deny to their descendants the proud memory of their brave records. I shall vote against the proposed amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the pending amendment, which seeks to strike out the volunteer provision of this bill. I am in favor of the bill as it is reported from the committee. The only dispute in the House is whether we shall adhere to the traditional policy of the country to first raise our troops by the volunteer method, and upon that failing to resort to conscription. Under the law we passed in the last Congress the President is authorized, and has that authority now, to increase the Regular Army to war footing that will total 290,000 men and to increase the National Guard to a footing of 625,000 men. That provides for an army of over 900,000 men. The War Department has asked for an additional 500,000 men, and in case of necessity a further increment of another 500,000, making substantially an army of 2,000,000 men.

The only and vital question that has been debated here the last three days is how shall these additional increments of 500,000 men be raised. Whether by permitting the States, based upon their population, to furnish their quota through volunteers in State units or by conscription and have the troops merged into one national force. I have followed the debate closely, and I still believe that the historic policy of volunteering followed in the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Mexican, the Civil, the Spanish-American Wars, and the recent Mexican difficulty should be adhered to.

I favor the volunteer system because it will provide an army of fighting men. The first installment of troops, when the emergency arises for them to be sent abroad, I want to be composed exclusively of fighters, as was the Canadian contingent comprising the famous Princess Patricia Regiment that bore the brunt of the fighting for Britain in the early days of the war. I want no laggards, no spineless, no courageless included under a conscript plan except as a last resort to raise the necessary strength.

You can not instill the fighting spirit into a mollycoddle. You must have the fighting spirit to face bullets born in a man if you are going to have that character of an army which characterized the Ironsides of Cromwell and which characterized all the volunteer forces of our own country from Revolutionary days to the present time.

Our first thought should be to provide the most efficient fighting force. The supporters of the conscript plan admit that the volunteers are far superior in fighting strength to those raised by their plan. It was further admitted that conscripting will deprive the country of hundreds of thousands of fighting men who are willing to go but who would be deprived by this lottery of selected draft. Under this conscription plan men who have the fighting spirit would not be privileged to enlist under the banner of Mr. Roosevelt or any other courageous leader—and there are plenty of them throughout the country—but would be forced to wait their selection by the grab-bag process, and might never be selected.

Oh, it is said that it is not the right of the individual to volunteer. Who ever claimed that it was the right of the American citizen to be President or to fill any other office? But since the foundation of the Government it has been, and still is, the privilege of a free American citizen to serve the Government in any capacity, and, above all, in that of the greatest of services, of upholding the country's position on the field of battle.

Under the War Department plan as embodied in the Senate bill—and no one is supporting that plan in this Chamber—every youth from 19 to 25, and none other, is obliged to serve. There are 7,000,000 between these ages, and it is proposed to have a selective lottery to choose first 500,000 and then another 500,000.

The machinery has not been provided at present to make the selection, and while this bill authorizes such machinery to be in readiness in case the million additional soldiers can not be raised by the volunteer system, I claim that such a method will work more harm to the country than good. What objection is raised by those opposed to this volunteer form, in spite of the grand record that has been made by them during the Civil War and ever since the inception of our Government? They claim they will not get the men. Let there be a call for volunteers to-morrow, and inside of a few months a half million will respond. Already more than 100,000 have offered their services to follow Mr. Roosevelt. Advice from officials connected with the National Guard from my own State are that many are but waiting the order of the War Department to enlist in State units. Certain I am that the 12,000 quota required to be raised by Wisconsin will be quickly enlisted. Wisconsin in every war since her admission to statehood has furnished its full quota of soldiers by the volunteer system. And if Wisconsin is able to do its duty, I shall assume that Kentucky and Massachusetts and every State of this Union will do likewise.

Oh, it is said that they may be needed in some other walk of life.

No better method of segregation and selection can be found for the country's welfare than that provided by the volunteer system. To exempt under the proposed selective draft system whole classes of industry is an artificial segregation that can not work equitably to the general public's advantage. Labor is mobile, and always will be. You can not in this country at the very outset establish a great paternalistic machine that has brought such eminence and success to the German forces. It is a vital objection to this selective conscription that they are proposing. It is not equal; it is not workable. When the forces volunteer, then the Government can at the very instant determine whether they are needed in the other walks of life.

Under this selective system, which is a mere lottery, a mere grab in the dark, you can not get the men who are really wanting to fight and carry on the struggle.

The claim made here this afternoon that 60,000 volunteers of the 2,000,000 men enlisted by Great Britain were recalled to follow industrial pursuits, is no argument against the adoption of the volunteer system by us. Everyone knows that at the outset of the war Great Britain was pressed for recruits, and it was more vital that it had recruits on the firing line to block the onward rush of the German Army than it was to hold back and await the establishment of munitions factories. That condition can not pertain in this country, nor has it pertained in Canada. If the volunteer system has been so faulty as is claimed by these recent converts to the militaristic policy of European countries that they have been severely criticizing, why is it that Canada and Australia have persisted in adhering to that ancient right of British subjects of first being given the privilege to serve their country. True, Canada had difficulty at the beginning in securing the necessary quota of men. At the close of the first year of the war only some 80,000 troops had been enlisted, but it ultimately raised more than 400,000 by the volunteer method, which I claim should be adopted in this country, no matter what it costs in dollars and cents.

In considering this question we should give first consideration to our internal policy, as to what is best for the welfare of our people at home. The war has come upon us of a sudden. Do you think that by inaugurating this autocratic policy of conscription that it is going to cause widespread approval and make the war popular generally at the start?

I have a slinking suspicion that the main reason for the War Department advocating the policy of conscription is the fear that the troops will not be forthcoming. I am not willing to surrender my faith in the patriotism of the people of this country to respond to duty at its call, because, forsooth, some Army officials wish to adopt the easiest method of enlisting men. The country has not been roused as yet to the necessity for enlisting. I want these patriotic meetings that only recently have been held to be general throughout the country and to continue for months and months. How much better to follow the method adopted by Canada and Australia, to have patriotic meetings to instill and arouse the patriotic spirit rather than adopt this conscript system, which will drag out unwilling men and cause further dissension? Why not allow free will to have sway and allow the patriotic force to grow, so that we can show to all the world that we are a united people?

Oh, the leader in the past two years of the war party in this House [Mr. GARDNER] and his followers say it would be an awful source of satisfaction to the Imperial German Government if it would be found that we could not raise these 500,000 by volunteers. Certainly it will be a rare source of satisfaction to the Imperial German Government to learn that for the first time in the history of our country we have been obliged to depart from the historic policy of volunteering and adopt the conscript system for raising troops.

No greater mistake, in my opinion, can be made than to adopt a foreign system, alien to our thought, unsuited to our institutions, and bound to create dissension among the masses. Better far to adhere to the volunteer system, that will enable the free will of fighting men to have their way. The House bill resorts to conscription without delay only in case volunteers are not forthcoming. I appeal to you not to adopt the plan of the War Department, that will conscript the youth of 19 to 25 and enable the able-bodied men from 21 to 40, as provided in the House bill, to volunteer as they desire. My faith in the patriotism of the American is undiminished. I have no question but what a half million men and another half million men can be raised by volunteers before the machinery of conscription can be put in force.

For the solidarity of this Nation, for the efficiency of its fighting Army, for its fairness to the men who will be called to the colors, I call upon you to vote with me in favor of the House bill and to vote down the pending amendment. Let conscription be once adopted as is proposed by the War Department, and the fighters can not be corraled into State or collective units, and many a brave man will be lost who wishes to serve our country because he has been denied the right to follow the leader or enter the company of his choosing.

I pray you not to permit King Conscript to go stalking through the land creating terror in all homes at the very threshold of the war, to lay the mailed hand of force upon unwilling youths when plenty of mature men are willing, without complaint, to do that greatest of all services for the Government, to die if need be on field of battle. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, when the war resolution was before the House I said I would vote against it and would defeat it if I could, and assume the responsibility before my God and my fellow men. But I also said that if war was declared I was for its prosecution to the end. I voted against war, but I say again to-night, since war has been declared, I am for its vigorous prosecution to a successful end.

I hope and believe I voice the sentiments of the great majority of those who agreed with the stand I took on April 6. Some who favor the volunteer system say, "Let those who favored this war fight the war." This can not be. This never has been. In the days gone by patriotic men who opposed war did not shirk their share of the burdens incident to war. Robert E. Lee and Sam Houston and Alexander Stevens opposed secession and the Civil War, but when the war came no one heard them called slackers. If the men in the North who voted against Abraham Lincoln and the principles for which he stood had refused to do their part when the war came, this Union would not have been saved. The constituted authorities of our country have decreed the present war, and it is the duty of those who opposed it and those who favored it to wage it to the end. I have received many letters and telegrams from the people of my district, not as the result of a propaganda, but because I asked for an expression of opinion. Some of them oppose the selective draft because they think the volunteer system is better. I have much sympathy for their views, because I am not willing to agree with the statement so lightly made upon this floor and throughout the country that the volunteer system is a failure. The stories of Gettysburg and Chancellorsville and Chickamauga and Savage Station and Malvern Hill bear testimony to the efficiency and valor of volunteers.

Many have wired and written me to stand by the President. This suggestion has great force. The great problem of government is to have a Government that will grant freedom of thought and speech and conduct to its people in time of peace and still be strong enough in time of war to prevent disaster. Washington said, "You can not conduct a war by a debating society." Since the beginning of the European conflict I have asserted that in time of peace it was the right and duty of a Representative boldly to discuss every question that might lead us to war. In time of war the situation is different. For the sake of efficiency and success, private citizens and Representatives must often yield their judgment to the judgment of the President, upon whose shoulders must rest the awful responsibility for the successful conduct of war.

In my speech against the war resolution on April 6 I indicated that I would not vote against conscription if conscription was necessary for success. I told my people last fall in almost every one of 86 speeches that war would probably bring conscription. I did not think that conscription would come at the very beginning of war. But the President has said that immediate selective conscription is essential to success. He has given many cogent reasons that to me are convincing. At this late stage of the debate I will not discuss the reasons in detail.

I do not say, like so many, that selective conscription is more democratic than volunteering. It is not democratic in the sense of equality for the Government to say that one man must plow and that another man must die. Neither is it democratic in the sense of equality for one man to volunteer to plow and another man to volunteer to die. Every man owes everything to his country, even his life, and the Government has a right, not with a view to favoritism but to prevent waste and promote efficiency and to secure success, to say what each man shall give for his country.

Those who favor the volunteer plan say that conscripts will not fight. This does not appeal to me. The Germans are conscripts, and they have fought. The French are conscripts, every one of them, and they are the ones that stopped the awful onslaught toward Paris and won the victory at the Marne.

Neither do I believe that selective conscription will carry a stigma with it when it is rightly understood. The so-called volunteer plan proposed by the majority of the committee carries the same stigma, if there is a stigma. It provides that conscription shall be set in motion while volunteers are being called for. Do you call it volunteering when you say to the men of our country, "Enlist now or we will conscript you next month"? Will those who volunteer to avoid conscription be braver than those who wait until conscription comes?

Under the proposed plan of selective conscription, as I see it, all men of military age will stand at attention and say, "Mr. President, how many men does our country need?" To his answer "500,000 at the start" they respond, "Put our names in the wheel and let the wheel turn, and the names of those who are drawn will go to the front."

Those of them who come back will not be frowned upon as cowards; those of them who fall may not have the word "volunteer" written on their tombstones, but written there will be the words "He died when his country called."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is unfortunate that those of us who had to present our views at the end of this debate are limited to such a short time. I have not one word to say that would detract in the least from the glorious record of the Volunteer Army of the past. I was one of them once upon a time. I am delighted to know that out of a membership of 22 Members on the floor of the House who were in the Spanish-American War, 17 of us are for the selective-conscription plan. In times of peace ordinary legislative questions coming up on the floor of the House upon which I must vote, I generally try to reflect the views of my immediate constituents. Next I consider the people of my beloved State; and third in importance, I try to look at the legislation as it affects our Nation.

In time of war I reverse my rule of conduct. I first look at what is for the best interests of the Nation. Now, let us see what this is. It is a question whether we shall get up an army by the volunteer system or by a selective draft.

The reason I am against the Dent bill as written is because it embraces all of the faults of both systems and contains absolutely none of the virtues of either. I can illustrate the conduct of the Military Affairs Committee in framing this double-barrel proposition best by a story that I have heard. It is threadbare I know. An old physician had been called in to see the mother-in-law of a young man. She was one of the sweet old creatures that we sons-in-law all love. She was desperately ill. The physician examined her and said that she must go to a hot climate immediately. The young man went out into the yard and brought in an old rusty ax, which he handed to the doctor and said, "Doctor, you hit her; I haven't got the nerve to do it." [Laughter.]

The Military Affairs Committee says to the President of the United States, "Mr. President, you conscript these men; we haven't got the nerve to do it." [Laughter and applause.] They try to make us believe that this is a volunteer bill that they have brought in, when, in fact, it actually ties out every man of eligible age and hands the President the end of the tether and says, "Pull him in, Mr. President." Why did they want to create two classes—the willing and the unwilling? Make heroes of one and scalawags of another.

Now, they cast some aspersions on the General Staff. Every one of these nations at war has had to weed out the "carpet knights" of the regular army, and we will probably have to do it. We will probably find some inefficient men in our General Staff, and they will prove themselves inefficient within a short time after they are given an opportunity to exercise command. But who are we to follow? We followed the President in the declaration of war; we followed the President without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t" in a seven-billion bond issue. Now, since we have arrived at that particular point in this great crisis gentlemen want us to furnish some other means than that which he recommends to raise an army, after he has advised for weeks with our General Staff and his Cabinet. I am unwilling to do it. I believe that if there is a time in the history of this country when we ought to follow the advice and counsel of those in a position to best know what the real situation is, it is at this time.

So far as I am personally concerned I do not know how my district stands on the question of volunteer or the selective-conscription army. It is not a question for my people alone to decide. We are at war. It is a question for those who have the best opportunity of knowing what to do to decide this question, and my people are patriotic enough to abide by that decision.

Mr. Chairman, what is the real difference between conscription as applied during the War between the States and selective draft as contemplated by the bill of the administration?

Conscription dragged into the service a class of men who had demonstrated to the Government that they were either unpatriotic, cowardly, or selfish, by a failure to respond to the repeated calls of their country to go to its defense upon the field of battle. It compelled men to fight for their country who were willing to let the brave and patriotic men of the Nation assume the whole burden of defending its honor and sustaining its Army. A class of men willing to let others bleed and die while they remained at home in idleness and comfort. This is the class of men whom we associate with the word conscript.

Selective draft is the exact antithesis of conscription. It assumes all men to be brave and patriotic. It recognizes the principle of equal obligation resting upon all citizens to defend their country's honor in time of war. It eliminates the possibility of leaving the odium upon a portion of its citizens to be known in the future history of our country as slackers and cowards.

It scientifically selects those upon whom the country relies to vindicate its honor and sustain the glory of its traditions upon the field of battle. It takes into consideration the multifarious duties devolving upon all citizens to sustain the Government and the armies in the field upon a basis of maximum efficiency. It gathers the Army in a speedy, certain, scientific, economical, and business-like manner, profiting by the experience of every nation on earth that efficiency along the battle line can not be maintained without complete organization and a maximum of efficiency behind the battle line. [Applause.]

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, as I have listened to this debate during the past week I have come to the conclusion that a man must act in regard to this question in accordance with one of the two theories of government under which civilized men live. If I had any doubt about that proposition, that doubt was removed to-day when I listened to the remarkable speech of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. I believe that he made as good a presentation as could be made of that side of this question, and I believe that the idea over which he enthused most is the foundation idea underlying the proposition to draft men into the Army without giving them even a chance to volunteer.

Mr. HILLIARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HILLIARD. Will the gentleman kindly explain what difference there is between drafting a man into the Army, as provided in the pending amendment, in its last analysis, and the Prussian system against which we are waging war?

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the gentleman asked the question, because it brings me to the thought I was about to express a little more quickly than I would have reached it otherwise. We declared this war for world democracy, at least we said it was for world democracy, and now in the very beginning we propose to adopt a principle of raising an army which I submit is the cornerstone principle of German militarism, namely, compulsory service.

TWO KINDS OF GOVERNMENT.

As I was saying, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] enthused to-day as he quoted from The Man Without a Country. He quoted the statement as to the boy, saying, "You belong to your country, just as you do to your mother." Think of that, gentlemen. There are only two theories of government. One is that the Government owns the people, and the other is that the people own the Government. I have believed ever since the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were adopted that this was a Nation in which the people owned the Government. [Applause.] But the gentleman's theory is that the Government owns the people and may take their services and their lives however and whenever it desires.

As I said a moment ago, when this Congress declared war, those who declared it said it was for democracy. I did not think that was the real reason then, but I bowed to the will of the majority and am anxious now to do everything I can to help bring it to a successful conclusion. Since it is a war for democracy, we should wage it with that ideal in mind. The foundation principles of democracy are first, the right of the people to work their will in government; and second, freedom for the individuals who compose the people.

SELECTIVE DRAFT DESTROYS DEMOCRACY.

I do not know the people's will on the question of the selective-draft plan of raising an army. Nobody here knows their will. We do know, however, that the voluntary plan of raising an army is in harmony with our history as a people and that it not only maintains the freedom of the individual citizen but permits the widest exercise of that freedom, while the conscription plan violates and overrides it absolutely and entirely. I want to be fair enough to say, though, that if it is necessary to override that freedom in order to preserve the life of the Nation, then, of course, either that freedom must be sacrificed or the Nation must go down. Does that condition exist now? Let us see. Why must we abandon the volunteer system?

IS THE VOLUNTEER PLAN A FAILURE?

Those who favor drafting only the boys between 19 and 25 say it is necessary because the volunteer plan has always been a failure. Members of Congress have said that on this floor so often that it has become axiomatic with them. The newspapers have printed it so many times that many patriotic and liberty-loving people have come to believe it is absolutely true. But is it true? The answer depends entirely upon what test we apply to the volunteer system to determine whether or not it is true.

If the test be whether or not the volunteer system will enable the military chieftains by flashing a single word over the telegraph wires of the Nation to mobilize millions of men in 24 or 48 hours, as Germany did at the beginning of this war, the system is a failure.

If the test be whether or not the volunteer system will enable these military chieftains to invade a foreign country almost before that country has learned that war has been declared, the system is a failure. If the test be whether or not it will enable the military chieftains to call out a half million or million men to-day and another half million or million next week, without regard to the sentiment or desires of the people of the Nation, then that system is again a failure. But are these the true tests of a military system in time of war in a Republic such as ours? I think not, and I will tell you why. The Bible says, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" I say unto you, "What shall it profit a free and independent people if they whip the world and lose their own freedom?" [Applause.]

TRUE TEST OF VOLUNTEER SYSTEM.

The true test of the volunteer or any other system is whether or not it enables this Nation to win its wars and maintain its democratic principles and free institutions. Measured by that test, the volunteer system was a success in 1776. It was a success in 1812. It was a success in 1862 and 1898, and, if given a fair trial, it will be a success in this war. [Applause.] I have not time to review history to show how on thousands of battle fields, the world around, the volunteer soldier has proved his superiority over the conscript. We have not had much experience with conscripts here in America. The most striking example I recall is the conscript Hessians sent over by the English king in the Revolution, and Washington, after crossing the Delaware on the ice with his little band of volunteers one morning before breakfast, captured the whole lot without the loss of a single man. [Applause.]

From Marathon, where 11,000 Greek volunteers routed 100,000 Persian conscripts, until now the volunteer soldier has carried the flag of liberty and democracy. From the days of Lexington and Bunker Hill until the beginning of this war none have ever dared attack him or his glorious record. [Applause.]

OBJECTIONS TO VOLUNTEER SYSTEM REMOVED.

If the volunteer plan of raising armies and fighting will not be a success now, why not? Have the American people lost their patriotism? I challenge any man in this House to make such an assertion. Is this war unpopular? Surely no gentleman who three weeks ago was saying the people were clamoring for a declaration of war will say that. I doubt that even those who opposed the war think that, because, whatever may have been the differences among the people before the war began, those differences are surely dead now. No, my friends, no such arguments are made on this floor. What do those who insist that Americans shall not be allowed to volunteer if they want to—what do they say? They say that some men would volunteer who can render more service at home. Not under the volunteer plan of this bill, because it provides that the President may reject any man who would be exempt under conscription.

They say that the officers would be politicians and other local leaders without military training. Not under this bill, because it provides the volunteer companies shall be officered in the same way as under the draft plan.

Some Members say we can not secure the volunteers and that there will be delay. I do not believe that, nor do I think many Members of Congress believe it, but even if that should prove to be true this bill empowers the President to draft the men. It will take three or four months' preparation before the draft can be made, according to the War Department. Why under the shining heavens should not we let the men and boys who want to volunteer do so and begin training? Whether the men of the new Army be volunteers or drafted men, they must be trained. Why not let the volunteers begin training at once instead of waiting for months before conscription can begin? The only reason I know is that the Army chieftains of the War College and the money power of America desire to fasten the compulsory military system on our heretofore free and independent people, and they are afraid if the President issues a call for volunteers the men will volunteer in such large numbers there will be no excuse for conscription. [Applause.]

Other members have said that the trying out of the volunteer system will give us a mixed army of volunteers and conscripts. Well, what of that? Capt. Benson of the English Army testified before the Military Committee that the mixing of volunteers and conscripts had caused no trouble. Let me call your attention to the fact, though, that if the volunteer plan succeeds in raising the required number of men there will be no mixing with conscripts, because there will be no conscripts. Even if we adopt the conscript plan now and stop volunteering, the volunteers already in the Army and the National Guard will be mixed with the conscripts. They do not even propose that we shall conscript men for the Navy. Is the Navy more sacred than the Army? Why limit patriotic Americans to enlistment for fighting on water?

NOT UNIVERSAL TRAINING.

But probably the most common and most misleading reason given for the adoption of the draft system is that it applies the principle of universal military service. That argument has been made here, even by Members of this House. The newspapers have given that impression all over the Nation. I have received hundreds of letters and telegrams urging me to support the War Department's Army bill, because it applies the principle of universal military service. Men and women everywhere want the War Department bill passed, because they think it provides universal training for boys and universal service for men.

Now, what is the truth about that bill proposed by the War Department and the President? The truth is it does not apply the principle of universal military service, nor of universal military training, nor even of universal service at all. In the first place it exempts all the females, or about 50,000,000 young and old. It exempts about 30,000,000 males under 19 and over 45 years of age and then of the 20,000,000 of fighting age it exempts all over 25 years old, or 13,000,000 more, and then of the 7,000,000 remaining exempts one in every 14, because only 500,000 are to be chosen. The other 6,500,000 are not to be trained at all. Some will be exempted to work in factories or on farms, but not as soldiers. Now, what kind of universal service do you call that? It is not universal service, universal training, nor is there anything universal about it, and every man here knows it. No, it is now called the selective draft. I don't know just how this selective draft is to be worked out. Neither do you gentlemen. Neither does anybody else, or if he does he will not tell. [Applause.]

I can not find out the details nor could the Military Committee find out the details of this proposed system, but as near as we can get at it, the plan is something like this:

The War Department will register or enroll all of the boys between 19 and 25 and out of the 7,000,000 boys select 500,000, exempting such as the members of the boards of county officials see fit. In other words, certain Army officers and their subordinates will decree who shall go to slaughter and who shall not. They will say to one boy, "You can stay at home," and to another, "You must go." That is not calling all the men to colors, not even all the young men. That is a case of "Many are called but few are chosen," and may God have mercy on those who are chosen. There is no assurance but that before they get done with this drafting business mercy will be desired by those who put it into effect. [Applause.]

HEROES AT HOME.

No, Mr. Chairman, this is not universal military service, but simply a system of taking the boys of America by force, if necessary, and sending them to Europe to do the fighting in the trenches and making it possible for the men over 25 to be heroes at home. By this plan these men over 25 will be able to say they were anxious to go, but under the plan adopted by Congress they could not. Oh, do you wonder that business men, professional men, editors, and others who wanted this war are now so enthusiastic for the War Department bill? I know some of them are willing to go, but in what capacity?

I have received many letters and telegrams from men offering to go to war as officers or to serve in the quartermaster or some other noncombatant department, but I have had none who are under 45 years of age offering to serve in the ranks and die in the ditch. They are all in favor of this selective draft by which the young men under 25 will do all that. Well, all that I can say is that this Congress may swallow the draft part of the bill, but I refuse to believe that a majority of the Members of the two great legislative bodies of this Nation will ever permit that part of the War Department and President's plan to be adopted by which we shall take only the boys to the trenches. [Applause.] In my judgment, such a plan of raising an army is unworthy of a great, intelligent, humane people. If I had my way, in case it becomes necessary to draft, I would draft nobody under 22, and I certainly would never permit newspaper editors, professional men, and business men to be exempt. [Applause.]

I have now discussed the principal objections brought forward against the volunteer system and not a single one of them has any foundation. When put through the crucible of criticism, there is nothing left but dross.

REASONS FOR VOLUNTEER PLAN.

Now, what are some of the reasons for adopting and using the volunteer plan? It seems to me it is more important that we use the volunteer system in this war than in any war we have ever had. Why? Because this war was declared for democracy, world democracy. It is extremely important, therefore, to show the German people, and especially the people of the other nations of the world, that we can assist in the overthrow of Prussianism without resorting to the cornerstone principle of German militarism, namely, compulsory service; at least not in the very beginning of the war. If we adopt conscription without even trying the volunteer plan, it is a confession of one of two things: Either the war is extremely unpopular, and we are afraid Americans will not volunteer, or else we can not carry on a war for democracy and retain the democratic institutions we ask the world to adopt.

Another reason why I favor raising all the men possible by the volunteer system is that our Army must meet the best soldiers on earth to-day. The volunteers will make the best army our country can produce, because of the spirit they will possess, while if we resort to conscription and take the loafers and slackers, and we are told they are the ones this plan proposes to get, what kind of an army shall we have? To me the worst of it is there will be some mighty fine patriotic fellows who must be mixed in with those of the second rate and disgraceful class whom it is necessary to conscript.

VOLUNTEER SYSTEM IN ENGLAND.

Much has been said about the experience of the other English-speaking countries in this war. Men say, "Look at England." They say the volunteer system has been a failure there. All right, let us look at England. She is winning the war and with volunteers, too. What has happened? She raised more than 5,000,000 volunteers. If we were to do as well, we would raise 15,000,000 volunteers before we would resort to the draft. England has raised only about 1,000,000 by draft, and they have never yet gotten to the Continent. If she had used the draft in the beginning she would probably have had such great internal troubles it would have taken most of her regular army to get the conscripts. Canada has not resorted to the draft. Neither has Australia, and even if they should resort to it now, that would be exactly what this bill permits, namely, to resort to the draft when the volunteer plan will not produce the men. In Australia they had a referendum on conscription, and voted it down overwhelmingly. Even the Australian soldiers in the trenches voted against conscripting other Australians for the over-seas army. And the proposal there was not the straight draft, without giving men a chance to volunteer, as the War Department bill is. Their plan provided that if a sufficient number failed to volunteer, then the draft should be used; but even that was voted down. That was in a colony of the British Empire, not here in America, "The land of the free and the home of the brave."

JEFFERSON AND LINCOLN WOULD OPPOSE.

The names of great men have been used in this debate, it being claimed that Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln favored the draft. There is absolutely not a scintilla of evidence anywhere in history to show that either of these great characters favored such a proposition as is asked for by the War Department. What Thomas Jefferson said was that he favored military training for all the boys of the country. That was at the time of the War of 1812, too. But he not only did not favor the draft, but in a letter to John Adams about the same time expressly declared against the draft system.

Mr. Lincoln never favored the draft until it had proved impossible to get sufficient volunteers. He said:

> We must somehow obtain more men or relinquish the original object of the contest, with all the blood and treasure expended in the effort to secure it. * * * We have ceased to obtain them voluntarily.

Another great democrat of the world who, we are told, favored conscription is Lloyd-George; but not before volunteers had been called for. He said at the time of the adoption of this draft bill in England:

> We can find no other means of getting men; we must get them immediately.

NOT GENERAL-STAFF BILL.

Why, gentlemen, not even the General Staff of our own Army favor the War Department bill as the testimony before the Military Committee proves. That bill is here because the president of the War College and the Secretary of War and the President want it. Cabinet officers and war secretaries are not infallible. What has happened in France? Why twice her cabinet has been changed because the French people thought those managing the war had made serious mistakes. What about England? Her premier, the real head of the Government, has twice been changed, and to-day Lloyd-George, a man from civil life, repeatedly hooted and jeered at by the press of England and the military authorities in the past, is now the supreme character of this world war. [Applause.] Yet when a Member of the American Congress dares to suggest that Cabinet members or military chieftains may be wrong, he is called unpatriotic and accused of helping the Kaiser.

SHOULD CONGRESS BE ABOLISHED?

If a Member of Congress is to hold his nose, shut his eyes and ears, and refuse to listen or think on any proposition presented here by the administration during this war and simply vote "aye" and excuse himself by saying he must "stand by the President," what sense is there in having a Congress in existence, much less in session? Why not save the expense and put the Members in positions in which they can be of some service to the country? I think we, too, should be subject to draft, if anybody is subject to draft, and I intend to vote to strike out the exemption of Members of Congress. I shall do this although I voted against declaring war and am one of those who will be subject to go, too, because of my age and my not having dependents. It is a singular thing that in this country which we call a democracy the only people who can not be made to fight have the power to declare war, while those who must fight and die have nothing to say about it.

But, as I was saying, Mr. Chairman, Congress has something more to do in a crisis like this than simply to accept anything and everything in the way of legislation proposed by the President and his appointees. In critical times like these it is our business to examine, consider, and change, if in the judgment of the majority changes are desirable in, all measures presented to us. Our first duty is to the American people, and I for one intend to discharge that duty as I see it in regard to this and every other measure which may come before this House.

A LONG RACE TO RUN.

Much has been said about how we are to get started in this war. Let us look a little further. Let us consider the fact that we propose to fight to the finish and win at the finish, too. I can not use more effective language to describe the situation confronting us, as I see it, than that great Democrat and ex-governor of Nebraska, Mr. SHALLENBERGER, used the other day, when he said:

> I have never seen prizes paid nor results decided at the start of any race. If the race was long and hard, as this race was bound to be, since its course ran round the world, the race was sure not to go to the swiftest at the start, but to the racer that would run true to the stretch, that could stand the whip and spur when the race was heartbreaking, and the spurs are driven deep into the heaving flanks, and the cruel whip beats upon the struggling shoulders of the racers. In that sort of a race the volunteer soldier has never failed to run true to the finish and be in at the death. When the German autocracy shall finally be no more and democracy and enduring peace shall reign throughout the earth, the verdict of history shall be that the soldier that finally triumphed over military autocracy in this Armageddon of the world was the English-speaking volunteer.

PUBLIC SENTIMENT NECESSARY TO WIN WAR.

Mr. Chairman, there are three requirements for winning a war. This is especially true if the war is to be long, and we are told this war will be a long war. These requirements are first, men; second, supplies in the form of food, munitions, and money; and third, public sentiment to support the war. There will be no trouble about getting the men or supplies, but what about public sentiment? Much has been said in this debate about the value of the opinions of military experts. I agree that military experts must be relied upon in the handling of armies and the fighting of battles, but I fear they know very little about the common people from among whom the men who are to do the fighting and the dying must come. I am not a military man. I know nothing of military affairs, but I think I do know something of the common people of whom I have just spoken. I came up from them, and I am not so far removed from them either by experiences or by years as to have forgotten their viewpoint.

Let us apply the two proposed methods of raising this army to the people and consider what the results will be. This selective-draft system—which, as I stated before, nobody knows just what it is, but, as near as we can find out—will work something like this: After the census of the boys who are available has been made, the Army officers or their subordinates, whether they be local officers or not, will then select by lot the name of one out of every 15 or 20 boys, and these officials will then have power to exempt such of those that are drawn as they see fit, and say finally which boys shall stay at home and which shall go to the trenches.

First, take the case of the boy whose name is drawn, who is willing to go and whose parents are willing he should go. He will feel and they will feel that he is the victim of this system. While there may be no opposition to his going, there will be but little patriotic sentiment developed as a result. They will feel that their boy was the victim of a lottery, while other boys remained at home. This is the very best possible result that can be had under this selective-draft system.

Let us next take the case of the boy who is unwilling and whose parents are unwilling that he should go. He does not report to the recruiting station. An officer with a squad of men goes out to get him, and they take him peaceably if possible, but forcibly if necessary. What is the result in the heart of that boy? He feels an injustice was done him, and in the hearts of those parents there is the same feeling of injustice and resentment which in time will develop into bitterness.

A third case—and I hope there will be few, if any, of these—is where the boy and his parents are so unwilling that they will resist his being taken by force. Bloodshed will follow, and I need not describe the effect that will have on public sentiment in that home. But much as I fear such a condition, I hope there will be few, if any, of these cases. Taking the very best view possible of it, then, there is nothing in the selective-draft system to maintain a favorable public sentiment, to say nothing of building up and developing such a sentiment.

Now, let us apply the volunteer system to the same situation. The President issues a call for volunteers. The boy, if he lives in the country, has been to town, or if in the city, has been down street, and has become enthused with the idea of volunteering and fighting for his country. He comes home and tells his parents that he wants to go. I can see his father shaking his head and saying, "I don't know about that, my boy. You better think about it pretty carefully." And I can hear his mother saying, "No, no, my boy; not yet anyhow." But the boy is enthusiastic. He knows that other boys are going and the ideals of liberty and democracy placed in his heart by his parents and his teacher—the teachers of America, God bless them! They have done a wonderful work in this country—and with such ideals the boy insists that he must go. He says his forefathers went to fight for liberty and that he should not be hindered from going, too. Then I see that father, the pride of having reared such a son, overcoming his fears and he gradually reaching the conclusion in his own mind that he should not interfere. I can see that mother, too. Her love for her boy fighting against her love for her country until the two blend into one, and with misty eyes and trembling lips she decides she must make the sacrifice. So the next morning the parents give up their boy and he goes away to war. What is the effect on public sentiment in that home? Are those parents resentful? Are they bitter? Not at all. They are proud that their boy has had the patriotism to volunteer. Are they interested in the success of the war? To ask that question is to answer it. Their hopes are in it, their hearts are in it, their own flesh and blood are in it, and they are willing to do anything, to sacrifice everything if need be, to bring it to a successful conclusion. [Applause.]

CONSCRIPTION V. VOLUNTEERING.

Now, gentlemen, which of these plans should we adopt? Either plan will produce an army. Under the draft system you will have an Army made up of men who feel they are the victims of the system, some of whom feel that injustice and unfairness was practiced against them.

Under the draft system the homes from which these boys come, at the very best, will radiate only the spirit of submission to being victims of a lottery system, while in some instances they will become festering sores which will eat away the very roots of our national patriotic impulses. Under the volunteer system every home from which a soldier comes will radiate the spirit of patriotic pride because of the sacrifice that has been made willingly and freely. Such homes will be fountains of patriotism that will well up with irresistible force, developing a public support of the war that will be worth more than all the conscripts that could ever be placed on the battle field.

The draft system maintains and develops a spirit of submission. The volunteer system creates and encourages the spirit of sacrifice. By which of these spirits do you think America will be more likely to win this war and at the same time keep her ideals and her free institutions when the war is over? For my part I can not see how any man inspired by the spirit of America can favor anything but a trial of the volunteer system, and I believe that the adoption of a system which prohibits men a chance to volunteer will be a dark spot on the pages of American history which must and will be erased when the forces of democracy again come into play in the minds and hearts of our people. [Applause.]

Gentlemen here have said we should vote for this draft bill because the President and the War Department recommend it. If this were purely an administrative measure, I would agree. But this involves principles; in fact, the foundation principles of the Republic. These scientific War College gentlemen do not represent the people nor do they consider the principles involved. Simply because they arrogate to themselves the power to formulate laws under which men whom we represent must give up their lives is no reason why we should violate our convictions and annihilate the freedom of the sovereign citizens of the Nation, especially when nobody has shown any valid reasons whatever for such a drastic deed. It is our duty to protect the freedom of the people and save to them their traditions, their liberties, and their lives.

If this bill is passed, it means the beginning of militarism in America. It means that that powerful cabal composed of scientific military chieftains and the money kings have won. The military experts have persuaded the President and the money kings, through the newspapers, have persuaded a large part of the people into supporting the draft bill. But this is only the first battle, because militarism and democracy can not exist together, and the American people will never give up their heritage, cost what it may in treasure and in blood. Let me close by saying this, gentlemen: In the battles yet to come, as in this struggle, I shall always be found fighting for the cause of democracy which has grown and grown in the hearts of men and which can never be permanently overturned in free America. [Applause.]

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the administration program on this measure. A few days ago I received a letter from a constituent of mine at Madison, S. Dak., inclosing an advertisement for farm hands, guaranteeing the workmen against conscription, as follows:

MADISON, S. DAK., April 17, 1917.

Hon. C. H. DILLON.

DEAR SIR: I am inclosing you an ad. which I cut out of Dakota Farmer. Seems to me that there is no use urging farmers to grow more crops if our friends to the north take advantage of us in this shape. Two men of this neighborhood left last Saturday, and I understand that young men are leaving St. Paul at the rate of 20 per day. Wish you would bring it to the attention of the proper authorities.

Respectfully, yours,

CARL CHRISTIANSEN.

FARM HANDS WANTED—WESTERN CANADA FARMERS REQUIRE 50,000 AMERICAN FARM LABORERS AT ONCE.

Urgent demand sent out for farm help by the Government of Canada. Good wages. Steady employment. Low railway fares. Pleasant surroundings. Comfortable homes. No compulsory military service. Farm hands from the United States are absolutely guaranteed against conscription. This advertisement is to secure farm help to replace Canadian farmers who have enlisted for the war.

A splendid opportunity for the young man to investigate western Canada's agricultural offerings, and to do so at no expense.

Only those accustomed to farming need apply.

For particulars as to railway rates and districts where labor is required, or other information regarding western Canada, apply to M. J. Johnstone, Drawer 197, Watertown, S. Dak., authorized Canadian Government agent.

I would like to know if any steps have been taken to stop these advertisements. I have heard that they would be discontinued, but have no positive knowledge on the subject.

This afternoon I received a protest from a South Dakota mother, a pitiful one. Let me read it.

CANTON, S. DAK., April 21, 1917.

Mr. CHARLES DILLON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the mothers of South Dakota boys from 19 to 23, protest against the drafting of children, compelling them against their will to enter the slaughter trenches across the sea. Oh pitiful! Send men if sacrifice we must have; men from 30 to 40. We mothers have a God-given right to have a voice in this matter, and we protest with all our souls against conscription.

ONLY A SOUTH DAKOTA MOTHER.

I voted against the war resolution believing that my people did not want war; that a great Christian Nation could without sacrifice of national honor overlook wrongs inflicted jointly on all neutral nations, and ought to avoid war against a people that bore us no evil.

Congress, in its wisdom, has declared war. Every patriotic citizen should now respond to the Nation's call for service and bear the burdens laid upon him. This war will tax the coming generations. Sorrow, distress, misery, and death will follow its trail, yet I believe the American people will patiently bear all of these burdens even to crucifixion itself, if need be, in defense of our liberties.

The administration forces want an army selected on universal liability to service. The opponents want a volunteer army, to be followed by conscription if necessary. Three weeks have passed since the declaration of war, and everyone knows that our efforts to secure volunteers in the Regular Army and National Guard have proved unsuccessful.

To mobilize an army composed partially of volunteers and partially of conscripts would be a dangerous experiment in time of peril; an experiment too great to risk at this time. I can see no good reason why we should refuse to follow the military men, skilled in the arts of war, the recommendation of our Commander in Chief, and the War and Navy Departments. They are the military experts of the Government. Let us ungrudgingly give them the men and money, so that the war may be brought to a successful issue as speedily as possible.

I can see nothing unfair in universal obligation to service. Every person between 21 and 40 years of age is to be enrolled for military service. The obligation and duty rests upon all of them equally. All of them can not go to war. Some must remain on the farms, some in factories and mines, and some must go to the front to fight the battles.

Under the enrollment system no one is stigmatized. All are treated with equality. Under this system the soldier, the miner, the farmer, and the mechanic are all selected by the Government and placed where each can give the greatest service without injury to any class engaged in service. All who are enrolled are utilized and mobilized as the Nation's protectors in that service in which they can do the most good.

Those who march to the battle line are the Government's soldiers especially selected for that purpose. They wear a badge of honor and become representatives of the Government on the battle line.

By adopting selective conscription upon universal obligation to service in the beginning we place them upon an equal footing. Their responsibility becomes equal in the defense of our country in the hour of peril.

Since war has been declared, we must get quickly an efficient army, and I believe this is the only way we can get it. The volunteer system may be all right, but it does not reach this emergency and under it the burden does not rest on all equally.

We are consuming one week's time in discussing this bill. Too much talking, too little action. The discussion in the House on the resolution to declare war consumed one day. When we passed the war resolution we pledged the resources of the Government for the prosecution of the war. I am ready to vote all the men and all the money necessary to bring the issue to a close as speedily as possible, and shall support the administration program, which program was virtually adopted when we declared war.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there has been much said in this debate about the Volunteers and the possible reflection upon them so far as concerns this amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. For that reason I feel it not inappropriate that I should say a word with reference to that. It was my honor and privilege to be one of those who volunteered in the Spanish War, and to be with those splendid men in the direct command of Gen. Joe Wheeler at Santiago. My experience with the Volunteers and my knowledge gained from long association with those who served in the Spanish War and in the Philippines, through an organization—the United Spanish War Veterans—which we formed and which has been in existence since that time, and of which I recently was the head, convince me, and I speak, I believe, for practically all of those men when I say it, that the best interests of the country, the best interests of the men who serve, will come through the adoption of the program outlined in the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, which is advocated by the President and the General Staff of the Army. I have been in favor of this for a number of years, and I am glad to see my country adopting this patriotic and splendid program.

It will not be considered a reflection upon the American soldier to have it said of him that his Government came to him and said that his services were needed. I wish that I might be one of those fortunate men to be called in this war that we have now with the Imperial Government of Germany. I would feel that I had been especially and signally honored, and so will it be with all of the Americans who are thus called to the colors. It is equal, it is fair, it is a just way to be called to serve your country, and that is the feeling and the judgment of the great majority of the men who served in the War between the States. I have in my district three posts of Grand Army veterans, I have one camp of Confederate veterans, and five camps of men who served in the later war, and all of these men believe that this measure, this amendment as proposed by Mr. KAHN, advocated by the Government at this time, is the right way, the best way, and the fair way to conduct the war and to raise an army. It is a pleasure for me to vote for this measure, which takes in all of the American people upon the same basis and leaves at the same time men in civil pursuits who can go on and attend to the things that are as important as being a soldier, staying at home and attending to the things that are necessary to maintain the Government and the Army; and I believe that this amendment as proposed will bring to this country the most splendid Army, the most patriotic Army, and the noblest Army of young manhood that has ever been called to the colors in the history of the country, one that will bring glory to the flag; and when they are called I believe that they will feel that they are signally and especially honored. There is no reflection upon a man being called upon to serve his country in war. His duty is to his country, and he can make no nobler sacrifice than to give his life to his country, be it in this or any other war in which his country is engaged. [Applause.]

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, the issue presented in the bill is whether 500,000 volunteer soldiers can be raised out of a possible 20,000,000 of men from 21 to 40 years of age, while the necessary machinery required for conscription is being installed and perfected and the Regular Army and the National Guard are being recruited by volunteers to their authorized full strength.

Unwilling to throw the volunteer system into the discard and junk pile without a test for raising the first 500,000 soldiers, I supported that feature of the bill; after the volunteer system was rejected, I voted for the conscript system, because we can not wage war without an army. The volunteer system is not an experiment.

Every war that the United States has ever waged has been fought and won by the volunteer system. There were over 2,000,000 volunteer Federal soldiers and over a million volunteer Confederate soldiers in the Civil War. It has been the system by which Great Britain, whose Government dates back almost a thousand years, has raised her armies with which she has successfully waged war in—except when she was defeated by the volunteer soldiers under Washington—every quarter of the globe. So successful has the volunteer system proven to her that the sun never sets upon her possessions and dominions. There are 5,000,000 volunteer British soldiers in the field today. Canada, with a population not exceeding 8,000,000 people, now has 400,000 volunteer soldiers, and Australia, with a population no greater than Illinois, now has 264,000 volunteer soldiers in Europe. In this sense it is old-fashioned, but none the less effective and efficient. The bill provides that the proposed volunteer and conscript soldiers are to be officered and trained by the same officers. The volunteer system is one of the distinguishing elements that constitutes the difference between the liberal monarchical Government of Great Britain and autocratic Prussianism, which is based primarily and essentially upon conscription. In fact, conscription is the nursery of militarism; it is the handmaid of autocracy, the corner stone of imperialism, and the bulwark of the autocrat. I am one of those who believe that the best way to keep Prussianism out of the United States is to sow as few of its seed here as possible. Conscription is the instrument by which countries at war may be bled white, and in this sense it is modern and up to date, and it assumes that the Government's highest business is war. I hope and trust that a way may be found for this Republic to escape such a scourge. Let no one confuse universal training with conscription.

There are three things vitally essential in war—men, money, and morale, the spirit, zeal, hope, and confidence of the soldiers, and the latter is almost as essential as either of the others. It is the propelling power that drives the army forward as steam does the locomotive. It is the current that vitalizes the wire and lights the way. It is the irresistible force of the onsweeping torrent. The volunteer, whether by reason of spirit of adventure or by reason of conviction of the justness and righteousness of the cause and principles for which he fights, possesses in a greater degree the irresistible driving force that carries men through the firing line of the enemy. The conscript lacks zeal and enthusiasm, so essential and indispensable for that purpose.

I recognize the immensity of the task upon which we have embarked; that tremendous sacrifices will have to be made by the people of the United States before peace is established. We have voted $7,000,000,000 for war purposes, a sum of money unparalleled in the history of the world. We have contributed our entire Navy, the Regular Army, and the National Guard, totaling a million soldiers; we are dividing without reservation our foodstuffs and necessaries of life for which we ourselves are now compelled to pay almost famine prices; we are furnishing all of our merchant ships to carry this foodstuff and these supplies to the allies in Europe; we are building a fleet of a thousand merchantmen in order to keep a constant stream of supplies of all character and kinds flowing to the allies; we propose to assist in sweeping the ocean clear of the submarines. Are these not substantial initial contributions commensurate with our obligations in a war for which we are not responsible but that was forced on us as a result of the European war between nations bound together by war compacts, covenants, and treaties? Certainly it is more than Japan has done, which was in this war from the beginning by reason of these very war compacts, covenants, and treaties.

The French and English are smashing the Hindenberg line daily. The Russians and the English are driving the Turkish line farther and farther back into Turkey. The man power of Germany is being exhausted at a tremendous rate; she is walled in with an iron band; her food supplies must be wellnigh exhausted; internal dissension, strikes amounting almost to revolution are reported daily; the Empire must be in a state of exhaustion. Germany is in the condition of the South in the closing year of the Civil War.

I do not believe that American patriotism is dead. I believe that there are more than 500,000 men fit for service, willing to serve in this war because of the murder of Americans and piracy on American property committed by Germany. I am fortified in this belief by the statement of those in position to know that over 100,000 Americans have offered to follow Roosevelt to France. Her ruthless destruction of American ships and American lives without notice or warning was no less an act of war against the people of the United States than if by order and direction of the German Government our coast cities had been bombarded, our freight and passenger trains, railroad bridges and tunnels had been destroyed in the same manner that our oversea carriers have been submarined. It was the ruthless submarine warfare of Germany that drew the United States into this war. When American genius has found the key and answer, as I believe it will, to this new method of destructive warfare, it will have rendered infinitely greater service than any number of millions of soldiers that we may send to France.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, all our people are impressed with the horrors and sorrows of war so profoundly that I need not suggest one word of admonition or regret to make more emphatic the sadness with which our Nation faces the present crisis. On the 5th of this month the Congress of the United States, by solemn declaration and by overwhelming vote, affirmed the existence of a state of war between this country and Germany.

To every thoughtful person these propositions, it would seem, should be beyond dispute. It is our duty to bring the war to an end at the earliest possible moment. It is our duty to make our undertaking successful. It is our duty to preserve human life and to adopt such a course as will minimize sorrow to the greatest extent within our power. It is our duty to devise a plan that during the war will insure the greatest tranquillity in economic conditions upon the farm, in the mine, in the mill, the factory, and the shop. Again, it is our duty, as Members of this body, to forget everything of personal interest and to consider our action here only as that action has to do with the welfare of our Nation, the attainment of peace, and the preservation of the lives and property of our people and the peoples of the world. Better a thousand times that a Member of this body do his duty in helping to define a right policy though it mean political oblivion for him, than that by doing an act that strikes a compromise with his conscience he help to adopt a course that would mean so much as the sacrifice of one human life.

What, then, is the issue? There are two propositions of large magnitude before this body. One of them is the proposition, for which the administration stands, of providing an army to meet the present emergency that will be based upon what is known as the selective draft. The other is to raise an army based upon the idea that is recommended by the majority of the Members of the Military Affairs Committee, a plan that is known as the volunteer system of enlistment; and if that shall fail, or if the President does not desire to use it, then upon the basis of a selective draft. We have heard pretty words with regard to the volunteer system appealing to everything in the heart of sentimental character, and I must confess that if the arguments of sentiment alone could control the volunteer system undoubtedly would have the better of the argument. Sentiment is beautiful, but if sentiment means the prolonging of the war, sacrifice of life and property, and disarrangement of economic conditions throughout our land in greater degree than a more practical course, then, in my judgment, sentiment must give way to reason. Sentiment prompts the brave man to spring to the highest summit and wave the flag of his country in defiance of the enemy, though he falls with the flag above him as a shroud by so doing. Reason prompts the brave man to save his life and direct his energies from behind the breastwork, thereby rendering service that is efficient and making a power for good the very nation for which he stands. Sentiment is heroic, sentiment appeals to the imagination, and, true enough, oftentimes by great sacrifices sentiment carries an army forward to victory. Reason is often lacking in that which appeals to the imagination, but it seems to me that at a time like this, if sentiment spells inefficiency, if sentiment spells loss of life, if sentiment spells prolonging of the war, if sentiment spells the disarranging of economic conditions and tremendous sacrifice of property, all of these over and beyond what sound reason and judgment spell, then it seems to me that there is only one course for us to follow and that is the course that will mean an efficient nation, and by that I mean a nation efficient on the firing line, efficient on the seas, efficient on the farm, efficient in the shops and mills and factories that will be supplying the wants of those who will fight our country's battles.

WILL THE VOLUNTEER PLAN MEAN FEWER MEN?

One would think from the strenuous way in which the volunteer plan has been urged over the plan of the selective draft that by some strange means the size of the Army could be smaller than if the selective plan shall prevail. Let us remember that under both plans, if an effective fighting force shall be had, we will require precisely the same number of men, whether they come forward under the bill of the majority or whether they come forward under the measure that has the support of the administration.

Those who urge the volunteer plan have dwelt much on the picture of the home, the son being torn from the mother, and all that, just as though the sorrows of war could be less under the one system than under the other. By what process can gentlemen emphasize the sorrows of war that come from the draft system without finding equal sorrows that come from the system of the volunteers? Indeed, if there could be a choice, it seems to me that every mother in the land would far prefer that she at least be spared from making the decision that her boy shall go, and rather that she bow her head to the flag of her country and say, "My country has called you, I have not pushed you from me."

THE VOLUNTEER SYSTEM AND EFFICIENCY.

No one can contemplate the history of America, as that history has been written upon the field of battle, without a feeling of profound pride in the volunteers who offered their services to their country from the days of Lexington to the present hour. On the other hand, no one can read the story of the sacrifices these volunteers have made without also feeling that much of their suffering was in vain, that many of their lives could have been spared, that wars could have been shortened, and that even industrial conditions at home could have been better managed had there been more system and less sentiment connected with the handling of our military affairs. The men who volunteer from farm and office and factory are, as a rule, men who do not love to fight but volunteer because they feel a sense of duty toward their country. They are not accustomed to acting in groups, they are not accustomed to handling themselves as soldiers; they possess bravery and courage in profound degree but they are lacking in experience and training for the field of battle.

I shall not go into detail at this time, but as brave and heroic as were the volunteers of the Revolutionary War it was the despair of Washington, as is known to every student of history, that he could not have at his command an army of a definite size that he could rely upon at a definite moment when action was demanded. No one can read the story of the War of 1812 without a feeling of humiliation on account of the way in which the land forces of our country went down in defeat before the armies of less numbers that were fighting for Great Britain. Our volunteers possessed bravery, but they did not possess military training. No one can read the story of the Civil War without being impressed with this fact, that we lost thousands upon thousands of precious lives because our boys were not trained, because we relied upon the volunteer system, and because as we went into engagement after engagement we could not be confident that we had the requisite number of men necessary to carry forward the movement to success. I love to read the story of the Civil War and I am proud of those brave men who to-day, in their declining years, we see wearing the coat of blue. I am proud, I say, of their bravery, their devotion, their courage, but I feel that we permitted many of their comrades, who were just as brave, to die on the field of battle, in hospitals, and on the march because we were depending too much upon a happy-go-lucky policy of enthusiasm and volunteering and not enough, during the first year or so of the war, upon system. Indeed, who can say that the war would not have been ended within a year if a selective draft had been adopted in April, 1861. For my part, I believe it would have been ended at least within two years if the North had adopted such a policy as that and the South had relied upon the volunteer system. Then, what shall we say of sentiment? Shall we not say rather that we stand for a policy that will preserve life, that will shorten the war, that will save in most normal condition the economic functions of our Government? Have you heard of the old southern general, who, at the beginning of the Civil War, said, "We can lick the North with popguns in 30 days," and when after four years of awful carnage, and the North had not been defeated, he was reminded of his boast, and replied, "But we did not fight with popguns." Gentlemen, the people against whom we are arming to-day do not fight with popguns. They are a brave people and none braver. They are an efficient people and none more efficient. They are a patriotic people and they love the land of their birth just as the American people love every rod of our hallowed soil. If we are to resist them we must do so in effective manner. This is not playtime. This Congress is not arranging a day of pleasure and sport. We are here for serious business, and we must act so that our country shall be efficient.

WHAT VOLUNTEER SYSTEM MEANS.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us analyze the volunteer system and see what it really is. Under that system a call is made for an army of a certain size. If a less number than those who are called respond what do you suppose must be the effect upon our enemies? Why, immediately they will say, "The people are not interested in the war; they are against the administration." They will take heart and courage, make sacrifices that they ought not to make, and indeed prolong the war by reason of their lack of knowledge of the sentiment of our people. Again, we call for volunteers of a certain number. They fail to respond. We then are compelled to go into battle, if need be, with an army less than that which the Commander in Chief says is necessary to maintain our rights. Oh, but the gentlemen say, "We have provided in the volunteer bill that in such an emergency the President may call for drafted men." Gentlemen, do you not see that you break down your own argument for a volunteer system when you put such a provision as that in the bill? Do you not see that you are forced to confess that you can not be sure that the army will be made up of 100,000 or 5,000 men?

Do you remember that little story of Edward Everett Hale, My Double and How He Undid Me, and do you remember in it the minister who found his work so hard that he arranged a double to help him; a man who looked exactly like the minister? Well, while the minister preached the morning sermon, he sent his double to preach the sermon in the afternoon. The congregation never awoke to the fact that they were listening to two different men, although sometimes they were amazed at the doctrines that were advocated in the afternoon when they recalled the theology that had been preached in the morning. One would think in listening to the arguments of some of our friends for the Dent bill that by some means they were speaking in doubles, and that one of the doubles is urging with enthusiasm the glories and blessings of the volunteer feature of the bill and condemning with all vehemence the system of a selective draft, and then in the next moment we are solemnly assured by the other double that the Dent bill provides for the system of the selective draft.

If the selective-draft system is bad, how does it help matters to put it into use only after we have announced to the world our inability to obtain an army by volunteers?

VOLUNTEER SYSTEM NOT EQUITABLE.

But what of the way of raising an army by the volunteer system? In the first place there is no basis in the volunteer system by which one State may be required to contribute as much as another. The State that I represent has always been loyal to our country. It was loyal during the Spanish-American War. It was loyal when the President a year ago called for forces to go to the Mexican border, and had all the States of this Union responded as generously as did the State of Idaho there would have been upon the Mexican border between two and three times the number of men that the President felt was necessary to maintain the rights of our country there. Or, again, if other States had responded in proportion as did Idaho two-thirds of those who went from Idaho to serve on the border could have been permitted to remain at home with their families, engage in their regular line of work, and the duty of military service would have been more fairly apportioned throughout the United States than it was under the system that we followed a year ago. So it will be to-day. Already the enlistments in the Army and the Navy indicate the response is generous from our States, where the population is largely limited to small towns and rural communities. These are the places that have always been loyal and volunteered. Why should they be penalized for their loyalty and be asked to do the fighting for their country when the people of more populous States are not willing to serve? Our people do not want to fight. They are not bloodthirsty. It is a slur upon our volunteers to say, "Let those go who want to murder their fellow men." Our people volunteer as a rule from sense of duty, except as they are forced into service by public sentiment.

VOLUNTEER SYSTEM MEANS COMPULSION.

There is another feature of this volunteer system to which I must refer. I will do so by pointing to the volunteer system that until recently was followed in Great Britain and that is to-day followed in Canada. Canada, with a population less than the population of the State of New York, has contributed nearly one-half a million men to the armies of Great Britain.

This contribution has been made by volunteers, but our friends who are urging the volunteer system upon the United States do not tell all the story. They do not tell that these men are being paid handsomely for their military service in comparison with what men have been paid within the United States, and they do not tell that conditions in Canada and Great Britain have worked upon the men of those States a compulsion far more unjust, far more cruel than anything that can be suggested in the selective draft which is recommended by the administration. Go to a community in Canada, if you please, and if there remains still a young man who is not incapacitated, who has not enlisted, the ladies of the community are decorating him in public with yellow streamers and white feathers. He is being questioned over and over why he is not at the front. The little children in school are given badges which read something like this: "My daddy has enlisted, has yours?" What must the father of the other little child think as he attempts to explain that the responsibilities that have been placed upon him in life and which maybe the community can not grasp are such that he is doing the greatest service that man can do by refusing to go to the front. What must he think when the little child says: "Daddy, why can't I wear one of those badges"? Indeed, it may be it requires more of courage, more of patriotism to bear the burden that he has been asked to bear than for him to meet the responsibilities of service at the front. Would you have that kind of voluntary enlistment in our Army? That is precisely the kind that you will have in this country if you adopt the voluntary system. Do we follow the volunteer system or the system of the selective draft in other walks of life? Take with our children. We do not say in the fall of the year that all of the children who wish to do so may begin their school work the first Monday in September and let the others begin the 1st of October and others still three months later than that. Imagine a class in any grade in our public school attempting to conduct work when some of the children enter at one period and some at another. No; the best work is done when the children enter school at a given time and carry forward their work together. So with our Army. With volunteer system we may have 50,000 men in three months or we may have 500,000. Some of them will be entering this month and some of them in six months from now, necessitating various groups for training purposes with the constant loss in efficiency that comes therefrom. Nor can we know whether we will need 100 officers or 1,000, and it should be remembered it takes time and money to train an officer.

Then, gentlemen, do you think it the part of wisdom, if 500,000 men shall be needed, that those men be selected at a time when they can be trained and made efficient and not be an army of 500,000, brave and loyal though they may be, who are rushed into the line of battle without training, without discipline, only to meet disaster and death that must come to men who are asked to meet an army that is organized upon the basis of efficiency in every part?

VOLUNTEER SYSTEM UNJUST TOWARD COMMUNITIES.

But, again, the volunteer system, as it is unjust oftentimes toward States, is unjust oftentimes toward communities. I know a township that contained not a single hamlet, but was made up entirely of farms in the State of Illinois, where in the area of 6 square miles more than 120 young men enlisted in the Civil War. Admire that community as you will, let me ask you if it was just toward that community that it should have been asked to make that sacrifice. Would not a system have been far better under which half of the young men from that community could have been permitted to go to the front? The other half could have been permitted to raise the food necessay to supply the armies. This is but an illustration. The same illustration can be made with regard to mines, with regard to mills and factories, with regard to every line of work in which people are engaged, and the equitable system would be a system that would permit some to go from each community and some to remain and continue the work that must be carried on at home.

And what of our college boys? Thousands of them are in our colleges and universities, young men from 18 to 30 years of age, than whom there are none better in all the world. These young men are loyal. They have fine sensibilities, and under a volunteer system these boys would be swept by an irresistible force into the Army. In your factory the boss can discourage enlistment, but in the college enlistment would be infectious. In a little while the boys who felt they could not yet enlist would find yellow streamers pinned to their coat lapels, white feathers thrust into their hats by feminine hands, and themselves asked on every corner, "Why are not you at the front?" They would be so harassed and ostracized by society that they would enlist from sheer desperation. Gentlemen, in a few months your colleges would be almost depopulated of young manhood. But how under the selective draft? Why, it will fall on the college boy just as well as it will fall on the boy on the farm or in the mill. He will take his turn. His name will be on the list of eligibles, but until he is called he can face the world as he goes about his duty in the classroom and on the campus, ready to respond when the country says, "Come on," but knowing fairly well, if not summoned, that he may figure a half year or year ahead on definite work.

IS VOLUNTEER SYSTEM EFFICIENT?

Gentlemen, the volunteer system is a system of everybody's business that finally resolves itself down to being the business of nobody. It is the system of "Let George do it." The selective-draft system is the system that says all of our people are in the service, whether at the front or at home, but that says to maintain the greatest efficiency we must invite some to carry the gun, some to produce the food, some to produce the clothing, and others to produce the munitions of war. This is an age of organization. The forces that we are arrayed against are forces of efficiency that are made efficient through system and organization. We can not meet them except by the coordination and efficient management of all our resources.

WASTE IN THE VOLUNTEER SYSTEM.

Gentlemen, this leads me to another thought in connection with the volunteer system. Do you know that when Great Britain called for volunteers at the beginning of this war millions of her men responded without regard to whether they were needed on the farm or in the factory, and without regard to whether their going would materially interfere with the food supply of Great Britain or with the supply of munitions for war? Consider, then, that after these men had volunteered, had stopped the wheels of industry in many places throughout Great Britain, had cost the Government of Great Britain untold expense in training camps and equipment; consider, I say, that after many of these men were trained for service 30,000 of them were called back from the army and told that they were needed more on the farms or mills or factories throughout the British Empire. What waste of efficiency was here! Food prices went skyward, the armies were denied adequate equipment, and because the men who should have been preparing equipment were at the front millions of dollars of loss was sustained by people throughout Great Britain through the fact that employees in such numbers had been taken away. Consider, again, the waste that the British Empire sustained through the months of training of men for service who, at the end of their training, were withdrawn and told to return to private life where they could do more good.

Gentlemen, let us not make the mistakes that Great Britain made. Why should we take all available men from the farms of a given county or State and let farming suffer; or why should we take all the available men from mill or factory or mine and let these institutions close down? Would it not rather be the part of wisdom to say that from the farming community we shall take part, not all; that from the mine part shall come; that from the mill part shall come; and from every walk of life part shall contribute, but not all? In this way there will be maintained the greatest amount of economic ability throughout our Nation. In this way will be maintained the greatest amount of producing efficiency on the part of our people.

But, gentlemen, there is another consideration. Volunteering for service in an army is infectious; it runs through families, it runs through communities. On the other hand, other families and other communities are passed over without a call. Why should the six sons of one family volunteer for service while all of the six sons of another family remain at home? The selective-draft system will right this wrong. It may draw one or two or three from each of the families, but in all probability it will not draw all from either unless emergency demands. Why should the only son of a widow who has no one else to lean upon but that one son be torn from the arms of his mother just because the mother and her boy are patriotic, while the son of the man of wealth who may not feel the responsibility escapes all service because it is volunteer and he will not go? The selective-draft system would right this wrong. Provision is made for excusing the man upon whom there is the responsibility of care for others. Oh, but some one says, under this system favoritism will result.

Gentlemen, favoritism through their own lack of willingness to bear a part will result a thousandfold more under the volunteer system than it will result under the system of the selective draft. Indeed, it is this fear of favoritism that prevents free volunteering under the volunteer system, and if the people generally could feel that the men of wealth and influence would come forward and volunteer there would be no holding back on the part of people generally. We want a system that will apply to the man of wealth just as it applies to the man of humble means.

EXAMINING THE WITNESS.

Now, let us see what others think. In civilized countries it is the uniform policy of men to endeavor at least to be governed by the experiences of the past. In endeavoring to arrive at the truth of a matter intelligent people consult witnesses.

In the matter of whether we shall have a volunteer or a selective-draft system the part of wisdom advises the same course. Unfortunately for this inquiry the span of human life is short and we can not have the immediate counsel of men who have been the eyewitnesses of the battles of long years past, but let us do the next best thing and gather, if we can, from history something of what those witnesses testified to during their time.

Washington gave his unqualified approval to the proposition of universal obligation to serve the country as well as to be benefitted by it. He lamented the weakness of the volunteer system. Jefferson added his testimony to the same effect.

In the War of 1812 the volunteer system was a complete failure, and, amazing as it may seem, Connecticut and Massachusetts furnished no troops at all.

The Civil War began with volunteers on both sides, but more than $650,000,000 was paid in bounties to volunteers by States and Nation, and then later the system of conscription was resorted to. Students of the Civil War are almost unanimous in their judgment that the selective-draft system would have saved life and property and would have shortened the war.

In the War with Spain our President called for 200,000 men, but only 163,000 volunteered, and happily we did not need to press the matter further. We are honored in having as Members of this body 22 veterans of the Spanish-American War. They were all volunteers, and what is their judgment? Five of them stand for the volunteer system and 17 of the 22 support the policy of a selective draft. Is their judgment to be considered, or are we to brush aside the testimony of these men as so much rubbish?

Last year the President could not send to the Mexican border the force he wanted to, because our people did not come forward for service, and this in spite of free criticism they had indulged in because we did not use stern means toward Mexico. The President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. He has as his advisers in this matter the officers of the War Department. The President, the Secretary of War, and the officers generally of the department are in harmony in advising that in the light of experience in the past the selective-draft system is one that will mean efficiency and that will save human lives. Read the testimony that can be gleaned from the present war in Europe, and there the answer is the same. Gentlemen, can we be blind to these things? Can we be deaf to this testimony? Admitting that there is testimony on both sides of the question, there can be no doubt in my mind that the testimony is overwhelmingly in favor of the policy of the selective draft.

NOT THE CONSCRIPTION OF CIVIL-WAR DAYS.

It should be remembered that the selective draft that is provided for in the pending bill is not the conscript policy of the Civil War. Under that policy the rich man could buy his way out by hiring a substitute; under that plan the burden of government was not placed equally upon all alike, but the burden was placed more heavily upon the poor. I am opposed to any system that would permit a return to such conditions. The system of the selective draft in the pending measure is not that system. The system of the selective draft that is here proposed shows no favoritism and applies alike to rich and poor, to high and low, and thereby is in harmony with American institutions.

The Senate bill fixes the age of eligibility to enlistment at from 19 years to 25. The House bill fixes the age at from 21 to 40. I am personally in favor of the House provision rather than the provision of the Senate, but I would be inclined to raise the House provision to 45 years instead of leaving it at 40. I then think we might properly provide that those above the age of 45 and those possibly between the ages of 18 and 21, with their parents consent, could voluntarily have their names placed upon the list of eligibles, the Government reserving the right, if their names were drawn, to reject them and ask that they continue their service in private life.

The President of the United States is not of my political party, but I seem to have more confidence in him than many of his own party who fear favoritism. I am not afraid to trust the President. Inequalities will undoubtedly exist under any system, but I believe that your leader and mine, the leader of our Nation at this time, will guard with due fidelity the rights of the most powerful and the humblest citizen of our land. Mr. Speaker, those who urge the volunteer system appear to believe that part of our people are loyal; that part only of our people will volunteer for service. We who stand for a selective draft believe that overmhelmingly our people are loyal. Aye, indeed, we believe that to-day they stand forth, all of them, as volunteers. They are volunteers not after we pass this bill, not because of this legislation, but because our country is in peril. They are all volunteers because they are citizens and claim the protection of their country's flag. They are volunteers and they are to-day standing at attention and are ready to serve in that place where their country has most need of them.

SELECTIVE DRAFT MEANS HONOR.

It has been said over and over on this floor that the selective draft will place the badge of dishonor upon every man who shall be chosen. Gentlemen, if we pass the bill that the majority of the committee has reported, but which the administration does not want, and do not adopt the policy of the selective draft until volunteers shall have been called for, then, I admit, there might be merit in the suggestion that the selective draft is the badge of contempt. But, gentlemen, if we begin with the selective draft, if we begin with the theory that all men have volunteered and that some are chosen to continue upon the farm, that some are chosen to continue the wheels of industry, that some are chosen to serve in line of battle, then the selective draft becomes not a badge of contempt but a badge of honor. Reference has been made on this floor to the expediency of supporting one policy or the other. My friends, this is a matter in which there can be no expediency, and no Member of this House is deserving of a place in this body unless he is willing to put aside all personal ambition, all personal hope of preferment, and support a policy that will insure his country's good.

Picture in your minds what war means. Picture the infernal trenches in Europe. Picture the dead interred in long lines in unmarked graves. Picture the sick and the wounded. Picture the men and boys from whose eyes the light of the day has gone and who never again can see the beauty of flowers and trees and mother and sweetheart and other visions that can only be called up in memory. Picture those things and the sorrow of the million homes, and then know it is our duty, our solemn duty before God and man here and now to vote for that system of raising an army that will mean efficiency, that will shorten the war, that will save human life and suffering.

I have letters and telegrams bearing upon all sides of this question, and I admire and respect those who have given me the benefit of their advice. I admire the man who wrote me as a veteran of the Civil War he was one of six brothers who volunteered for service in that great crisis. I admire him when he believes that the volunteer system is the one that is best in the present moment. I have a letter from another veteran of the Civil War, who says: "I ask you to hold up the hands of our noble President." I admire the mother who telegraphed me: "I am the mother of two sons, and I urge you to vote for the selective draft." And I have many more. The spirit of them all is the same. Though they recommend plans that are opposite, their communications carry the same love of country, the same loyalty, the same willingness to sacrifice, if need be, that their country may survive. And, gentlemen, it is my judgment that the spirit of these communications is the spirit that permeates the American heart to-day. The people expect us to bear the responsibility of devising the best way that they can render service. That is our problem. And the people want us to do our duty as we see it.

The selective-draft system is in harmony with our whole system of Government, a system by which every citizen does his "bit." When it comes to taxation we do not pass around the hat and let those contribute to the support of country, State, and Nation who desire to have part in bearing the burdens of government. We endeavor to levy the tax to support our Government in such a way that it will be just and equitable throughout. And when we build our roads we do not call for volunteers; and when we summon our juries we do not ask every man who wants to serve to have a place in the jury box, and, if no one volunteers, dismiss all cases. Rather, we work upon a theory that in republican government all are entitled to the benefits of government, and all are entitled to and should bear the responsibilities of its life from day to day—its responsibilities in days of peace and its responsibilities in days of war.

Gentlemen, in conclusion I hope and pray Almighty God that the sacrifice may now be complete, and that we may be spared from further sacrifice in this awful war. I somehow feel that before the year has passed the end of the carnage will be at hand; but I do not know. We must prepare as though the task were great; and regardless of political party, regardless of past opinions upon the issues that divided Europe, regardless of the blood that flows in our veins, we must now be one people. I shall support the administration measure because I believe it means team work. I believe it means efficiency and coordination. It means efficiency on the farm; it means efficiency in the mill and factory; it means efficiency on the firing line. I shall support the selective draft, as urged by the administration, because I believe it means the shortening of this awful war, because I believe it will demonstrate to the world that America is one in thought and can be one in action.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAMLIN). The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER] is recognized.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, a state of war has been declared and the resources of the Nation have been pledged and an initial appropriation of $7,000,000,000 made for its successful prosecution, all of which I have supported by my vote.

Congress is now confronted with the task of enacting legislation to provide the machinery for raising a large army. Two plans are being considered by this body, having for their ultimate object the raising of an efficient army. Both in their administration will work many hardships, many inequalities, and much injustice to numerous individuals; but no method can be devised by the genius of man but what in its administration will work inequities, hardships, and injustice to many of our citizens. One method proposed is that of voluntary enlistment, hastened by the threat of conscription. The other by selective draft.

Were I moved by sentiment alone to make my choice I would vote for the volunteer proposition. But realizing that we are embarking upon a stupendous undertaking, and that every asset of the Nation must be coordinated with the fighting strength of the Nation which is to be called to the colors, and that an effective combatant in the present world's war must be a huge fighting machine constructed and wielded upon cool, calculating, and experienced business as well as military lines, and with due regard to the efficient utilization of every resource of the Nation necessary to support and maintain our fighting strength, I have come to the conclusion that sentiment alone must not control my action.

The selective draft has been recommended by the General Staff of the Army, having years of military experience and after nearly three years' study of all of the conditions of the present conflict raging in Europe, and purposes the development to the highest efficiency of every activity of the Nation necessary to a successful prosecution of a possible long, world-wide war.

The method assumes that every able-bodied American is imbued with love of country and will patriotically render any service that our Government requires. Certainly no one should assume otherwise of any citizen and no reflection should be cast upon his courage and loyalty until it has been actually demonstrated that he has failed to recognize his full duty to the Government under which he lives.

I believe it to be the duty of every Member of Congress to support and vote for the plan which, in his best judgment, will be certain to raise the most efficient military organization and cause the least inconvenience and friction among the ranks of the people from which it is taken. As to how my constituents feel or view the pending propositions I have had scarcely no advice, but I am sure that the great majority of the people of my district favor some form of universal military training. Had such a system obtained during the past few years all men of military age would have had the requisite military training, and in making the call to the colors the President would undoubtedly apply the principles of the selective draft, which the War Department, the President, and nearly all military experts urge as the most effective method of mobilizing a large army and the resources of the Nation.

The champions of the volunteer system invoke the aid of the draft in the event of the failure of sufficient voluntary enlistments—that is, they first propose to try out the method of selecting from those only who volunteer their service. The selective draft proposes to select from all of the available military force of the country. No doubt every State of the Union will be required to furnish its quota of soldiers based on the population of each State and through the local tribunals and other administrative machinery of the proposed selective-draft law all will be exempted whose services are necessary to make an efficient war mobilization of the resources of the Nation and only those taken who are best fitted for military service.

The selective draft now proposed will call to the colors those who are now mostly untrained and absolutely unorganized, who would have been called by classes had they been trained under some universal military system. I shall vote for the Kahn amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] is recognized.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, before making the few remarks I shall make to-night I desire to ask to be allowed to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I hand in now the extension which I desire to make formally on the merits of this question, as follows:

The differences between the committee bill of the House and the War Department bill are as follows:

(a) The committee bill makes the age for compulsory military service from 21 to 40 years, and this is recognized by all the world as the most efficient military period of life.

(b) The War Department bill makes the term of compulsory service run from 19 to 25 years, placing the burden on the very youngest of those suitable for military service.

Now, the plea made for the administration measure is that it is democratic and distributes the burden equally on all. How can this be justified when we know that there are 22,000,000 men of military age, between the ages of 19 and 40, and the bill proposes to put all the fighting on the 7,000,000 who are from 19 to 25? How this can be called democratic I do not know.

(a) The committee bill asks for a call for volunteers preliminary to the conscription and asks that if that raises enough men no conscription be made. The Secretary of War says there will have to be a census of the men of war age taken, and it will be four months before conscription can begin. This period the committee asks to be utilized in getting volunteers, and if they do not get the 500,000 wanted, then let conscription proceed.

(b) The War Department says no; we will wait until the census is taken and select those we want and draft them.

These are the fundamental differences.

I favor the committee bill; first, because it is the plan I advocated when running for election and upon which I was elected February 21, 1917; second, it is democratic in that if the draft becomes necessary it will be from the whole body of men of military age—22,000,000 of them—and not from the 7,000,000 boys under 25 years of age, as proposed by the War Department. The claim that it is wasteful because it would take the skilled workman from the shops and other occupations, where they are needed worse than in the Army, is exploded by the clause of the committee bill that allows the Executive to reject such as he sees fit and return them to their usual occupations, just as is provided in the War Department bill for returning those drawn in the draft who are needed at home.

The War Department bill divides the grown male inhabitants of the United States into two classes—one class under 25 years of age, being liable to serve in the Army, and the other over 25 years of age, being liable to serve in Congress. And the irony of it is that those of us who are serving in Congress have voted the country into war, and now are asked to vote the fighting on the boys who are ineligible to come to Congress and 40 per cent of them too young to vote. This does not appeal to me as democratic. The committee bill says that no man shall be forced to fight by conscription until he has the right to vote and choose his rulers. They say England tried volunteering and failed. She raised 5,000,000 men that way and has gotten only 300,000 by draft, while Canada has not yet adopted conscription and the sound of the magnificent charge by which the Canadians, all volunteers, swept the Germans from the impregnable fortress of Vimy Ridge has echoed around the world, and will stand as one of the marvelous achievements of this marvelous war. Orators have declaimed in this Hall that the volunteer system failed during the Civil War; the records show that the Government put into the field around 3,000,000 men during that struggle; that 46,000 of them were drafted and 73,000 were substituted for men who had been drafted, making about 119,000 out of about 3,000,000 enlisted who were the result of draft. The American people in that time of fearful distress, when the unity of the Nation was in the balance, almost rebelled at the conscription principle, even where it was not accompanied by the arbitrary right to select which should go and which should remain at home out of any group which should be drawn, as is proposed here, and it was resorted to only when circumstances were desperate. A historian of very respectable standing, writing of that incident in our history, says:

> The draft act meant that Congress realized at last the magnitude and almost desperate difficulty of the war it had embarked upon.

Are we to confess to the world that our condition is almost desperate and that desperate remedies must be applied from the start. The same distinguished author says:

> In carrying it into execution the Government learned something more of the temper of the people. Intense excitement everywhere accompanied the progress of the conscription; in some places it was forcefully resisted, not so much because of the deep unpopularity of the thing itself as because it seemed to be enforced with gross partisan partiality. Democratic counties, it began in some parts of the country to appear, were much more heavily drawn upon than those whose votes had been cast in the elections for the party in power.

Now, with the selective principle embodied in the administration bill, how much greater the opportunity to charge partisan enforcement with a local tribunal, presided over by a local politician, with the power to say which men out of any group selected or drawn should serve. The same distinguished author continues:

> The excitement culminated more sharply and ominously in New York than anywhere else, and in the city of New York very serious outbreaks occurred, savage draft riots, which were to linger in the recollection many a long year, like an ugly nightmare; for four whole days of memorable summer, July 13 to 16, 1863, the town was practically at the mercy of mobs which surged in its streets almost at will.

It may be of interest to the House to know that this distinguished author is named Woodrow Wilson, and all that he says with reference to the unpopularity of the draft when Gettysburg was imminent and the whole Nation was in the throes of the struggle will be deeply intensified under the administration measure, at a time when the condition of the Nation while serious is by no means desperate or even perilous, and when the plan proposed is capable legally of the most far-reaching favoritism in its enforcement.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] said the other day that we must not call for volunteers, because the young and choice spirits would first respond; he said:

> It is possible to beat the tom-toms through the streets of the villages to enlist the school boys.

The bill he advocates provides that the school boys and those barely out of school shall do all the fighting, hence I take it that he objects to the school boys fighting of their own free will, but desires that they be forced into the firing line where they will have a monoply of the fighting at the dictation of other people. And at the very period when the boys capable of the highest inspirations and when left to the influence of those inspirations will display a patriotism unsurpassed by any other age, the inspirations are dissipated by a refusal to allow them to volunteer their services, and his patriotism is destroyed by being driven by a provost marshal to enlist into a service which his country refused to allow him to do voluntarily from patriotic impulses.

The same gentleman from Missouri says that calling for volunteers is like passing the hat around for voluntary contributions with which to conduct the war. We have just passed the hat by issuing $7,000,000,000 of bonds and have asked the people to come up and volunteer their funds and take bonds in exchange. Just as we would ask them to volunteer their services in return for pay and patriotism. The two are exactly parallel. The gentleman says we should conscript men, as we do financially. To follow his argument, we would have not only directed the issuance of the bonds, but we would have provided that Mr. Morgan should take one billion, and Mr. Rockefeller should take another, and Mr. Carnegie another, and Mr. Armour another, and Mr. Schiff another, and so on. That would have been selective financial conscription. Just as the gentleman proposes selective personal conscription, and one is as just as the other. Real financial conscription is laid in taxes, where the burden is supposed to be laid on each man in proportion to his ability to bear it. And if every man was required to bear his part of the actual fighting the cases would be parallel; but this bill proposes to put the whole burden on a class embracing one-third of those of war age, and then to arbitrarily select from that class the members who shall bear the burden. Will not this produce occurrences throughout this fair land that, in the language of Mr. Wilson, "will linger like a nightmare for a generation"? Some of the public press have denounced those who have differed with the War Department on this proposition as being unworthy of a seat in Congress or citizenship in the United States. And yet one of the very papers that has been the most radical in its criticism is now insisting on a reorganization of the very department whose dictum we are required to take. The Washington Post says:

> The inadequate and inconsistent organization of the General Government must be superseded by a machine that will capably organize and apply the latent resources of the Nation. * * * Much that is being done at this moment must be undone. It is worse than useless effort; it is needless to go into details; anyone familiar with the energies of the various departments, commissions, boards, and bureaus can give examples of undertakings now on foot which are in conflict with one another, and all of them inadequate to the needs of the country.

May we not then be pardoned for standing on our own opinions in these momentous matters when we find the sponsors of these departments themselves confessing their inadequacy and inefficiency? I have the honor to represent a district which was proudly designated by Andrew Jackson as the land of his nativity; and the indomitable spirit epitomized in that remarkable man was but the expression intensified of the love of liberty and justice and determination to stand for right which inspires all of that great Scotch-Irish population which redeemed the Piedmont and mountain sections of the Carolinas from the forest and the savage, and which planted the standard of liberty on American soil and maintained it with "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor," and demonstrated their loyalty by their overthrow of the British Army on Kings Mountain by a volunteer army of the same blood.

And around that historic field in the same district are grouped the battle fields of Cowpens, Camden, Hanging Rock, Hobkirk Hill, Blackstock, and Beaufort, all eloquent testimony of the patriotism and the worth of the people whom I represent, whose blood runs through my veins, and who would repudiate me, and properly so, if I should bow the knee to newspaper clamor or yield my opinions of right and justice to that of the highest potentate of the land. My loyalty to the great President of the United States needs no testimony from me. When some of the people who are clamoring so loud for unquestioning obedience were bending their energies to defeat his election as the standard bearer of Democracy, and when many of the papers that are raising the senseless clamor were prostituting their power and their columns to the despicable attempts to destroy him politically and turn his picture to the wall in this great Nation, the records of the Democratic convention of South Carolina and the great convention at Baltimore will indicate to any man who will examine them my loyalty to him from the beginning of his rise in American politics, and that loyalty has never faltered; and I know the greatness of his heart and intellect too well to conceive that he would expect a fellow man to subvert and surrender his conscientious convictions on a great question as a test of his loyalty.

I will now devote just the few minutes that I have to a discussion of some of the matters that are hardly germane to the issues that are being discussed now. There is one policy that I have heard reiterated upon this floor, though, that I desire to direct the attention of this committee to. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] more than a week ago took the position in his speech that the calling for volunteers was the same as the passing of the hat for voluntary contributions to the war chest of Uncle Sam. A day or two ago the newspapers had the picture of Uncle Sam sitting on a curbstone, holding out his hat and asking passers-by to contribute to his fund; and they seem to think that is on the par with asking men to volunteer their services for the Army.

Let us look at it for one minute. We passed a bill the other day to issue $7,000,000,000 of bonds. Did we not pass the hat then? Was not that an invitation to all the citizens who had money to come up and loan it to Uncle Sam—volunteer the funds—and take Uncle Sam's obligation for it? Suppose we had applied the conscriptive plan to that, what would we have done? In that same bill we would have said, "Yes; we are going to issue $7,000,000,000 of bonds, and we are going to conscript a billion dollars from Mr. John D. Rockefeller, and we are going to conscript a billion from Mr. Morgan, and we are going to conscript a billion from Mr. Carnegie, and another from Mr. Schiff, and another from Mr. Schwab, and so on, and instead of having a proposition for volunteer contributions to the war chest of this country we would have had a conscription just as we propose in this bill for the young men of this country.

That was a fallacious argument, it seems to me. I heard a gentleman say when he went out of the Chamber after that remarkable manifestation of power that came from the Speaker of the House the other night, that it was merely sentiment; that we merely had sentiment on our side and argument on the other.

Patriotism is sentiment, because it is defined as love of your country, and the manifestation of that love is service to your country; and if that is not sentiment, what is sentiment?

We are bound by sentiment, and I wanted to exhibit to you the highest manifestation of that, coming from a private citizen in moderate circumstances in my county, who is in the service of Uncle Sam, and to show you that that is the kind of citizens we have down in the fifth district of South Carolina. It says:

MOUNT CROGHAN, S. C., April 23, 1917.

Hon. W. F. STEVENSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. STEVENSON: If I were a member of the Carriers' Association I would try to get a resolution passed asking Congress to cut our salary 10 per cent for the duration of the war.

Who ever heard of a higher manifestation of sentiment than that?

But as I am not a member, will write as an individual carrier. You know me personally and know my circumstances. I have a wife and four little girls and don't suppose I will be called upon to do military duty, but I do want to help some way, and I am perfectly willing for Congress to cut my salary 10 per cent or more for the duration of this war and use the money in any way they see fit.

And I am sure a large majority of the boys would be pleased to help in this way.

Yours, truly,
JULIUS S. BURCH,
Rural Letter Carrier No. 1.

[Applause.]

He is a young man who comes of stock that has volunteered in every war since this great country was established.

Now, that is the kind of patriotism to have. You will not see any higher manifestation of it anywhere.

I have a telegram which says that those who have boys do not want conscription; those having none want it. And that is the milk in the coconut of all these manifestations you have over the country and these telegrams which you receive. I have one from a mother, who says, "Do not allow them to put all the fighting on the boys." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. I regret I can not say more. I have listened to so much talk that I have lost my voice, anyway. I expect to vote against unconditional conscription and to stand by the rights of my people to volunteer, as they have always done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I have been somewhat reluctant to inject my views into this debate. I am inclined to believe that each and every Member, in response to the solemn and responsible duties imposed upon him, has given thoughtful and serious consideration to the question in issue and has reached a conclusion as to his duty. After much reflection I have reached a determination which will guide me in casting my vote, though, I confess, I have suffered embarrassment and am not yet entirely free from doubt.

Thus far in our preparations for the conduct of a war which we fervently hoped might be avoided, but which was finally forced upon this Nation by the Imperial German Government, I have followed every suggestion and conformed to every recommendation coming to us from the President and the executive departments. I hoped to do so to the end. I am still ready to vote all the money which may be required and to authorize the raising of an army large enough to insure speedy and certain victory and the ultimate triumph of the great principle for which we contend. But if the Congress is not ready to surrender its constitutional powers, then, with due respect to those who differ from me, we are bound, in my opinion, under the oath we took, to fearlessly express our judgment as to the method of providing an army. Here is where the controversy arises. The issue is, Shall we appeal to patriotism or resort to force? Pages of history are aglow with the brilliant achievements and glorious victories of right against wrong, won by the patriotic sons of America, who voluntarily tendered their services—brave boys who were willing to fight and, if need be, to die for their country and its ideals. No gentleman has referred or will refer to a single page of the history of this history-making Republic that proves or tends to prove the inefficiency of volunteers. No one has disputed or will dispute the fact that every great war in which we have engaged has been fought and won by volunteer soldiers. It was a volunteer soldiery that won the battles of the Revolutionary War against the then most powerful military power on earth; volunteers broke the shackles that bound us, gave us personal liberty and a sovereign Republic; it was volunteers that won our wars in the early part of the eighteenth century; it was volunteers that won the decisive battles of our Civil War; it was volunteers that liberated Cuba from the hand of oppression; it was the volunteer soldier who gave to the Philippine people a realization of the dream that they would ultimately be free. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, time is too short to enter upon a full discussion. I listened with interest and pleasure this afternoon to the wonderfully great speech delivered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. I can only refer to some of the points made by him. I remember that he and every other gentleman who had spoken for conscription sought to make it plain that no assault was intended upon the boy who volunteers to follow the flag of his country, but that the assault was upon the volunteer system; and that distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] referred to the fact that Washington, during the Revolutionary War, spoke and wrote of the difficulties of keeping the army up to its fighting strength under the volunteer system. The same experience, he says, was encountered in the Civil War and in other wars in which the United States were involved.

But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the distinguished speaker did not refer to the fact that in 1776 we had but limited resources upon which to draw. Then our total population was only something over 3,000,000. In 1812 our population was still small as compared with now. Even in 1861, the year which marked the beginning of that most awful of all wars that the world until then had ever known, our population was only about 35,000,000 of people. At that time, according to undisputed testimony, more than 2,000,000 men volunteered their services on the side of the North and of the South. Now, with 105,000,000 brave, patriotic people to draw upon and, as we are advised, only 2,000,000 soldiers to secure, who questions the efficacy of a call from the White House to the brave boys of our country?

Why, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the distinguished gentleman from California cited in support of his contention the fact that at Gettysburg and at Chancellorsville and other places where the great battles of the Civil War were fought our armies were decimated, their columns broken, and the armies reduced in strength. But the gentleman neglected to say that that war was fought by brave men who volunteered their services to fight for ideals, for principles near and dear to them. He forgot to tell you that before that bloody encounter at Gettysburg the North had met the South, the brave boys who wore the gray had met the brave boys who wore the blue, and that the little mounds in cemeteries all over this good land tell the tragic story of the result of those encounters. No wonder our armies were decimated.

But, my friends, let me hurry on, for I have only a few minutes. I know I am pursuing a forlorn hope. I realize full well that I am doomed to defeat in my advocacy of the volunteer system, and I will not detain you. But, though I stand alone, one vote will be cast for the boys who have never failed to shed honor and glory upon our country since the hour the first gun was fired in the Revolutionary War. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, whenever and wherever that flag has been unfurled, be it proclaimed to their everlasting glory and fame, it was amid the proud huzzas and plaudits of voluntary soldier boys. Will gentlemen allow themselves to entertain a doubt or to harbor a fear that patriotism has bid the world farewell and taken its flight; that the spirit of patriotism died with those gallant, intrepid, brave heroes who gave their lives that we might live freemen?

Hath Valor left the world—to live no more?
No more shall Brutus bid a tyrant die,
And sternly smile with vengeance in his eye.
Hampton no more, when suffering Freedom calls,
Encounter Fate and triumph as he falls.
Nor Tell disclose, through peril and alarm,
The might that slumbers in a peasant's arm.

[Applause.]

Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, patriotism is not dead—its immortal spirit still lives in the hearts of men and—

Downward as from sire to son it goes
By shifting bosoms more intensely glows.

With an abiding conviction that the present war can be fought and won by volunteers, I will support the committee bill and oppose the amendment which will be offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Let a call be made for volunteers to follow that flag, and, in my judgment, brave, loyal, patriotic boys will respond in sufficient number. But if I am wrong in my convictions we will still have the authority for conscription just as it is written in the bill. No one will oppose conscription. Some of us, who yet judge the future by the past, merely want to give the boys a chance to prove that they are willing to fight for their country without compulsion.

Give us an army to fight our battles composed of men who love their country and cherish its ideals and victory is ours. Give us a volunteer soldier boy to bear aloft the Stars and Stripes, and brave, noble, patriotic boys from all over this land will follow, marching to the music of fife and drum, each with a fixed, definite, and unalterable determination to—

Victor exult, or in death be laid low,
With his back to the field and his feet to the foe!
And leaving in battle no blot on his name,
Look proudly to Heaven from the deathbed of fame.

[Applause.]

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, upon the passage of the resolution declaring the existence of a state of war between the United States of America and the Imperial Government of Germany the discussion closed. The honest differences existing between the people as to the advisability of our entering the war are ended, and the people, one and all, I believe, stand back of their Government with united front, with but one spirit and purpose—the victorious achievement of the Government's will. [Applause.]

Every measure that has been presented by the administration so far has met with practically unanimous support. Congress has made amendments to the legislation presented since the war resolution was passed, but no one will contend but that the legislation when passed was stronger and more efficient in every way because Congress carefully considered and weighed every sentence and word in the proposed legislation.

Congress, by unanimous vote, has issued bonds to the amount of seven billions of dollars, the largest bond issue ever contemplated by any nation or combination of nations in the history of the world. This seven billions of dollars, under the law, will be turned over to the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury in the prosecution of the war. The question that is now before us is to raise an army that will enable this Government to bring the war to as quick and successful termination as possible.

I believe that under the bill presented by the majority of the committee we will get an army quicker and a more efficient army than we will under the amendment proposed by the minority of the committee which is now before us for our consideration. [Applause.] However, if the amendment to the bill prevails, I will vote for the bill as amended, believing that at this time every Member can afford to waive his own judgment to hasten this necessary and important legislation. The bill reported by the majority of the Military Committee provides for an immediate call for volunteers, but provides also for a census and all the preliminary steps that need be taken for selective conscription. The Secretary of War, in his testimony before the committee, stated that it would take at least three or four months to obtain a census preliminary to conscription.

I have listened attentively to practically all of the debate, and I have not heard one valid reason given why we should not obtain as many volunteers as we possibly can pending the three or four months when the census preliminary to making the draft is being taken. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that in this emergency we should accept every volunteer that meets the requirements, unless he is needed more in an industry or occupation than he is at the front. Col. Roosevelt has already had responses from over 130,000 eligible and available volunteers, and the number is growing daily. What good reason is there for refusing to allow Col. Roosevelt to raise as many volunteers as want to enlist? In almost every State of the Union volunteer companies are being offered who are not being accepted. The only way a man can volunteer is to go individually and volunteer in the Regular Army, and there are many reasons why volunteers will not go into the Regular Army, where they are enlisted for seven years and where they do not remain with the other volunteers of their own locality. Recruiting in National Guards has been stopped in many States.

In the hearings before the Military Committee Representative CALDWELL put this question to the Secretary of War:

Suppose the State of New York has 2,000,000 men who want to volunteer, are you going out and say, "We will not let you volunteer, but we are going to take these men in your places who do not want to go"?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

What good reason can be assigned for not accepting volunteers? After you get your men you can have scientific selection and exemptions, just the same as you can if you get your men by conscription. If we can by the volunteer system obtain the requisite number of men, then we would not have to resort to conscription.

GOV. PHILLIPS, OF WISCONSIN, ASKS THAT WISCONSIN BE ALLOWED TO RAISE VOLUNTEERS.

Gov. Phillips, of Wisconsin, telegraphs me that—

Wisconsin is ready to furnish 20,000 men as volunteers on 30 days' notice and such additional troops thereafter as the needs of the country will require, if the President will so order and the War Department will provide equipment.

GEN. HOLWAY SAYS THE VOLUNTEER SYSTEM IS MORE EXPEDITIOUS.

Gen. Holway, the present commander of the Wisconsin National Guard organization, and an officer of high standing and of many years' experience, corroborates Gov. Phillips. His letter of April 12 reads as follows:

The volunteer system will give us a large army in a shorter time. Under this system Wisconsin can easily raise more than its quota of men. This State has already enlisted more men in proportion to its population than any other State in the Union. We now have about 9,000 members in the National Guard alone. Conscription requires more time than is appreciated. The census of eligible men would first have to be taken and that alone is a big work. Then the men would have to be examined. After this would come long periods of training with other big problems.

Gen. Holway further states:

On March 1, 1917, the National Guard of Wisconsin was composed of approximately 3,500 men. There are now in the various Wisconsin units 9,000 men. This number could be daily increased but for the order from Washington to the adjutant general's office to cease recruiting above peace strength. The adjutant general of Wisconsin further states that of the number of men already in the service of the Federal Government from Wisconsin 500 are without equipment and the Government is still indebted to Wisconsin for most of the National Guard equipment turned over to the War Department when the Mexican expedition was ordered.

WISCONSIN NATIONAL GUARD.

Gen. Leonard Wood, in official orders issued March 13, 1914, said of the Wisconsin National Guard volunteer troops:

The National Guard of the State of Wisconsin may be taken as a model in the matter of training, equipment, and business administration.

The governors and authorities in other States express themselves the same as the governor of Wisconsin as to the raising of volunteers. Why would it not be better to apportion the number of men to be raised among the various States according to population and allow them a chance to volunteer, pending the time that the Government is perfecting the necessary machinery for a draft, which will take from three to four months? If we resort to conscription without giving our citizens a chance to volunteer, it will be the first time in the history of the Anglo-Saxon race that this has been done. But our friends say: Look at the mistake of England. I answer: England raised 5,000,000 men without conscription. Every man to-day fighting in the English armies in Europe is a volunteer. The only mistake England made was that she did not have the selective feature in her volunteer system and keep some of her men who offered themselves as volunteers at home where they could have been of more value as mechanics and artisans. They also tell us that England now advises us to start in with conscription. She advised Canada the same, and yet the democratic spirit of Canada said to the mother country, "We can raise our soldiers by volunteering," and she thereupon raised an army of 500,000 volunteers that have given as good account of themselves as any soldiers in this war. England advised her other colonies, Australia and New Zealand, to resort to conscription.

In New Zealand they put the question up to a referendum vote of the people, and the people answered by an overwhelming majority against conscription and immediately raised their full quota of troops by the volunteer system. Australia did the same, and these two Provinces sent over 400,000 volunteer soldiers that are fighting to-day in the trenches for the mother country. The citizens of these Provinces were too democratic, too patriotic to resort to conscription without giving their citizens a chance to volunteer.

Mr. Chairman, I would hate to believe that the people of the United States are less patriotic than the people of Canada or Australia or New Zealand. Conscription is not a democratic institution. It is an institution that has grown up with militarism. It is an institution that was invoked by Napoleon and which made him Emperor of the greater portion of Europe. Conscription is an institution that has made Prussian militarism a menace not only to her own people but to the world. In the strike that is now taking place in Europe the men have passed resolutions for the abolition of conscription. Can we afford at the beginning of this war, without giving the volunteer system a chance, to conscript our citizens and drag them into the war? At the rate the citizens of Canada, New Zealand, and Australia have volunteered the United States with her population can raise an army of 6,000,000 soldiers by the volunteer system. Shall we take a conscripted army over to Europe to help democratize Europe, where the conscripted armies have strangled democracy for centuries, or shall we take a volunteer army, which goes there without coercion, inspired alone by patriotism? [Applause.]

ENGLISH AUTHORITIES.

What do English statesmen whose advice we are asked to take in regard to conscription say? When the military-service bill was in the House of Commons and England with its 40,000,000 population had enlisted a volunteer army of 5,000,000 men and a draft was considered necessary, the Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, who many of us had the pleasure of meeting a few nights ago, said in debate:

Let me repeat that I have never been one of those who look with favor upon compulsion in any form, conscription in any form. I have never thought, so far as my knowledge goes, that the necessity of that position had been demonstrated, and until it could be demonstrated I have always held that it should not be undertaken.

Further along in that same speech he said:

There are those who say that this is the thin edge of the wedge of a permanent system of conscription, as they object, like myself, of course, to a permanent system of conscription. They say do not attempt the thin end of the wedge. Do not attempt this small draft of poison, which will permeate the whole body politic.

He further says:

I believe that they are laboring under a profound mistake. I do not believe this bill is the thin end, or by any conceivable turn of the wheel of fortune can be made the thin end, of the wedge of the universal system of conscription.

The Right Hon. Herbert H. Asquith, then premier, said:

Although I am, I believe, as keen a supporter of the volunteer system as any man to be found in the house, I consider this bill to be necessary.

Later in the debate he said:

My right honorable friend fears, I am sure, quite genuinely and honestly, that if this bill is carried it may be used as a precedent or as a starting point for the adoption of something in the nature of general compulsion. I have no such fear.

PROPAGANDA.

Much propaganda has been circulated by the Security League and kindred organizations to the effect that the volunteer system has been a failure.

AUTHORITIES ON CONSCRIPTION.

Gen. SHERWOOD, Representative from Ohio, in his speech April 26, 1917, on this bill, gives a very thorough history of the volunteer and conscription systems in the Civil War. He is an eminent authority. He was four years in the service in the Civil War, and has had undoubtedly more experience with both volunteers and drafted men than any ex-soldier now living. He shows how conscription was resisted and that it was a failure, and quotes from the leading generals of the war substantiating him. His speech will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1201, April 26.

Gen. Nelson A. Miles, as gallant a soldier as ever fought for his country, and who recently held the highest command in the American Army, testified before the Military Committee as follows:

Mr. GORDON. You are opposed to compulsory service?

Gen. MILES. Absolutely. I think it would be a very dangerous step toward centralization. As far as conscription is concerned, that was tried out during the Civil War and with unsatisfactory results.

Before you forever wipe out the volunteer system and rely on conscripting your citizen soldiers and branding them as conscripts in a free Republic like ours, go into the subject deeper than the propaganda that is being sent out in trainloads for a purpose that is not wholly philanthropic.

I will read a few of the authorities on the subject:

I believe that it [the enrollment act] will be found on examination to have done more to cut off the sympathy between the Government and the people of the United States than any other measure which has passed this Congress since the rebellion. (Representative John Winthrop Chanler, 1865.)

It remains to be proved that compulsion will get for the British Army a larger number of men than might have been obtained by volunteering. But it wants no further experience to show how gravely compulsion has in a few short months qualified the spirit of patriotic self-sacrifice. (London Nation, London, England, Mar. 25, 1916.)

Gen. Sherman said of conscription:

I think that all officers of experience will confirm my assertion that the men who voluntarily enlisted at the outbreak of the war were the best, better than the conscript, and far better than the bought substitute.

It is believed by at least one-half of the people of the loyal States that the conscription act, which they are called upon to obey, because it stands upon the statute books, is, in itself, a violation of the supreme constitutional law. (Gov. Seymour, the war governor of New York, in a letter to President Lincoln, 1863.)

Report of the Confederate bureau of conscription, 1864:

A rigid and unusual inspection, not only of company rolls but personal and also pay rolls, will prove that more men have been received into the service irregularly since the 1st of January than have gone through the conscription authorities.

In many localities it has been found expedient, indeed necessary, to suspend wholly or partially the operation of conscriptions.

AGES OF CONSCRIPTION.

I am very glad that the Military Committee of the House have agreed on the age of conscription and fixed it at from 21 to 40 years of age. If conscription is necessary and we are to have universal service no good argument can be advanced why an unmarried man who is physically fit, between the ages of 21 and 40, should not be subject to that conscription. The bill in the Senate which, of course, is not before us at this time, fixes the age of conscription at from 19 to 25. If this was for universal training, which term is often confused with this conscription bill, that age would not be objectionable, but to think of sending boys before they arrive at the age of 21 across the waters into European trenches, I do not believe can be justified. In the Civil War after over 2,000,000 men had volunteered from the North and a draft was deemed necessary, the age of those drafted was from 20 to 40. [Applause.]

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] in his speech on behalf of the majority report for the bill pending before this House the other day sought to show to the House that there had been a tremendous and nation-wide propaganda carried on to force this Nation to the so-called selective-draft or conscription system of raising an army. Mr. ANTHONY charged in his speech that if an investigation could be had of the members of a certain society in New York which influenced certain telegrams to be sent to him it would probably be found that many of the members of that society were stockholders in munition factories. He did not attempt to make clear to this House how a stockholder in a munition factory would profit more largely through selling munitions to an army raised by the conscriptive system than through selling munitions to an army raised by the volunteer system.

But I have taken the floor to-night in order to read into the RECORD a telegram from a very eminent member of Mr. ANTHONY'S political party in Kansas, a judge of the supreme court of that State, Judge Silas Porter. This telegram reached me this morning. It reads as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., April 26, 1917.

Hon. JOUETT SHOUSE,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

No intelligent Kansan really believes that Wall Street originated the scheme of universal service. Those of us who have sons volunteering know the President is absolutely right and that the only fair and democratic way to raise an army is by conscription. I believe that the vast majority of Kansas people who were not for peace at almost any cost of national honor desire Congress promptly to get behind the President. I paid for this telegram myself.

SILAS PORTER.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in connection with that telegram I want if I may to submit the answer which I sent to Judge Porter to-day:

WASHINGTON, April 27, 1917.

Judge SILAS PORTER,
Topeka, Kans.:

I am glad to have your telegram. For the past month, since it became evident that war with Germany was inevitable, I have heartily favored the plan of raising an army by selective draft rather than through the volunteer system. The former seems to me the wisest, most certain, and most democratic method of securing an effective fighting force. It represents logic and reason and good sense rather than the mere sentiment which attaches itself to much of the argument for the volunteer plan. The people of my district sent me here to act for the best interests of the Nation as I am given the light to see those interests. And I shall vote without equivocation or hesitancy for the selective draft in the belief that thereby I am serving my country best.

JOUETT SHOUSE.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to add to the expression of opinion set forth in that telegram, which I believe either now is or within the next few weeks will be an embodiment of the opinion of the thinking men of my State. [Applause.]

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish in a few simple words to express my view on the question before us.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] strikes from the bill which we have before us the provision authorizing a volunteer system to raise the Army for our country in this great crisis. The amendment, if adopted, would establish the so-called selective-draft system. I, of course, have no criticism to offer upon any of my colleagues for the position they hold. I was pleased with the sentiment which has been expressed here that we are all equally patriotic. I have not been able to bring my mind to that position where I can vote for the so-called selective-draft system. [Applause.] I am opposed to establishing in this country a system of universal compulsory military training and service in time of peace. I am opposed to that system in time of war except after you have given the volunteer system a reasonable trial.

I have received a good many telegrams appealing to me to stand by the President. These appeals strike me with considerable force, because in times of international difficulty, and especially in time of war, people make that appeal with the idea that to stand by the President means to stand by the country—that loyalty to the President means loyalty to the flag. But the President does not ask Members of Congress to sacrifice their honest judgment and conscientious opinions.

I have sometimes wondered whether in this conflict into which we are entering I shall be able to contribute anything for the success of the armies of my country, but above all I hope that by no act or vote of mine shall I hinder the success of my country in that great contest. [Applause.] And feeling that way I am constrained to vote against this amendment.

Now, in time of danger is no time to try experiments. So far as raising an army, so far as this country is concerned, the selective-draft system is an experiment, because in all of the great wars of the past in which our soldiers have won such imperishable renown and glory we have raised the armies almost exclusively through the volunteer system. Shall we in this hour of danger try an experiment? I am opposed to conscription until a reasonable effort has been made to raise our army through the volunteer system.

But, gentlemen, whatever method we may select, whatever system we may adopt, I believe that the people of this Nation will everywhere rally to the flag and support the plan which we adopt and carry the great war to victory. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Mr. Chairman, during the few years I have occupied a seat in this House I have seldom cared to occupy its time in discussing subjects upon which our Members generally have fixed and unchangeable opinions.

I desire to say, also, that I have seldom cared to explain my vote, but preferred to let it be interpreted by those interested in the subject being discussed.

As I view it, the contest between the volunteer system on the one hand and conscription on the other goes to the very substance of our Government. Never since the adoption of the Declaration of Independence has so abrupt a change been suggested as this one asking that we no longer adhere to our national custom of nearly a hundred and fifty years and adopt the German military system of drafting our young men aged from 19 to 25 years, and proposing to do this not only before an opportunity for volunteering is had by our youths but before a single shot has been fired by us in the war.

The leader of the majority side of this House [Mr. KITCHIN] a few days ago spoke a whole volume when he said, in substance at least, it takes very little courage for a Member of Congress to vote to send the other fellow to war. I wish to paraphrase his remark by saying it takes more nerve than I possess to look the young men of this Republic in the face and say, "I voted to disgrace you as a conscript and send you, without your consent and without an opportunity to show your willingness to fight for your country, to fight more than 3,000 miles from your native land, in European trenches." Yes, I insist, this would take great courage.

But we do not stop here. We are asked to send only those between 19 and 25 years of age—a bunch of schoolboys, as it were—making them bear the whole burden of the war, many of them never having cast a vote or taken any part in running our Government.

But the advocates of this delightful draft system do not stop here, but propose by some autocratic power which they do not explain, simply because they do not know what it will be, to select from all drafted those who must go to the trenches and those who may by the permission of this chosen autocrat stay at home.

And then they have the "unadulterated gall" to call their draft system democratic and fair. Gentlemen, the Czar of Russia would have blushed at such a system in his palmy days.

They admit that volunteer soldiers have fought all the wars in which America has been engaged up to this time, and yet they insist that the volunteer system has always been a failure.

I dare any man to name a war in all the world's history that was won by conscript soldiers. The books are wide open for investigation. Look them over and name the war so won, if you can. Take American history. Was it conscript soldiers that won the Battles of Concord, Lexington, and Bunker Hill? Your only answer is no, not a conscript among them. Was it drafted men that crossed the Delaware with Washington and captured the Hessians, or that went hungry at Valley Forge during that awful winter never to be forgotten by American patriots? Your answer again must be no. Conscripts never would have endured such hardships, even though slaves they be. To perform such deeds of valor requires volunteers whose hearts are in the cause for which they are fighting. Then we must conclude drafted men did not win the Revolution, but volunteers rather. Then run hastily over the pages of the War of 1812. How many drafted men helped Perry win the Battle of Lake Erie? How many conscripts followed Brown and Scott to Chippewa and Lundys Lane? And again your answer is "Not one." When Andrew Jackson drove the British from New Orleans, with whom did he do it? Conscript men? No; his followers were green volunteers, largely from Tennessee.

Were Scott and Taylor failures in the war with Mexico? You will agree they were not. Did they win that war with drafted men? No; not a conscript in the whole army.

Now, coming down to a time within the memory of men still living, let us view the War of the Rebellion and see if the volunteer system was a failure there.

The war was practically over before men were drafted at the North. And even then only about 62,000 ever reached the service, and the universal report of the old soldiers is that the draft recruits were never worth the crackers they consumed.

Who followed Hooker to the top of Lookout Mountain? Who fought the Battle of Missionary Ridge? Go to the old soldiers and tell them these men were failures and see what they say to you in reply.

Were the men who marched through Georgia with Sherman drafted men or volunteers? Were the men who fought at the Battle of Manassas or Bull Run along with Lee and Jackson conscripts?

I am sorry for the American who has the temerity to stand up and say the Volunteers who have added so much glory to our national renown are failures and have been failures, and all this talk about American valor is just talk in which we indulge to flatter our ex-soldiers.

But every rational man knows America has been successfully defended throughout her entire history by volunteer soldiers, and he should blush at the statement that these men have been failures, Henry Watterson to the contrary notwithstanding.

But, say some of the conscript advocates, times have changed. The old stagecoach was all right in its day. Now, let me show you the fallacy of that cheap talk as applied to the subject before the House. We are discussing the assembling of an army, not the handling of one, nor the change in the munitions of war. Everybody knows war is conducted very differently now from what it was 50 years ago. But the manner of fighting battles is not what we are discussing. That is not the issue before the court. What is the issue? you ask. The only question is, How shall we assemble an army—shall it be by conscription or by volunteers? Let us not lose sight of the real issue.

We know it takes experienced men to fight battles in modern warfare. But what have we to do with that? When it comes to collecting an army to do our fighting we find that human nature has changed very little since the early dawn of history. The same impulses govern human action. The same martial spirit is required now to make a good soldier that was required when Alexander conquered Asia Minor, when Hannibal crossed the snowy Alps into the Roman Empire, when Napoleon marched to Moscow, or when Lee marched over the mountain wall on his way to Gettysburg.

But we are told we must listen to experts. Experts in what? If the term means anything in this connection, which I doubt, then it can only mean an expert in getting men into the Army. Let us see who of those suggested can qualify as experts in assembling an army. To qualify, the proposed expert must first prove experience. Under this well-established rule, can the President, whom we are asked to follow, qualify? When did he have experience in this particular work, and where was he educated in militarism?

But it may be said his advisers are experts. That very naturally turns our attention to the Cabinet, and we look the members over in search for an expert in collecting troops for the war. The Secretary of War is first looked to as an expert, and we find his experience confined entirely to the assembling of a police force for the city of Cleveland, Ohio.

So we find, after all, that the constitutional provision leaving this matter to the Congress was no great mistake, and we may as well do it on our own motion as to take orders from experts of doubtful qualification.

We are cautioned not to make the mistake that England made by collecting an army in the beginning by a volunteer system. And yet they tell you England enlisted 5,000,000 men by the volunteer system before they even tried conscription. Does that look like it was a mistake? And Canada and Australia never have drafted their soldiers and yet have their full quota in the army and the best fighting soldiers of all the allies, just as you would expect, knowing they are volunteers and not conscripts.

With this object lesson before you, why do you want to fasten onto a brave man the stigma and disgrace of being drafted when he would volunteer if you would only give him a chance?

But, you say, time is of the essence of the case before us. Suppose it is. It has been shown by the best authority available that by the volunteer method we can get an army in the field before you can take a census and get ready for a draft. Then, if you are worrying about delay, let us get busy with the old never-failing (up-to-date) volunteer system. Under the latter we can get into the field within three months an army of enthusiastic young Americans who will take Europe by storm and not an army made up of a lot of sickly conscripts shaken out of the dice box and sent abroad under a guard like slaves. Expect men gathered in this way to fight! No; that would be expecting too much in the light of past history.

A gentleman said on the floor of the House to-day in trying to defend conscription, "We are just about to abandon the volunteer system on the American continent forever." If the conscript bill passes then nothing hereafter will be known but the draft system. Let me say to you in all earnestness, if that is true then good-by to that American liberty for which our fathers fought to make and died to sustain. The present crisis is about to furnish an opportunity for the establishment of a military despotism wherein every man will be made a machine soldier to go at the bidding of some new-found despot. It will, of course, be started in a mild form, such as universal military training, universal military service—very mild terms that mean just what they meant in Germany 40 years ago and will grow in a quarter of a century to mean in America just what they now mean in Germany and which we pretend to be fighting to put out of existence. Oh, yes! Militarism is all wrong in Germany but all right in America. Oh, no! Let us be true to ourselves, true to our past history which we mention with so much pride, and, being thus true, not be false to the world. We talk about making our Government so ideal that it may be an example for all the Governments of the globe. Then let liberty still be its corner stone, and let us not adopt militarism in its stead, as proposed by the advocates of conscription.

But there is one other feature of this discussion that must not pass unnoticed. The advocates of conscription insist that it is the only fair and democratic way of assembling soldiers. We realize that true genius is often shown by calling a very bad thing a pretty name. The conscript advocates have certainly gone the limit when they joined the word "democracy" with conscription. Let us stop and analyze their favorite expression for the draft bill. They say it is a select universal democratic conscription. An Irishman would say, "There is no such a d—d animal," and I am Irish just now. If a prize were offered for the most incongruous expression in the English language I would win it by using their description of conscription. Notice: Universal means everybody; select means only a part; democracy means the greatest freedom possible in government; conscription means no freedom at all on your part, but a complete submission to the will of the powers that be. Look it over and see if you can equal it for incongruity anywhere else in the English language.

But let us go a step further. They say they believe in universal service as the only fair method. And yet they propose to draft only a lot of school boys aged from 19 to 25 years. Now, what do you think of that as being universal? Young men aged from 25 to 35 in the very prime of manhood are not to be interrupted in this beautiful plan of universal service.

But they do not stop here. After talking about making service universal they then come to a select feature which means the exact opposite. Universal. Oh, no; we select. Having drafted all the boys from 19 to 25 we will now, by some process totally unknown, but which you must take on faith, submit your liberty to the dictates of some autocratic power a part of the military machinery who will say whether you shall go to the trenches of Europe or remain at home. And you must keep perfectly silent. Have confidence in the divine right of kings. He can do no wrong. Beautiful democracy this. Young men of America, are you ready to indorse a system like this?

But its advocates say they are after the slacker, the laggard, the fellow who frequents the pool room. And yet they let these persons go free if they are past 25 years of age. Punish the boys, but let the men go free.

The whole story is they intend to send the poor boy to the trenches and let the high brow, who has a pull with this dogmatic power that is to make the selection, and his son go free, unless they can get a commission and play the officer rôle. What an opportunity for the potentate who makes the selection! Watch him thrive.

But by your sophistry you hope to lull to sleep the American people, who are always hopeful and trustful. You say to them, "We will leave the farmer at home." Or, rather, this kingly potentate will come along and tell every one of you just what you shall do, what kind of work you shall perform. He will say to one boy, "Go to war and guard this other boy who stays in the bank. His father needs him to help run the finances and get rich. Sixteen dollars is sufficient for you, Johnny. All you have to do is to go to France and lie in the trenches, and this you shall do as a punishment for having sometime visited a pool room, but more especially for not having a pull with the powers that be."

With the departure of the volunteer system and the inauguration of the conscript system, which is only another name for militarism, we may say good-by to that American liberty we have cherished and loved so well since the days of our childhood.

The volunteer soldier, whose valor we have worshiped, is to be forgotten and branded a failure. The heroes of Shiloh and Gettysburg and Missionary Ridge are hereafter to be effaced from our memory, and if we mention them we will be under suspicion. Hereafter we must dream only of conscription and militarism. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken on this occasion principally because I have been threatened by certain interests by their saying if I dared to vote against the conscript system and for volunteers I would be digging my political grave. That is not important; but my opponent has announced himself, as I learn, as the champion of conscription, and I want at this time to accept the challenge and let the issue between us be conscription or volunteers. Which? And we will let our election or defeat be a referendum and settle the question in the eleventh congressional district as to which system our voters prefer. If I win, they believe in volunteers; if my opponent wins, then it is understood that they want the draft system and militarism and believe the volunteer system obsolete.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether it is worth the effort to talk on this subject when I feel certain that the speeches made here for the last several days have not changed one vote. For my own part I know I have not been convinced. I do feel this, however: That I am sorry that a number of the leaders of this House disagree on this great subject. We can not all agree, it is true, but when I came down here to this Congress I hoped the men who have been leaders for many years would be as one, but I now see that divergent ideas hold in their views at times. We are not now at child's play. We have come to a time in the history of this country when we are making very serious history indeed. We have come to a time when difficult and peculiar circumstances surround us. The fact is we are at war and have so declared and so voted. We have gone further. We have voted the people's billions of this country to carry on war. Then we came to a point where we find that billions of money will have to be backed up with men, and we examine the situation and find that we have been short of recruits for the last three or four years. Our Army officers who have come before our committees have reported the same thing, that people are not joining.

Our admirals have said that they were short of men in the Navy.

If we have voted for war, if we have furnished the finances for it, if we mean anything at all, then we should furnish the men, and I am unequivocally for taking the men into the Army and into the Navy, and I believe that the people of this country believe in the same thing. Last week I was at home in Edgewood, near Pittsburgh, and went to a meeting in my town, and there were a number of people anxious to show their patriotism. They were forming a home-defense organization, a rifle organization, and allotting ground for raising vegetables; in short, trying to support the advice of the President. Just then the newspapers reported that the committee in Congress having in charge the bill for selective conscription reported adversely on the bill. I said to those present, "I notice in the daily papers that the committee has reported adversely on selective conscription, but I believe that a majority of the Members of this Congress are going to vote for it and that it will pass," and every man rose up in acclaim for it. [Applause.] That was sufficient for me, and I believe that people are pretty much alike everywhere in this country. If there is to be war, the people want it pushed forward and pushed properly, and there is only one way to do it, and that is to get the men who will shoot the guns while others are raising the food, while others are furnishing the clothing, while others are furnishing the ammunition and the guns for them; and I believe the people of this country will support this bill. I am willing to ge before my people in Pennsylvania and say I voted for it and believe in it. I am for selective conscription. [Applause.]

Now, one word as to how we have arrived at the condition we now find ourselves in relative to the war. I would not lay responsibility to anyone's door. The time for the "I told you so" is past, in my opinion. The time to have held back on the part of those who are now halting in the demands of this bill was in the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress. The President came before that Congress requesting certain action, and a majority acceded thereto and so voted. Whether the conditions would have been different if the action had not been taken will never be known, but now that a situation has come about that war has been declared and is inevitable, perhaps, through a condition arising from that action, we should find all ready to vote for the President's demands, giving to him the possibility to prosecute the war. I feel assured that when the final vote is taken that a large number of those who now oppose will be for the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman. I am against conscription. [Applause.] To-morrow we will vote on that issue. It may be that a majority of this House will vote in favor of conscription, but I want to say to those gentlemen who have made such a gallant fight to maintain the American system that they should not lose heart whatever to-morrow's result may be.

This fight against militarism is only beginning.

As has been confessed during this debate, the real object of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is not to meet this emergency. Mr. KAHN knows and every man in this House knows that the American people have never failed to respond to the call of their country, and I have confidence enough in them, although they may not be enthusiastic for this war, to believe that they will furnish all the volunteers that may be needed to win any fight in which their country may become involved.

But that is not the object of the struggle that the General Staff is making. They do not desire to establish the compulsory system for an emergency. Their object is the establishment in this country of a compulsory military service. They want that in times of peace as well as in times of war.

There are two classes in this Republic who are demanding compulsory service. The first are the gentlemen in the War Department; 6,000 of them will receive promotions when this bill goes through; 6,000 of them will draw more salary from Uncle Sam.

In addition to that, "big business" wants a large standing army. Go into any community in this land and find the man who is most oppressive to labor and you will find that he is the man who is shouting the loudest for conscription [applause], and he will do it all in the name of democracy. [Applause.]

My friends, if history has established any one principle so that it can not be questioned, it is that democracy and militarism can not exist side by side. [Applause.] I am a Democrat. [Applause.] I am opposed to militarism. [Applause.] I expect to vote against it to-morrow, and I will vote against it at every opportunity that I get thereafter. [Applause.]

So far as I am concerned this is merely the first battle in the campaign against militarism. I want to say to those political gymnasts who have found it convenient to change their minds so frequently and so amazingly during the last few days, that I feel toward them like that kingly English general felt when he said,

> Proclaim it, Westmoreland, through my host,
> That he which hath no stomach to this fight,
> Let him depart.

And so I say to those gentlemen that if you have not the nerve to stand up and be counted when democratic principles are at stake, if on such a great occasion instead of being American Congressmen you place your consciences in the custody of some executive official along Pennsylvania Avenue, get out of the way and give some one who has the requisite courage an opportunity to do something. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, just one word more. I want to congratulate the chairman of this Military Affairs Committee and those splendid gentlemen who have not changed their minds. If they have not succeeded in defeating militarism they have at least saved the boys of this country from conscription. You and you alone, gentlemen, are responsible for shoving up the age limit in this bill from 19 to 25 to 21 to 40. And if you accomplish nothing more you may leave this Chamber to-morrow night conscious of the fact that every mother in America will remember you in her prayers. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], I am a Democrat, and have always been and am now opposed to militarism, believing that militarism is detrimental to a republic and democratic form of government, and all our military experts who are supposed to know and in whom we have and must have confidence and who will conduct this war, tell us that the present system can not prevail. They advise us and insist that we must have universal service to be successful in this great struggle. They point out our own sad experience as well as that of Great Britain.

For that reason and other reasons I shall shortly give I shall vote for the measure advocated by the President, in whom I have, and the country should have, the utmost confidence, and whose advice I have taken and followed since his election. However, Mr. Chairman, I have taken the floor mainly for the purpose of answering insinuations on the part of certain gentlemen who at all times are under the impression that they have a mortgage on the patriotism in this country and that all the patriotism is in their bosom and in their district, and who at all times desire to cast reflections upon our foreign-born citizens. To these gentlemen I desire to say that at this time the foreign-born citizens are again demonstrating to the country that they are patriotic citizens, desirous of doing their share and bearing their part for their adopted country. This morning I saw an article in one of the Chicago papers, and I thought it my duty to bring it to the attention of the House, and it gave me a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction when I read the following:

TWO HUNDRED BOHEMIANS LEAVE FOR CAMP OF UNITED STATES REGULARS.

Headed by the Bovolny Bohemian Band and escorted by their mothers, sisters, and sweethearts, 200 Bohemian recruits for the Regular Army marched from Pilsen Sokol Hall, 1814 South Ashland Avenue, last night to the Army recruiting office at 526 South State Street.

And the meeting place of these patriots is only a block and a half from my home.

There the band played the "Star-Spangled Banner" and the Bohemian national air while a crowd of 2,000 stood uncovered.

At the recruiting office the Bohemian youths were joined by 300 other recruits. All departed from the Illinois Central Station on a special train for Jefferson Barracks, Mo., where they will undergo training.

But not only the Bohemian-Americans, but the Poles, Jews, Slavs, Croatians, and others of foreign nationalities are doing their duty, as is shown by the daily enlistments in the State of Illinois, which State is leading all other States and which is mainly due to the splendid enlistment of its foreign-born citizens.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SABATH. In just one second.

This has been going on for the last three weeks. Each and every day from 200 to 300 of these men of foreign birth and foreign parentage of my city have volunteered their services to this country.

Mr. BOOHER. Just one question.

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. BOOHER. Were those men put in the Army or Navy by a selective conscription or were they volunteers?

Mr. SABATH. They are volunteers, but I wish to say this, that it is manifestly unfair that they should volunteer while a great many professional patriotic gentlemen should remain at home. I believe in equal rights and equal opportunities, and I believe in equal duty and equal responsibility. [Applause.]

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield for another question? Are they not a different class of people than you would get by your selective draft?

Mr. SABATH. One of the reasons that I favor the selective draft is that I believe the people all over the country should be made to serve the country that protects them. [Applause.]

Mr. BOOHER. Please enlighten the committee as to how you are going to get that class you refer to by selective draft.

Mr. SABATH. That has been restated on this floor so often that it is not necessary for me to reiterate it again. But I will state that under the amendment which will be offered and which I know will be adopted I am confident that all, and not only those of whom I have spoken, will be obliged to serve alike, and no special favors or exemptions from duty will be shown the rich and influential or to those that shouted the loudest and most for militarism, for universal service, and for war. I shall read the amendment to which I have referred, and I know the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] will vote for it:

No bounty shall be paid to induce any person to enlist in the military service of the United States, and no person liable to military service shall hereafter be permitted or allowed to furnish a substitute for such service; nor shall any substitute be received, enlisted, or enrolled in the military service of the United States; and no such person shall be permitted to escape such service or to be discharged therefrom prior to the expiration of his term of service by the payment of money or any other valuable thing whatsoever as consideration for his release from military service or liability thereto.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RAMSEY] is recognized.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I had not expected to say anything to this committee upon the matter now before us. It is the first time that I have taken advantage of an opportunity to address the Members of the House of Representatives. The only thing that I have done in an official capacity since I have been a Member of this body has been to vote upon the various matters that have been presented to us. And I rise now only for one purpose, and that is to explain to the Members of this House, to my constituency, and to the people of the United States in general why and how I propose to vote as I will upon the bill and the matters now before us. We all know the importance of the questions of legislation which have been considered here. It was my duty to act and to vote upon the joint resolution which was before us, and for which I voted in the affirmative. I had, as I believed, upon me an important duty to perform when I voted "aye" for the purpose of raising the great revenues necessary to carry forth to a successful issue the war, and having done that I now come to another duty, which is to vote upon the bill before us and the amendment which has been proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. Logic and reason must govern a man in the performance of public duty. And in performing my duty under the reason and logic that I have I can see but one course to pursue.

The administration, which is Democratic, and opposed to me politically, has said and does say it wants this bill. The War Department says it wants this bill. The General Staff of the Army say they want this bill. Am I, as a layman, with only a limited knowledge upon matters of war, going to combat that and put my judgment against theirs? In justice to myself I will say no, and therefore I shall support the Kahn amendment and vote for the selective-conscription measure, which is therein contained.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEY. I will for a moment.

Mr. KEARNS. Is the gentleman aware that the Constitution says that you must or ought to exercise your own judgment in this matter, whether you have knowledge or not?

Mr. RAMSEY. In reply to the gentleman I will say this: That my own judgment, my knowledge of the subject matter, coupled with the recommendations of the administration, prompts me to vote as I am going to vote. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is no man who has a greater regard for the volunteer than I have. I know of no person who is entitled——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. RAMSEY. May I have three additional minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSEY. There is no man, as I said, who has a greater regard for the volunteer than I have. No man recognizes the great work that the Volunteers have performed in times past more than I. But the conditions, gentlemen, are different to-day from those that ever before confronted us. We are in a world's war, and we must now grasp the opportunity to perform our function and discharge our duty as those people who know and are in control of this Government suggest—not as they direct, but ask us to. It is not a question of sympathy. It is a question of performance of duty. I want to say only this, that as this solemn duty falls upon us to act, we should act—honestly, conscientiously, without fear, and without favor.

I have confidence in men who are elected to political office. I have confidence in the President of the United States. I have confidence in the men who are conducting the War Department, and I believe that in the performance of their duty they are going to do that which is best for this country, even though I am opposed to them politically; and with that confidence in view, and with that desire, as I say, of rehabilitating our liberties, and for the purpose of having our flag respected throughout the world, and in order that this country may be recognized in the future as it has been in the past as the greatest Republic in the universe, I believe that the plan of the selective draft is the proper method by which it can be accomplished. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. How do you stand on the age limit? Do you favor taking boys from 19 to 25, or would you rather take them from 21 to 40?

Mr. RAMSEY. I would prefer taking them from 21 to 40.

Mr. GORDON. Then you disagree with the President on that.

Mr. RAMSEY. Oh, I am not speaking of that to-night. I am speaking on the question of the selective-conscription or volunteer enlistments. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, I propose to vote for the plan of universal selective conscription, not because it is the only way to raise an Army but because it is the surest way. I have arrived at this conclusion with a full realization of my responsibilities to my country, my State, and to my constituents, and only after giving the matter my best thought and consideration.

The essential point for us to keep in mind at this time is that we are in a state of war with the greatest fighting nation on the face of the earth to-day.

While we may not, as yet, have felt any of the physical effects of war, nevertheless we should not for a moment lose sight of the fact that we are at war, and therefore it is our duty, as I see it, to prosecute that war to a victorious end as expeditiously and as fearlessly as the rules of modern warfare will permit.

It appears to me, therefore, that the vital question—and as I view it—the only question that is now before the House for consideration is that of adopting a plan which will enable us to procure a sufficient number of satisfactory troops with the greatest possible dispatch to meet the emergency in which we now find ourselves.

On this question there is considerable disagreement. The President of the United States and the General Military Staff of the Army are of the opinion that this task of raising the necessary troops can best be done under a system of selective draft, which should be put into effect immediately. The majority of the Committee on Military Affairs believes that the volunteer plan should be given a trial at first, and, should that plan fail, then the plan of selective conscription should be put into effect, and they have brought here a bill embodying that plan. The minority of the committee agrees with the President's and the General Staff's plan for selective conscription.

A decision as to which method to use must of necessity be based upon the information at hand as to the amount of time available within which to produce the necessary results, a view which is shared with me by the chief authorities of the State of New Jersey, which in part I have the honor to represent.

So far as I know, information of that character, if possessed by anyone, should be possessed by the Federal authorities. I have talked with The Adjutant General of the War Department to-day on this particular phase of the situation, and he informed me very frankly that no one can give this information with any positive degree of accuracy or certainty.

However, I am informed that it is the opinion and belief of the General Staff of the War Department that, once the machinery for the proposed selective conscription plan is put into operation, there will be practically no delay in recruiting up to the required number of 500,000 for the first increment, and that there is no question in the minds of these expert men who compose the General Staff that quicker results must of necessity be obtained from the selective plan rather than from the volunteer plan.

With the views of The Adjutant General I am inclined to agree, and my mind having been further clarified by conversations which I have had with a number of my colleagues in this House who were volunteers in the Spanish-American War, who now tell me that the conscriptive plan is the most efficient and most equitable system for building up such an Army as we should have in the crisis through which our country is now passing, I believe that it is my bounden duty to support the selective conscriptive plan. [Applause.]

I am further impressed with the fact that my conclusion is right as a result of a statement which I have to-day received from the War Department showing the number of enlistments in the Regular Army up to and including April 24. The total quota of enlistments required to bring the Army up to its authorized war strength is 183,898. From April 1 to April 24 32,108 enlistments were received at the recruiting offices, of which number about 13 per cent were rejected at the recruit depots, leaving approximately 28,000 enlisted during the first 24 days of April, which shows that we are receiving volunteers into the Regular Army at the rate of about 1,000 a day, including Sundays. At this rate it would take about a year and a half to raise an Army of 500,000. Since the shortest possible time to get this Army of 500,000 men is the essential thing we are trying to work out, it does not appear to me that the volunteer system is the plan which will bring that about, although I am willing to admit that were the country actually engaged in battle volunteers would come in in much larger numbers.

I have reached my conclusion on this very important question, I am frank to say, with a great deal of reluctance and after many stormy engagements with my own conscience, for I have heretofore been opposed to conscription or draft in any form, and so publicly stated in my remarks upon the military bill passed by Congress last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended, so that he can finish his speech. It is very interesting, and it is a very valuable argument in favor of the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BACHARACH. Three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACHARACH. I remember, with much pride, the generous response made by the patriotic sons of New Jersey who made up that great body of volunteer soldiers who answered to the call to arms in 1861, when with a population of only 672,000 she sent to the front 67,101 volunteers out of a total number for the entire country of 2,615,769, or slightly more than 2½ per cent of the total number of volunteers raised throughout the Union. One man or boy out of every 10 persons in the State volunteered to fight for the preservation of the Union, a record of which all Jerseymen may well feel proud.

In the Spanish-American War the proportion asked from New Jersey, out of the quota of 200,000 volunteers authorized to be raised, was 4,740, and there were mustered into the service from that State, according to the records of the War Department, 4,163.

I have not the slightest doubt of New Jersey's ability to again raise whatever quota the Government should demand of her in this emergency, should a call for volunteers be issued. The governor of our State at this time has the offer of more than 50 companies who are ready to volunteer their services, and I believe that within a period of 30 days we could raise such a quota as we should be asked for.

But this is an emergency which should not be met by a few States of the Union nor by a limited number of the citizens of those States which have always borne the brunt of battle. It should have the united support of every State and of every American citizen—man, woman, and child—for there is a place for us all in this critical emergency; a place where we are best fitted to perform our duty; and we must all work to bring to an end the most sanguinary war that has ever taken place in the history of mankind, in which our country has aligned herself on the side of right and justice for the extension and perpetuation of the principles of freedom and democracy as against autocracy and oppression.

These are the principles for which this great country of ours has entered this war, and these are the principles for which every American should stand ready to do or die. There should be no slackers; there can be no slackers under the plan of selective service, for each and every one of us shall be called upon, as the necessity shall arise, to perform that particular duty which we are best able to perform for the successful prosecution and speedy termination of the war.

Whether that duty be in the mines, in the factories, on the farms, on the railroads, or on the firing line, we shall one and all be true Americans and each equally as patriotic as the other, for we shall each and all of us be giving the best that is in us for the glory and welfare of the land we love. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has again expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, the battle call of the President as we heard it from that stand several weeks ago, was to "bring Germany to terms and end the war." Having concurred in this declaration by an almost unanimous vote, the question which has been debated here for six days is, How is this to be accomplished? Around this pronunciamento there was much splendid rhetoric and historical embellishment, but "bring Germany to terms and end the war" was the virile predication around which the country is rallying in sustaining unanimity. While Germany can come to terms without war, that nation has not yet done so, and, although it is yet hoped that in the presence of the determination of one hundred and more millions of Americans and our measureless wealth and resources the Kaiser may realize the hopelessness of a finished contest with us, everything now points to actual warfare and attending bloodshed.

Before briefly offering my deductions and conclusions on several phases involved in this debate, I wish to do as many before me have done, and make some personal allusions regarding the unjustifiable attacks which have been made upon Members who are of German extraction, both upon the floor and in some misguided newspapers. While I will not waste any effort at criticism or characterization, it might be said that such newspapers could be at better business at such a critical time in our country's history. When the gentleman in the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, recognized me it was evident to you that I have a German name, and I know it to be a fact that no one other than a Pennsylvania "Dutchman" can correctly pronounce that name. But the fact that one has a German name does not warrant the suspicion that he therefore has some overhead or underground communication with the Kaiser.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. There are a group of us here who always thought the gentleman was Irish. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOCHT. Well, I would be proud of an Irish name, just as we are all proud of the gentleman's Irish wit, especially since my children are part Irish. But the next time anybody makes any observations concerning the fact that I have a German name, I hope he may be some one who can dig up an ancestor who settled in this country in 1720, as mine did in the district that I now represent. I hope he can find a Revolutionary forefather who fought in the Revolutionary War, as one of my forefathers did. [Applause.] I hope he may have a father like mine, who, though he was a preacher and was not required to do so, nevertheless so exposed himself during the Civil War in his country's service that a few months after he returned home he died, and when I was but a year old. Furthermore, while I have had no extensive military experience, I have had military training and was an officer in the National Guard. It would therefore be more prudent and gracious for any who would question one's loyal Americanism simply because he has a German name to in the name of heaven first go and hunt up some Revolutionary ancestors and acquire some sort of a military record, or else keep quiet.

As far as I am concerned, I am an original settler, half English and half German—by no means a carpetbagger—and am proud of my name and all the German there is about it. And to this let me add that, while I do not want to go into family matters too far, it was the source of much satisfaction to me to come home the other day and find that my wife and daughter had joined the Red Cross. And to-day, in my home town of Lewisburg, Pa., in the winding valley of the great Susquehanna River, there is a recruiting station in my own personal, private business office, where Capt. Sam Wolfe, of Troop M, just returned from the border, tells me as soon as they get the order to recruit to war strength they will not only do that, but they can recruit five more companies in Union County—and it is a small county at that. I have here a photograph of the office, and you can see at the front of it a flag 40 feet high. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. I should like to have 15 minutes, for the reason that I represent in part the great State of Pennsylvania, and no one from there has yet spoken on this side of the question under discussion.

Mr. BOOHER. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes, indeed, my dear friend.

Mr. BOOHER. These men whom the gentleman speaks of as enlisting were not going into the Army by the selective draft, were they?

Mr. FOCHT. They were going in as volunteers, as their fathers and grandfathers did. [Applause.]

Mr. BOOHER. Then, of course, the gentleman is for the volunteer system?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes, I am; in preference to conscription, and I hope to state why. It seems to me it was hardly worth while to take these six days to get right down to the kernel of this whole business—the practical, common sense of it all.

I am not a war-board officer nor a constitutional lawyer, but I am a hard-working, attentive, business man, and by attending to the business of the people have been a successful negotiator of the good will and the votes of my good constituents. [Laughter.] I think I can quickly reduce this matter to its essence, just as two men sitting on the opposite side of a table ought to do. I heard several gentlemen discussing the question the other day. One said, "Great heavens, if you have volunteering, and then they fail to volunteer, the Kaiser will know that the volunteering is a failure, and he will think the hearts of the American people are not in this war." The other said, "If you raise an army by conscription, the Kaiser will think that it is not a popular war." Now, which will you have? I once heard a young man make a speech in the Lewisburg opera house. It was the first time he had made a speech, but he was a bright boy and ambitious. In introducing the mayor of Philadelphia he said, "Ladies and gentlemen, before I introduce this distinguished orator I wish myself to make a few observations. Now, as you well know, we had the administration of President Harrison, when happiness and peace and plenty and prosperity invaded every man's dooryard and sat by every man's hearthstone. Since then you have had the administration of Grover Cleveland, with misery and poverty and destitution stalking everywhere across the land. Now, which do you prefer? I think not." [Laughter.] So it is with this question. If volunteering is going to fail, William will think that it is an unpopular war, and with conscription he is going to think the same thing. Which do you prefer? Now, there is where you get right down to it, and it is an easy matter for me to settle the question, at least in my own mind, and I will try to tell you how I arrive at my conclusions.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. FOCHT. Indeed, I am delighted to be interrupted by my most distinguished and scholarly friend from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Which of the two systems do you think the Emperor William himself would prefer us to adopt?

Mr. FOCHT. I think William is sorry he started it, or he will be so when we get through, because whichever way we do it—volunteer or conscription—we will raise an American army, and we will raise a patriotic army, and it will be a victorious army. [Applause.]

Now, what about this question of volunteering or conscription? It has been admitted here by the chief champion of conscription [Mr. GARDNER] that you get better men, more efficiency and enthusiasm from the kind of men who volunteer—those who willingly and cheerfully and enthusiastically go to the colors. On the other hand, we see and admit that the conscriptive method in its operation is more systematic. Now that is how close you get. Which do you prefer? One gives you the best men because they come freely and with heart, while the draft plan is the better as a system. Do you prefer to have at the front patriotic men, who go willingly, with a heart full of enthusiasm and the spirit of patriotism, or will you have there, under the drafting system, what they have been characterizing here as livery-stable loafers and gas-house crimps? Lax and derelict as this class may be in many duties of citizenship, as far as their patriotism is concerned, I believe after all, you have been doing them a great injustice. I have been in contact with every class of people, and there is good in every individual. Just because a man is of humble birth, has had no opportunities, and is even a tough nut, does not prove that he is not patriotic. Whether a man is a tramp or a gas-house loafer, most of those fellows are dare devils and will fight more courageously than a cigarette-smoking dude or the chap who plays golf instead of chopping wood or hoeing potatoes. [Laughter and applause.]

The plain, simple reason why I prefer to vote for the volunteer system is that when a man volunteers and goes into the service of his country, by his own election and free will, he is there because his heart is there and the boys from his own neighborhood are by his side. His heart is right and his head is right, and nothing can stop an army of such men. Of course, if this is going to become a great militarist Nation, if it is something more than "bringing Germany to terms and ending the war," then it ought to be so stated, and we could vote according to our conclusions on that proposal.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. About what per cent of American citizens of those who have declared their intentions to become citizens does the gentleman consider are patriotic.

Mr. FOCHT. I consider all, aside from the people who have been designated or characterized in the papers as German spies, as being at least patriotic enough to like America better than any other country or they would go somewhere else.

Mr. RAKER. Then the gentleman's answer is that 100 per cent of those native born who enlist are patriotic?

Mr. FOCHT. Native born, yes; and who volunteer.

Mr. RAKER. Then conscription would apply to all equally?

Mr. FOCHT. We know how the civil service is operated here, and we can tell better when it comes to performance, and besides we understand there are to be numerous exemptions which would necessarily preclude such a thing as equality.

Mr. RAKER. If you drew 100 men for a jury and they were all competent and qualified, the first 12 drawn there would be no objection to and you would get a good jury?

Mr. FOCHT. You would. But sitting in a jury box is not going to the trenches, and a volunteer will surely be more efficient than the man who is a patriot, but "prefers that his wife's relations do the fighting."

Mr. RAKER. If you have 20,000,000 American citizens and all patriotic and you drew 1,000,000 by lot, you would get a million patriotic American citizens?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; that is a splendid theory; but in practice you get some who wish to go and some who do not, although the assumption is that all are patriotic and should desire to enlist. But my objection and only serious objection is that when you take men by conscription you deny many brave and willing men the right to volunteer, and since I believe more than enough volunteers are available I must adhere to my conclusions. Talk about any patriotic ardor or fight being in a man when you have to force him to the front!

What would have happened to Napoleon without that spirit of devotion that animated the hearts of the boys who followed him across the Alps and over the plains of Italy? What was it that enabled him to crush five Austrian armies in one summer, crowning it all with the dazzling victory at Marengo, and right there virtually founding his empire? He went to every capital in Europe he wanted to. He went to Vienna, Berlin, Rome, and Moscow. He crushed to fragments every feudal throne from the Seine to the Tiber. No slackers in his army, just enthusiastic devotees, although to be sure there was a species of universal service in France adopted by the Council of Five Hundred in 1798 for permanent defense against near-by enemies, but not for "an emergency," as is proposed here. Talk about the War College and experts! He had them, to be sure, but what would have been a substitute for the courage and devotion of the brilliant Murat, who was the son of an humble butcher, and a host of other marshals? And what brought Napoleon back from Elba, and in three months enabled him to gather an army of old men and boys and drive Wellington to defeat, but who was spared capture and annihilation by the arrival of Blücher? If Blücher had not turned up that evening in 1815 we all know that at this time the map of Europe would show altogether different divisions. How did Napoleon fight these battles against the world? He not only had enthusiasm back of him, the ardor of the willing soldier, but he cast aside all the old methods, adopted new ones, and won his victories. So that the system we may adopt to-day might not work to-morrow, but the man power of the volunteer is always to be depended upon.

At Gettysburg Lee, Longstreet, and Hill adopted the plan of Napoleon at Wagram, where he broke the center and turned the right on the Austrians and the Russians. Gen. Lee tried the same thing, and against whom did he try it? He tried it against Meade and Hancock and Gregg and other volunteers. Hancock and Meade were both volunteer soldiers.

In the thick of the fight Hancock said to Meade, "For God's sake, hold this line for five minutes until I can bring up reenforcements," and Meade held the line until reenforcements came up and they rolled the tide that had swept over the slopes of Gettysburg back to defeat and the end of the war. What kind of men were they who withstood this shock of battle? The men who resisted this assault on Cemetery Ridge, on Round Top, The Wheat Field, and Culps Hill, were all volunteers and did not have to be conscripted. I have often talked with Capt. Miller, Capt. Himmelreich, W. L. Donochy, and others from my home town who were there, and they spoke with pride of being volunteers. The Logan Guards, of Lewistown, Pa., organized by Col. Hulings, were the first out at the call of Lincoln. The call came during the day and that night at 12 o'clock the guards slept under the Dome of the Capitol, and they were followed by the First Defenders, of Pottsville, in the district represented by my good friend HEATON. These First Defenders were given medals of honor by the United States Congress, every one of them, for having been here even before the Sixth Massachusetts got through to Baltimore, and for their fighting afterwards.

I can not reconcile myself to the claim that you are going to get better service from conscripts than from volunteers. Representative KAHN to-day spoke of a conversation we recently had during which I referred to the patriotic Hackenberg family in Snyder County in my district, which furnished nine brothers as volunteers. They wanted to go, and they wanted nothing to interfere, as is now proposed. I have a letter from my friend, Mr. J. Harry Myers, of Huntingdon County, who says his five sons will volunteer and he will go himself, if accepted. My sturdy, patriotic predecessor here, Maj. Thad. M. Mahon, of Chambersburg, was proud of his record as a volunteer soldier, and so was Capt. Siders, of the same town, also Lieut. Commander S. M. Strite, who, on the Olympia, under Admiral Dewey, sailed to victory over the mines of Manila Bay. This brave Chambersburg officer was not a conscript, but a proud volunteer. What about Pennsylvania's three intrepid soldiers, Gen. Hartranft, Gen. James Cameron, and Gen. William McCall? These three illustrious leaders were volunteers. Col. Robinson and Capt. D. G. Alter, of Juniata County, saw gallant volunteer service.

The boys of Bucknell University, led by Capt. Andrew Gregg Tucker, were all volunteers, as was Dr. John Howard Harris, now president of that institution. Perry County gave more volunteers than any county of its size in the country and her sons are ready for any call to duty. From all over the district I represent, from Upton to Greencastle, in Franklin County, and Buck Valley, Hustontown, and McConnellsburg, in Fulton County, to the top of the White Deer Mountain at the north of my district, halfway across the State, volunteers came from every township, hamlet, and town. From first to last they were true and every one a brave man. I want to see their sons and grandsons have the same opportunity of serving as volunteers, freely and willingly and not as conscripts.

I remember when, in 1903, I was deputed by the Senate of Pennsylvania to welcome President Roosevelt to Harrisburg, the Chief Executive in addressing the crowd noticed an old soldier wearing a G. A. R. button standing near him, and he said to him: "We want to stand together, all Americans for the best there is for us regardless of station. When you old veterans and G. A. R. men were ordered to charge in battle you were not concerned whether the man at your right was a blacksmith or a banker, or the man to the left of you a hod carrier or a college president; all you wanted to know was whether in the heat of conflict they would 'stay put.'" Let me say that in any trial in this crisis the volunteer will "stay put." And so would the Colonel if allowed to lead a Volunteer Army to Europe.

I do not want to see a situation created that will prevent the men who bear the proud name of Taylor, in Mifflin County, Pa., denied the right to volunteer as did their heroic ancestor, Gen. John P. Taylor, who fought in 67 battles and was a volunteer. In this sad hour, when war seems inevitable, and sorrow must fall among many, why is it that those who want to can not go and fight? This bill provides for the service of the last available man, and the country will surrender to every hardship to win the war and bring lasting peace, so why the insistence that conscription is the only way?

And why must the National Guard, of which we are so proud in our State, be denied its full opportunity and status as to promotions for its officers who have served so long and efficiently? We believe that under Gen. Thomas J. Stewart, the State's adjutant general, Gen. Clements, Col. O'Niell, Col. Dougherty, Col. Coryell, and others of long service, Pennsylvania's Guard would meet every test as a nucleus for a fighting and dependable Volunteer Army.

During these long days of debate I have listened to every argument put forth, but none were more convincing than those presented by the veteran statesmen, Speaker CLARK and JOSEPH G. CANNON, and that illustrious soldier and statesman, Gen. SHERWOOD, all of whom yet have faith in the patriotic and superior efficiency of the American volunteer. If I care to seek the advice or counsel of anybody, I would trust these men, for I feel assured that they are unselfish and disinterested; men who have arrived at that time of life when they are not easily stampeded by a widely exploited idea and untried theory, and whose only hope and prayer and glory is to add to and not detract from their own fair fame. Their heart's desire is to do that thing which is the best thing for our war-threatened country. I would rather sit at the feet of these three men of ripened years, of knowledge and wisdom, as well as patriotism, than to cast aside at this critical time the traditions of the country which have always kept us safe.

This country was bequeathed to us a people's country, and then let us trust the people who have accepted the responsibility of forever perpetuating it. Do not let us be suspicious of American patriotism, for it is bred and born in every man worthy of such glorious citizenship.

Such are my convictions and conclusions as to this phase of one of the countless difficult problems to be met and solved before the war is over, but whatever the decree of this committee on this section may be, the bill as a whole will have my support and my vote, as will all measures looking to the defense and perpetuation of our national life and our institutions as they now exist.

Throughout this fearful ordeal which is threatened there will be but a common purpose, and with every man true and contributing something, and trusting the God that has directed the destiny of our country, the uplifted hands of the wives and mothers of this land will call forth from on high a power before which all tyrants or oppressors will be crushed to ashes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this is a dark and solemn hour. No thoughtful man underestimates the great importance of the question we are considering to-night. The dark clouds overspreading the sky and the gentle rain falling upon the tender grass but symbolize the darkness o'erspreading the national sky and weeping tenderness of the Nation's heart. Ours is a peaceful country; it loves peace and despises war. It was dedicated to the cause of peace, and in following peaceful pursuits it has won the admiration of the world. It was, indeed, a rude awakening that suddenly plunged this hundred millions of people into the vortex of war. With the same energy and devotion that we grapple with the industrial problems must we now solve the greater problem that lies before us.

We have in the United States more than 20,000,000 men of military age. Not all of them will be needed in the actual theater of war. It is thought that but a small portion of this number will be utilized. The question naturally arises at the outset, Who is to go and who is to remain at home? How are we to select the man who is to fight our battles? is the question raised by the Kahn amendment.

I can easily understand why men in this hour hesitate to give up the plan inaugurated by Washington, indorsed by Lincoln, and adopted by McKinley. Our history is replete with heroic deeds of the American volunteers, and many of us give up the volunteer plan with some reluctance. But the adoption of another plan will not rob them of the glory of their achievement.

For four days I have listened attentively to the speeches made on the floor of this House on the respective merits of these two plans of raising an army. At the outset I was prejudiced in favor of the volunteer system. But this debate has convinced me that in this great emergency, at the outset of our engaging in war with the greatest military power in the world we should make no mistake and should adopt the principle of the selective draft. [Applause.] It is the most equitable; it is the most scientific. For upon every man of military age, no matter what his circumstances may be, rests the obligation of defending his country and his country's flag. [Applause.]

After listening to what has been said, I am convinced that the army could be raised by either of the methods proposed. But I am likewise convinced that the great burden of it would fall on the young men of finer sensibilities, of more sensitive dispositions, and moved by nobler feelings of patriotism. It would likewise fall upon men with families depending upon them. Under the plan of the selective draft it is not the intention of the War Department to draft a man who is married or who has a family depending upon him for support.

Let no one imagine that the correct solution of this problem will remove the horrors of war. No plan that we adopt can accomplish that. Those who advocate the volunteer system are in error when they contend that great wrongs and hardships can not exist through its operation. In Canada, where they have raised by the volunteer plan an army for over-seas service of more than 400,000 out of a total population of 8,000,000, they have been compelled to resort to methods that are cruel almost to the point of being fiendish. We are told that there the schoolboy places upon the lapel of his coat a button upon which is printed the words, "My father is at the front defending his country. Where is yours?" Without understanding the meaning of their words, little boys go home from school and ask their fathers why they can not wear a button like that. Under the volunteer system there men have been driven to enlistment when they should be defending their families at home.

I received a letter from a good woman at home whom I know very well, and her experience will be the problem of thousands of mothers under the volunteer plan. She has two sons in their twenties. Both want to enlist, but both of them can not go. One must remain behind to do the work at home. She is called upon to decide which one shall go and which one shall remain at home. Should we not save the hundreds of thousands of mothers throughout the land the agony of deciding questions like that? [Applause.]

My friends, it will not be the boys alone who will suffer in this war. There will be millions of heartaches throughout the length and breadth of the land. The real battles of a nation are not fought by its men alone. I am persuaded that the sufferings of the mothers of the Republic will be as great as that of the men. The problem of the wife and mother has been beautifully told in those patriotic words of Thomas Buchanan Read:

The wife who girds her husband's sword,
Mid little ones who weep and wonder,
And bravely speaks the cheering word,
What though her heart be rent asunder,
Doomed nightly in her dreams to hear
The bolts of death around him rattle,
Hath shed as sacred blood as e'er
Was poured upon the field of battle!

The mother who conceals her grief
While to her breast her son she presses,
Then breathes a few brave words and brief,
Kissing the patriot brow she blesses,
With no one but her secret God
To know the pain that weighs upon her,
Sheds holy blood as e'er the sod
Received on Freedom's field of honor!

[Applause.]

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present. I am going to have no more of this. There has been an absolute breach of good faith, and I do not propose to stand for it any longer. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Has the gentleman under any privilege of the House stated the reason for making the point of no quorum?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Because there is not a quorum present.

Mr. FARR. You can get all the time you want.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ascertaining whether or not there is a quorum present. [After counting.] Fifty Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I gathered from some unparliamentary language that preceded the motion, unparliamentary because not being directed to the business before the House, that some reason had been stated, and I had not heard it.

Mr. FARR. I will give way to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I do not wish any time.

Mr. FARR. I am willing to give the gentleman time. I go on next, and I am willing to give the gentleman my place.

Mr. RUCKER. I will furnish one machine at least to send all over this town to bring people here to make a quorum.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may have unanimous consent to make this statement, namely, that when we made the agreement to vote to-day it was stated that we would run until half past eight, but when I found there were gentlemen on both sides who wanted to speak it was agreed that they should run on as long as the gentlemen were willing to speak. Every gentleman will have an opportunity during the reading of the bill—because we have only reached the third paragraph of the first section of the bill—to-morrow to speak, and in view of the fact that there is no quorum present and the point has been made, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. RUCKER. I would not do that. We can get a quorum here.

Mr. FARR. I am willing to give the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] my place.

Mr. RUCKER. Here is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR] who has offered to surrender his place.

The CHAIRMAN. The members of the committee who are present here this evening will recollect that just before dinner there was an informal arrangement entered into between the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] on one side and possibly the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]—I do not recollect distinctly—on the other, to the effect that this debate would run to-night in an informal way and the vote on the amendment would be taken to-morrow morning as soon as the House went into Committee of the Whole. And it was understood that those gentlemen who had not spoken, as the result of this informal arrangement, and the committee remaining together, would have the opportunity to speak here to-night.

Then gentlemen began to come to the desk and ask that their names be put down in the order in which they came up. That is the only way this list has been created. And every name on the list that has been called here to-night was put there under those circumstances by the present chairman of the committee or by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] representing the minority side of the committee. And that list has been called precisely in the order in which it was arranged this evening. There has no antecedent list been given to the chairman, and no distinction been given in the recognition here to-night except as the names have been put down. That is all about the list so far as the chairman of the committee is concerned.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the name of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] was in a book kept by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. From this book the names of the gentlemen to be recognized were transferred to a tablet. These names were given me by Mr. KAHN, who laid the list on the table for me to follow. I am sure that the gentleman thinks I did not give him the time he should have, but it was not my fault, and I hope since there are only two more he will allow those speeches to go on and give us his views to-night.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which committee prepared the resolution by which war was declared, as the only man from my State who stood out originally and declared for conscription, some being in doubt and some absolutely in favor of the position opposed to conscription, I went to the minority ranking Member on the Republican side and asked that a certain amount of time be allotted to me. It was promised, and, according to the records turned over to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN], my name appeared as fifth on the list. For four days I have stayed here, and with first one excuse and then another the time that was promised me in good faith has been denied me. There was first one excuse and then another. There has never been a justification.

I do not think that anything that is said here to-night makes any difference in the vote that will be taken by this House. It is merely an effort of justification on the part of the Members of this House in order to put in this RECORD things that they may send to their districts. I do not feel that the people of the district that I represent need hear from me on this. My purpose is too well known. I do not have to apologize or excuse the position that I have taken. If there be men to-night that want their utterances to appear in this RECORD, if there be men here to-night who feel that they ought to have an opportunity to put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD things that they want to say now that this question is settled, I will give them the privilege. I shall never take time while in this House, if I can prevent it, when time is turned over to a Republican who in turn cedes it to a new Member of Congress to dictate the time which is promised in good faith to older Members.

Gentlemen here to-night want to hear themselves talk. I have given them the privilege of doing so. In order that they may hear themselves talk, and not that they may affect the question that is before the American Congress, I will withdraw the point of no quorum. I do not want any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] withdraws the point of no quorum.

Mr. DENT. And I withdraw the motion I made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina withdraws the point of no quorum and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] withdraws his motion.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, does that leave us in position so that the United States can go on again with the war with Germany?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Oh, yes; in spite, Mr. Chairman, of the effort of the distinguished gentleman there.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I did not get into this effort until it was made.

Mr. RAGSDALE. But the gentleman knows it is an absolutely discredited proposition to ever have started anything of the kind.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I did not start any of this. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I may have started it, and I will stop.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR] is recognized.

Mr. FARR. Now that the gentleman has had an opportunity to listen to himself I am glad he is willing to let others talk.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes, sir; talk to themselves.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, I have heard it stated on the floor that the people of this country are not in touch with the questions that we are considering and that they know little about them. I do not think my district is so much different from other districts in this Union, and I disagree with the sentiments expressed that the people are not fully aware of what we are discussing and its importance to them.

I disagree also with the statement made by my good friend from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] that it is only the "classes" who are in favor of selective draft. I happen to be a printer, and I was very happy to-day to get a letter from an old-time friend of mine, Mr. Joseph Oliver, of Scranton, Pa., who served his apprenticeship in a printing office at the time I did. He has seven sons, and he writes me as follows:

As you know, I have seven sons, ranging from 17 to 35 years of age, and after careful study of the problem before Congress I am convinced that the proposition for the selective draft is the best. I trust you will support no measure that will make it possible for anyone to escape doing his part, in the manner prescribed by law, because of political preferment, social standing, or his ability to purchase immunity.

That letters tells the entire story. The selective draft is the best way of getting men when we need them and can best use them, whether to provide the material means for warfare or to do the actual fighting.

I have another letter here from a professional man, Dr. L. M. Gates, also of Scranton, a well-to-do practicing physician, who has one son who will be eligible to the draft. He writes:

While formerly being opposed to conscription or draft for the Army, I am coming to see that it is the only just and logical method, especially in the light of England's experience. As we are now in the struggle, we want to go at it right and with all our might.

American liberty may be won or lost in the trenches of Europe, and I am going to vote for the selective-draft plan because, as I said before, I think it will be the surest and most certain way of getting soldiers when we need them and can best use them. In addition, I am for the selective draft, so that we may utilize every ounce of strength that this great Nation has for this tremendous conflict. We already have too many weak links in our chain of defense, and I shall not vote to add another weak link to that chain. The selective draft will enable us to place the men where they will render the most effective service, either fighting, or in industry, or on the farm.

I want to say to-night that we have much to do in order to provide the munitions and to furnish the food for our people and the armies that are going to be necessary to take part in this conflict.

We heard the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] say this afternoon, favoring an amendment—a provision that would give Col. Roosevelt command of a division—that he could utilize that division in France in four months' time if we had the requisite muskets, or if we could use the musketry and artillery of France. In other words, if it depended on the munitions that we now actually have, we could not for many months utilize a division under Col. Roosevelt across the ocean.

We have been told as to the number of rifles we have in this country. We need millions more in order to provide what will be necessary for the vast number of our soldiers who may be required to fight in the trenches.

Modern warfare is so intense, so comprehensive in its utilization of everything in a nation that can be turned into power and force, that the people of the United States can no longer afford to trust the destiny of this great Nation to chance. We must be prepared to the very utmost to meet all possible conditions that may confront the country. That is the only safe course for us to pursue.

The volunteer system, as brave, unselfish, and patriotic as are those under it who so readily offer their lives, can not cope with the herculean methods of the giant nations now engaged in bloody conflict. We recently had one test of its inefficiency. It required six weeks to get 200,000 men on the border line of Mexico. Germany placed 5,000,000 men in the field in less than one week.

Every man owes it to his country to do his part in some capacity for its preservation, and the President's selective-service plan is the only sensible, practical way in which to utilize our strength. By that method men who can render better service in industry, agriculture, or in other needful work are continued in those lines of service to the extent they are required, while those who can better be spared from their present duties shall be utilized under the colors on the field. The experience of the nations engaged in the great conflict abroad proves the absolute necessity of the selective plan.

Great Britain to-day has a man or a woman in the industries necessary to war for every man in the field. So have the other nations who are shouldering the brunt of the awful struggle. We must not be deceived into thinking that our task will be an easy one. An early peace is not assured. Many possible dangers face us. The chaotic conditions natural to the revolutionary upheaval for liberty in Russia and the great need of that country for equipment in industry and war and for skilled men may lead to a separate peace. Instantly a transformation in conditions would result. Great armies of the central countries would be transferred to the French lines. The call then would be upon this country.

Our unpreparedness in the past has been responsible for many of our wars. So fearfully costly to us in the sacrifice of lives and treasure has been our lack of readiness to protect ourselves and so great the need for preparation for this emergency that I feel confident Congress will show the same common sense and patriotism which have distinguished it in its consideration of recent war measures and pass legislation so essential to develop our full military strength.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may have five minutes additional. Is there objection?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I object.

Mr. FARR. I am obliged to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] is recognized.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the "sob artists," the "weep, my countrymen" experts, had a great field day in the House yesterday. Some who have for years been in the "king" class of "sob squad" orators won a place for themselves in the "emperor" class. Some who have been in the "also ran" class for years yesterday broke in the class that won the "money."

It was a hard day on some of them; they not only had to sob at their own speeches but they had to sob during the speeches of their friends.

And last night, when the people "back home" read these speeches in their papers, they wept—but their tears were tears of mortification.

The "sob artists" wept yesterday from early morning until late at night. They wept about the iniquitous "draft" system, the volunteer, the volunteer system, the mothers, the flag, and our country.

About the only ones for whom they did not weep were the poor mothers and babies who went to a watery grave on the Lusitania and other boats.

They wept about the draft system being forced upon us, but the "draft" is in their bill and they will all vote for it.

They wept about the uniform, the "blue uniform" of the volunteer—a uniform they never wore.

They wept about the "volunteer system"—a system they themselves never tried.

They wept about the "flag," under whose folds they never marched.

They wept about "our country," a call to whose standard they did not answer, under whose banner they did not rally.

They wept about the "poor mother," but no heartbroken mother ever had to sob bitterly because they enlisted or wanted to enlist.

What this country wants to-day is an army raised, not according to the theories of men who are capable of "sobbing" but according to the theories of men who are going to direct our fighting men, not our "weeping willows."

This is no "sobfest" for which we are preparing, but a war, a real war, a war with the greatest military nation of this or any other time.

There is an old rhyme which runs:

If you do as I say, and I do, too,
You'll go to heaven, and I'll go, too;
But if you do as I do, and I do, too,
You'll go to hell, and I'll go, too.

Bringing it down to date, it would read:

If you do as I say, and I do, too,
You'll go and volunteer, and I'll go, too;
But if you do as I did, and I do, too,
You'll stay at home, and I'll stay, too.

There has been a good deal of "sobbing" about boys of 19 fighting for their country. I might say in passing that the Father of our Country entered the military service at 19 and was a major at 20. The hero of New Orleans—Andrew Jackson—enlisted in the Revolutionary War at the age of 14. President Washington appointed William Henry Harrison, also President afterwards, ensign in a regiment of artillery when he was 19; he was promoted a lieutenant when he was 20 and was a captain at 21. Abraham Lincoln served as a private in the war against the Indians at 23. Ulysses S. Grant was a lieutenant of Infantry at 21. Were it not for the boys of 19 the Union could not have been preserved in 1861. David Farragut, afterwards admiral, was placed in temporary command of a ship, as an ensign, before he was 12 years old.

Several Members seem to be indignant that the people throughout the country have been sending telegrams and letters in favor of the selective draft. They do not seem to like this "propaganda," as they call it. I have heard no protests on the floor against the treasonable Antienlistment League, the No-enlistment League, and other similar organizations.

The following letter from Mrs. J. Sergeant Cram, secretary I understand, of the Antienlistment League, explains itself:

Hon. W. FRANK JAMES.

MY DEAR SIR: Being convinced of your desire to know the true sentiments of the great mass of American people in this hour of world crisis, I am writing to let you know that I have found everywhere among what is termed the "common people" a universal aversion to war. To be sure, this aversion is apathetic; not, however, the apathy of indifference, but rather that of despair; the tragic resignation of those who believe they have, and can have, no voice that will be heard.

I therefore, in the name of those countless masses, make you this plea to do your "bit" to keep the country out of war. I feel confident that you will receive the grateful acknowledgment of your constituents in some form or other before next election day if you can accomplish this great and truly patriotic deed.

Very respectfully, yours, Mrs. J. SERGEANT CRAM.

APRIL 7, 1917.

Mrs. J. SERGEANT CRAM,
New York.

MADAM: Your patronizing letter of the 4th instant received.

You talk about the "common people," an expression generally used by people of your class to describe a class far better in patriotism, Americanism, and every other good way than people of your own class.

I belong to what you so patronizingly call the "common people," and am proud of it, proud of the fact that my father was a miner, and still more proud that I am not so unlucky as to be born a member of the class to which you belong.

As every true American, I am pleased to know the "true sentiments of the great mass of the American people in this hour of world crisis," but I could not find it out from you or any of your class. I have just returned from a three-week visit to my district and know what the people of my district think.

Who are you that you should feel that you are the one by which the "common people" may be heard; what know you of the "common people"; what do you know of what they think? There is more patriotism in the little finger of every man, woman, and child in my district, immigrants and sons and daughters of immigrants that we be, than there is in your whole body.

There is no fear that the "common people," as you call them so sneeringly, of my district will not be heard; they elected me to Congress, and they know that they will always have a hearing at any time and place.

You can not act as spokesman for the "common people" of my district, because you do not represent their ideas of loyalty to this Government nor their ideas of patriotism.

The people of my district do not want war, and neither do I, but we have war; war is forced upon us by the acts of another nation and not because this country wanted war. They know full well if war comes, they—not you or people of your kind—will do all the fighting as well as all the suffering. For that reason I am an ardent advocate of universal military service, so that I and their boys and my boys will not have to defend people of your kind who will not fight but expect some one else to do their fighting for them.

I did my "bit" in 1898. It was the proudest day of my life when I enlisted for my country, as did hundreds of other sons of immigrants in my district—sons of the "common people," you know.

Possibly the thing that makes you so anxious to see no war is not the "common people" but the fact that you might have to share part of the burdens—not the "fighting" but part of the "financial" burden. This more apt to be your true reason. Very few of your class care anything for the "common people" except to exploit them.

The people of my district show no "apathy or indifference," no "tragic resignation" because they will have "no voice that can be heard." What tommy-rot! And yet it is characteristic of people of your class. People like you—if you lived in my district—might have some trouble in being "heard," with your unpatriotic and un-American views, but no real American would have any trouble in being heard.

It is time that some people should learn the meaning of the word "treason."

We hear a good deal of talk about the "conscription fathers" talk.

The father of the draft system was the Father of his Country, who said in a letter to the Continental Congress:

It is the true policy of America not to content herself with temporary expedients, but to endeavor, if possible, to give consistence and solidity to her measures. The plan for this purpose ought to be of general operation and such as will execute itself. Experience has shown that a peremptory draft will be the only effectual one. If a draft for the war or for three years can be effected, it ought to be made on every account.

"SHALL THERE BE A PEREMPTORY DRAFT?" (1780)—ONE OF THE EARLIEST SUGGESTIONS THAT MEN MUST BE RAISED BY CONSCRIPTION.

[By George Washington.]

It is the true policy of America not to content herself with temporary expedients, but to endeavor, if possible, to give consistency and solidity to her measures. An essential step to this will be immediately to devise a plan and put it in execution for providing men in time to replace those who will leave us at the end of the year and for subsisting the officers and soldiers and making them a reasonable allowance. The plan for this purpose ought to be of general operation and such as will execute itself. Experience has shown that a peremptory draft will be the only effectual one. If a draft for the war or for three years can be effected, it ought to be made on every account. A shorter period than a year is inadmissible.

EVILS OF SHORT ENLISTMENTS.

To one who has been witness to the evils brought upon us by short enlistments, the system appears to have been pernicious beyond description, and a crowd of motives present themselves to dictate a change. It may easily be shown that all the misfortunes we have met with in the military line are to be attributed to this cause.

RETREAT ACROSS THE DELAWARE.

Had we formed a permanent army in the beginning which, by the continuance of the same men in service, had been capable of discipline, we never should have had to retreat with a handful of men across the Delaware in 1776, trembling for the fate of America, which nothing but the infatuation of the enemy could have saved; we should not have remained all the succeeding winter at their mercy, with sometimes scarcely a sufficient body of men to mount the ordinary guards, liable at every moment to be dissipated, if they had only thought proper to march against us.

VALLEY FORGE.

We should not have been under the necessity of fighting at Brandywine with an unequal number of raw troops, and afterwards of seeing Philadelphia fall a prey to a victorious army; we should not have been at Valley Forge with less than half the force of the enemy, destitute of everything, in a situation neither to resist nor to retire; we should not have seen New York left with a handful of men, yet an overmatch for the main army of these States, while the principal part of their force was detached for the reduction of two of them; we should not have found ourselves this spring so weak as to be insulted by 5,000 men, unable to protect our baggage and magazines, their security depending on a good countenance and a want of enterprise in the enemy; we should not have been the greatest part of the war inferior to the enemy, indebted for our safety to their inactivity, enduring frequently the mortification of seeing inviting opportunities to ruin them pass unimproved for want of a force which the country was completely able to afford; and of seeing the country ravaged, our towns burned, the inhabitants plundered, abused, murdered with impunity from the same cause.

DERANGEMENT OF FINANCES.

Nor have the ill effects been confined to the military line. A great part of the embarrassments in the civil departments flow from the same source. The derangement of our finances is essentially to be ascribed to it. The expenses of the war and the paper emissions have been greatly multiplied by it. We have had, a great part of the time, two sets of men to feed and pay, the discharged men going home and the levies coming in. This was more remarkably the case in 1775 and 1776. The difficulty and cost of engaging men have increased at every successive attempt, till among the present levies we find there are some who have received $150 in specie for five months' service, while our officers are reduced to the disagreeable necessity of performing the duties of drill sergeants to them, with this mortifying reflection annexed to the business, that by the time they have taught those men the rudiments of a soldier's duty their services will have expired and the work recommenced with a new set. The consumption of provisions, arms, accouterments, and stores of every kind has been doubled in spite of every precaution I could use, not only from the cause just mentioned, but from the carelessness and licentiousness incident to militia and irregular troops. Our discipline also has been much hurt, if not ruined.

VOLUNTEER SYSTEM INTERFERED WITH CULTIVATION OF LAND.

The frequent calls upon the militia have interrupted the cultivation of the land and, of course, have lessened the quantity of its produce, occasioned a scarcity, and enhanced the prices. In an army so unstable as ours order and economy have been impracticable. No person who has been a close observer of the progress of our affairs can doubt that our currency has depreciated without comparison more rapidly from the system of short enlistments than it would have done otherwise.

WAR PROTRACTED ON ACCOUNT OF VOLUNTEER SYSTEM.

There is every reason to believe that the war has been protracted on this account. Our opposition being less, the successes of the enemy have been greater. The fluctuation of the Army kept alive their hopes, and at every period of the dissolution of a considerable part of it they have flattered themselves with some decisive advantages. Had we kept a permanent army on foot, the enemy could have had nothing to hope for and would in all probability have listened to terms long ago. (Jared Sparks, Writings of George Washington (Boston, 1835).)

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKELL] said yesterday, in a quotation from Gen. Horatio C. King:

At a meeting of the Society of the Army of the Potomac in Portland, Me., in 1890, Gen. Sherman was presented after Gen. Walker's oration. He was in a very happy mood and talked much upon volunteering, and in one sentence he said: "I do believe, as I believe in Him who rules over us all, that this country spent $1,000,000,000 and 100,000 precious lives to teach you the art of war."

He further quotes from Gen. King:

I do not know that Congress cares to take the advice from the soldiers who saw service in the sixties. We know the weakness and folly of the volunteer system. The Government started wrong by relying upon volunteers.

In a letter written to Count Gasparin, August 4, 1862, President Lincoln said, in part, as follows:

Be not alarmed if you shall learn that we shall have resorted to the draft for part of this. It seems strange even to me, but it is true, that the Government is now pressed to this cause by a popular demand.

In a letter to Gov. Seymour, New York, August 7, 1863, he states:

We are contending with an enemy, who, as I understand, drives every able-bodied man he can reach into his ranks, very much as a butcher drives bullocks into a slaughter pen. No time is wasted, no argument is used. This produces an army which will soon turn upon our now victorious soldiers, already in the field, if they shall not be sustained by recruits as they should be. It produces an army with a rapidity not to be matched on our side, if we first waste time to reexperiment with an army already deemed by Congress, and palpably in fact, so far exhausted as to be inadequate, and then more time to obtain a court decision as to whether a law is constitutional which requires a part of those not now in the service to go to the aid of those who are already in it.

In 1863 President Lincoln said, as follows, regarding, as he put it, "draft or conscription":

BEGINNING OF WAR.

At the beginning of the war, and ever since, a variety of motives, pressing, some in one direction and some in the other, would be presented to the mind of each man physically fit for a soldier, upon the combined effect of which motives he would or would not voluntarily enter the service. Among these motives would be patriotism, political bias, ambition, personal courage, love of adventure, want of employment, and convenience, or the opposites of some of these.

NECESSITY OF DRAFT.

We already have and have had in the service, as appears, substantially all that can be obtained upon this voluntary weighing of motives. And yet we must somehow obtain more or relinquish the original object of the contest, together with all the blood and treasure already expended in the effort to secure it. To meet this necessity the law for the draft has been enacted. You who do not wish to be soldiers do not like this law. This is natural; nor does it imply want of patriotism. Nothing can be so just and necessary as to make us like it if it is disagreeable to us. We are prone, too, to find false arguments with which to excuse ourselves for opposing such disagreeable things. In this case those who desire the rebellion to succeed and others who seek reward in a different way are very active in accommodating us with this class of arguments.

IS CONSCRIPTION CONSTITUTIONAL?

They tell us the law is unconstitutional. It is the first instance, I believe, in which the power of Congress to do a thing has ever been questioned in a case when the power is given by the Constitution in express terms. Whether a power can be implied when it is not expressed has often been the subject of controversy; but this is the first case in which the degree of effrontery has been ventured upon of denying a power which is plainly and distinctly written down in the Constitution. The Constitution declares that "the Congress shall have power * * * to raise and support armies; but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years." The whole scope of the conscription act is "to raise and support armies." There is nothing else in it. It makes no appropriation of money, and hence the money clause just quoted is not touched by it.

The case simply is, the Constitution provides that the Congress shall have power to raise and support armies, and by this act the Congress has exercised the power to raise and support armies. This is the whole of it. It is a law made in literal pursuance of this part of the United States Constitution; and another part of the same Constitution declares that "this Constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." Do you admit that the power is given to raise and support armies, and yet insist that by this act Congress has not exercised the power in a constitutional mode—has not done the thing in the right way? Who is to judge of this? The Constitution gives Congress the power, but it does not prescribe the mode or expressly declare who shall prescribe it. In such case Congress must prescribe the mode or relinquish the power. There is no alternative. Congress could not exercise the power to do the thing if it had not the power of providing a way to do it, when no way is provided by the Constitution for doing it. In fact, Congress would not have the power to raise and support armies, if even by the Constitution it were left to the option of any other or others to give or withhold the only mode of doing it. If the Constitution had prescribed a mode, Congress could and must follow that mode; but, as it is, the mode necessarily goes to Congress, with the power expressly given. The power is given fully, completely, unconditionally. It is not a power to raise armies if State authorities consent, nor if the men to compose the armies are entirely willing, but it is a power to raise and support armies given to Congress by the Constitution, without an "if."

THERE CAN BE NO ARMY WITHOUT MEN.

The republican institutions and territorial integrity of our country can not be maintained without the further raising and supporting of armies. There can be no army without men. Men can be had only voluntarily or involuntarily. We have ceased to obtain them voluntarily, and to obtain them involuntarily is the draft, the conscription.

IF YOU BELIEVE THE VOLUNTEER SYSTEM IS A SUCCESS, SHOW IT BY VOLUNTEERING.

If you dispute the fact, and declare that men can still be had voluntarily in sufficient numbers, prove the assertion by yourselves volunteering in such numbers, and I shall gladly give up the draft. Or, if not a sufficient number, but any one of you will volunteer, he for his single self will escape all the horrors of the draft, and will thereby do only what each one of at least a million of his manly brethren have already done. Their toil and blood have been given as much for you as for themselves. Shall it all be lost rather than that you, too, will bear your part?

EVERY PATRIOT SHOULD WILLINGLY TAKE HIS CHANCE.

I do not say that all who would avoid serving in the war are unpatriotic; but I do think every patriot should willingly take his chance under a law made with great care, in order to secure entire fairness. This law was considered, discussed, modified, and amended by Congress at great length, and with much labor; and was finally passed by both branches, with a near approach to unanimity. At least it may not be exactly such as any one man out of Congress, or even in Congress, would have made it. It has been said, and I believe truly, that the Constitution itself is not altogether such as any one of its framers would have preferred. It was the joint work of all, and certainly the better that it was so.

DRAFT PRACTICES IN ALL AGES OF THE WORLD.

The principle of the draft, which simply is involuntary or enforced service, is not new. It has been practiced in all ages of the world.

DRAFT WELL KNOWN TO FRAMERS OF THE CONSTITUTION.

It was well known to the framers of our Constitution as one of the modes of raising armies at the time they placed in that instrument the provision that "the Congress shall have power to raise and support armies." It had been used just before in establishing our independence, and it was also used under the Constitution in 1812. Wherein is the peculiar hardship now?

HAS THE MANHOOD OF OUR RACE RUN OUT?

Shall we shrink from the necessary means to maintain our free government, which our grandfathers employed to establish it and our own fathers have already employed once to maintain it? Are we degenerate? Has the manhood of our race run out?

DRAFT LAW TO BE FAITHFULLY EXECUTED.

With these views and on these principles I feel bound to tell you it is my purpose to see the draft law faithfully executed.

The following from the Washington Times might be of interest:

LABORITES LOSE—THEY OPPOSED CONSCRIPTION IN NEW ZEALAND AND ARE DEFEATED.

WELLINGTON, NEW ZEALAND.

All the laborites who opposed conscription have been defeated in the municipal election in New Zealand.

Among those who saw service in '98 who have written me is Mr. J. Walter Mitchell, editor of the American Standard, of this city, who saw service in Cuba as a private. In a letter written to me to-day he writes in part as follows:

Hon. W. FRANK JAMES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND COMRADE: As a volunteer in the War with Spain and editor of the American Standard, representing the veterans of that war, of the Philippine insurrection, and the members of nine semimilitary patriotic organizations, national in scope, I most heartily congratulate you on the manly stand you have taken for selective conscription.

I have received many letters since this matter of raising an army has been under consideration by Congress—the writers in every instance being American fighting men, those who have followed the flag—and every letter is an expert indorsement of the plan for which you and practically every other Spanish War veteran are so nobly contending.

Had selective conscription instead of the obsolete volunteer system been in vogue in ninety-eight, it is my opinion that this fair land would not now be dotted over with human wrecks, victims of insanitary conditions and inexperienced officers that were notorious scandals of the Spanish-American War.

You served in the War with Spain, Comrade JAMES, and your regiment was one of those at the front in the campaign which resulted in the capture of Santiago, Cuba, and the surrender of the Spanish army under Gen. Torral, and you are aware therefore of the fierce conditions that prevailed under the volunteer system. So-called officers who could not drill the awkward squad or "mount guard," the embalmed beef, lack of discipline, scarcity of medical supplies, epidemics of typhoid, measles, and what not. In a word, our military condition in 1898 was disgraceful, and we do not want to see such things reenacted in our present war with Germany, which promises to be a really big affair.

I have received—yesterday and to-day—a large number of letters from former soldiers in many States commending your stand for selective conscription and commending your speech.

Sincerely, yours,

J. WALTER MITCHELL, Editor.

Shall we follow the advice of Washington, Lincoln, and Sherman, or shall we follow the advice of the "sob squad," who have adopted a new motto, "We need no Army to win—we can win this war by weeping and sobbing?" [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, when the storm of Civil War first broke over our country, Gen. John A. Logan, then a young man, was a Member of this House, representing the district I now have the honor to represent. At an earlier age he had served in the Mexican War as a volunteer, and during those trying days had learned some of the dangers and duties of military service. Resigning his seat in Congress, he went to Illinois with Stephen A. Douglas to speak and act for the Union. At Marion, which happens to be my home, he made his first appeal for volunteers in the cause of the Union and it was my good fortune, in after years, to know the first man who responded to the call and gave Logan his hand as a volunteer, and to live among some of those who survived. A regiment was soon organized—a regiment of brave, patriotic, fighting men, who, with their commander, Col. Logan, afterwards received their baptism of fire at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Vicksburg, and Atlanta. I do not believe any better, braver soldiers ever marched to martial music than those who, as volunteers, willingly left their homes under Logan and others like him from all parts of the country, the North and the South, to fight for what they thought was a just cause. Before the close of the war the colonel of that regiment of volunteers had won the name and fame of Gen. John A. Logan, the greatest volunteer officer known to history. And the men of southern Illinois who volunteered with him will forever deserve and have the honor and admiration of a grateful Nation.

And now, as we enter this war, I find it difficult, so far as I am concerned, to forget the spirit and the services of Gen. Logan and the men of his time. Their willing sacrifice, their patriotism, their courage, and devotion to duty will forever remain vivid in the memory of the men of Illinois and an inspiration to volunteer service. Illinois has always been ready to respond to any call of the country for volunteers. In my own district there are thousands of patriotic men of military age and qualifications who are ready and willing to offer their services. At least two provisional regiments have been formed and are drilling; many other company units are enrolled and ready to volunteer for service wherever the country may need them; and those men will be bitterly disappointed when they learn their services will not be accepted.

Mr. Chairman, I have from the first appearance of threatening danger to our country supported the President on every issue involving our foreign relations, our national defense, and whenever our national honor and dignity were involved. I voted for the declaration of war and for the President's request for a bond issue of $7,000,000,000 with which to begin the war. I am ready to support any measure he may recommend that I think will more effectively prosecute the war to a speedy and successful termination.

The question of the best method of raising an efficient army is one about which there is an honest difference of opinion. I do not pretend to have any special knowledge of military matters. I have never been a soldier, and have no ambition in that field of honor, even if I were physically qualified for it. I have made no particular study or observation of the science of war or modern methods of military training. I have approached this question with an open mind and have listened with keen interest to what has been said in debate. I would like to support the bill reported by the committee, because it at least recognizes the right of American citizens who are qualified for military duties to voluntarily offer their services in defense of their country.

This bill does not place the country or the President in a position of complete or even partial dependence upon the so-called volunteer system, as many have supposed. It simply authorizes the President to call for volunteers and for a limited time gives the people the right to do that which they have always had the right to do—volunteer to serve or die for their country.

Mr. Chairman, I think the noblest, the most exalted inspiration that ever moved the souls of men is that which moves them to voluntarily give their lives to their country. It is the supreme test of patriotism, the virtue which exalts mere men to the glory of national heroes. The commendable things men do in the service of their country and their fellow men are as numberless as the sands of the sea. But the men who voluntarily offer their own lives that their country may live on always have been and always ought to be exalted above others. It was the volunteer spirit that united our discordant people and won our independence as a Nation; it saved us when the awful trial came from disunion. It has always served us well when we have needed men to fight, and this record of our fathers and forefathers, this tradition of our race, has been a fountain of inspiration to our people. It may be I shall regret to have seen the day and participated in the proceedings when this great American volunteer spirit was crushed and killed, as it surely will be if Congress passes a law in this crisis forbidding volunteers and providing for immediate compulsory service.

Gentlemen, so far as my personal convictions are concerned, I believe a volunteer soldier is a better soldier than any conscript. I believe a volunteer army is a better fighting army than any conscript army. What little reading I have done upon this subject has led me to believe that the greatest battles have been won by men who were enthusiastic in the cause for which they were fighting and who engaged in it willingly. It has been difficult for me to understand why the President and the War Department and the press of the country are so bitterly opposed to allowing American citizens to volunteer in this crisis.

I could not see why the President should wish to force upon Congress a complete abandonment of the system of willing military service, which has been the tradition of our race and the pride of our country, and to so uncompromisingly urge upon Congress, right in the beginning of this war, a compulsory system which the President can not help knowing is distasteful to and disapproved by so many Members of the House.

If I should follow my personal sentiments upon this question I would support the volunteer provision of the committee bill. But the more important question, so far as I am personally concerned, has been whether I should waive my personal views—which, after all, may be influenced by sentiment rather than sound reason—and support the provision for immediate selective conscription, recommended by the President and the War Department. To me there has been no difficulty or hesitancy in determining what I would prefer to have done. My difficulty has been to determine whether it was my duty to follow my own views and sentiments or to waive them out of deference to the judgment of those who are experts and have made a life study of military matters. It will amount to no particular consequence to any save myself if I surrender or repress my own preference. But I realize it may be of serious consequence to my country if I should err in following my own sentiments on so important a question as this against the recommendations of those who are in a position to know better than I what ought to be done.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to views of Washington, Jefferson, Grant, and others presented by Members during this discussion. Reference has even been made to writings of Moses and the Prophets. I am disposed to believe that the views of the statesmen and generals of our former wars were based upon the conditions of those days. It might be a serious mistake to rely upon them to-day, when conditions are entirely different and the methods of warfare have entirely changed.

We are now engaged in a world war. All theories of warfare have had to be modified by the actual conditions that have arisen during the progress of this war. We must not close our eyes to the experience of the nations that for nearly three years have been engaged in the struggle. We are told by those who have observed and participated in the mobilization of the English armies that greater efficiency in our military organization and greater economy in the management of it can be secured by immediate resort to the principle of universal military service.

I feel it my duty, Mr. Chairman, to repress my own sentiments and support the plan recommended by the War Department, with the changes recommended by the minority report of the committee. I am making this statement that the House and country may know that I am voting for the plan of selective conscription because the arguments for it appeal to my better reason, and out of deference to the judgment of the President and the War Department, who ought to know far better than I what is necessary for our country as we enter this world war.

The people elected the President, who is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. They must trust and follow him now. If we follow our own sentiments and oppose him in the conduct of the war we are maligned and misunderstood; we are even suspected of disloyalty and lack of patriotism; and we might be charged in high places with being "willful men."

As for myself, I would much prefer, in the years to come, to have my judgment or my consistency questioned than my courage or devotion to my country. If the future should unhappily prove that we have acted unwisely in approving the President's plan of selective compulsory service the people will well know, I am sure, where the responsibility for it belongs. I hope time may tell that we have acted well.

I am opposed to the President's recommendation that military age be fixed between the ages of 19 and 25. I do not think the boys of the country should be compelled to do the fighting in this war. If we are to have compulsory service, let it be as nearly universal service as possible and include all available men between the ages of 21 and 40, as recommended by the committee.

I especially approve those provisions of the bill requiring each State to furnish its proportionate part of the men needed for military service, excluding exemptions, according to their population; and providing that men of the same State or county may serve in the same units of the military organization, so that the spirit of local pride and comradeship may be preserved. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. That concludes the list of gentlemen who made application for recognition.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. BOOHER having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. CRAGO, was granted leave of absence on account of the death of his father.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW—11 O'CLOCK A. M.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order, until to-morrow, Saturday, April 28, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of Commerce submitting an estimate of appropriation to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, for the introduction of new fish and other aquatic foods (H. Doc. No. 72); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of War submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations required by the War Department for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 73); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ADAMSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3349) to authorize the President in time of war to give direction to exports from the United States so as to insure their wise, economical, and profitable distribution to other countries, and for other purposes; reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 32), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ESCH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1007) authorizing the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 33), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SNOOK, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2343) granting consent to Ernest B. Denison, A. J. Barchfield, and Ethan I. Dodds to construct a bridge across the Wabash River within or near the city limits of the city of Vincennes, Ind., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 34), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GLASS, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3673) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 35), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 3883) designating October 27 of each year a legal holiday to be known as national fraternal day, to conserve the home, fraternalism, and happiness; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3884) to authorize a special edition of 1,000,000 copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD daily; to the Committee on Printing.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 28, 1917.

(Legislative day of Monday, April 23, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 10 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I desire to address myself to the pending bill, but I have just learned that my colleague [Mr. POMERENE] had expected recognition this morning, and if I can yield for a few moments to my colleague I would be glad to show him that courtesy. Otherwise, I desire to address the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. There is no arrangement whereby anyone has the floor. I understand that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is ready to proceed this morning.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Hitchcock	New	Stone
Brady	Husting	Overman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Thomas
Curtis	Johnson, S. Dak.	Penrose	Thompson
Dillingham	Jones, N. Mex.	Pomerene	Trammell
Fernald	Jones, Wash.	Robinson	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	Kellogg	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Gallinger	King	Shields	Walsh
Hale	Lodge	Smith, Ga.	Warren
Harding	McKellar	Smith, S. C.
Hardwick	Martin	Smoot

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. My colleague [Mr. LANE] is unavoidably absent on account of illness.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is no quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. KENYON, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. SHAFROTH, and Mr. STERLING answered to their names when called.

Mr. HARDING. Without objection, I should be glad to address myself to the Senate while waiting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Nothing can proceed until the presence of a quorum is disclosed.

Mr. HARDING. I am not certain about the number here.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the Chair announce the number of Senators present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is no quorum present.

Mr. GALLINGER. I trust that some Senator on the other side will ask that the absentees shall be brought in.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to procure the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the order of the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. SAULSBURY, and Mr. WILLIAMS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1800) to amend an act approved June 29, 1906, and entitled "An act to authorize the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia to sell, hold, and convey certain real estate," and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, which will be inserted in the RECORD.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Whereas the Congress of the United States has by resolution declared that a state of war exists between the United States and the Imperial German Government: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-seventh General Assembly of Iowa, That for the purpose of assisting in carrying on the war and bringing the conflict to a successful termination, all the resources of the State of Iowa are hereby pledged to the Government of the United States of America; and

Resolved, That an engrossed copy hereof be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

ERNEST R. MOORE,
President of the Senate.

M. B. PITT,
Speaker of the House.

I hereby certify that this joint resolution originated in the senate, and is known as senate joint resolution No. 12.

THOMAS WALTERS, Jr.,
Secretary of the Senate.

Approved April 23, A. D. 1917.

W. T. HARDING,
Governor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, which will be inserted in the RECORD.

The concurrent resolution is as follows:

Whereas a crisis has arisen in the affairs of the United States of America in its relation with Germany on account of the total failure and refusal of that power to observe the rules of war in carrying on the great conflict now raging in Europe, as well as its direct and defiant disregard of its treaties with and promises to the United States, by reason of which the rights of American citizens have for many months been trampled under foot and hundreds of their lives ruthlessly sacrificed; and

Whereas while professing friendship for the United States, Germany has perfidiously attempted to incite other countries to attack the United States and has used its diplomatic and other agencies in said United States to plot and destroy this country; and

Whereas the limits of patient endurance have been reached, and the President of the United States has, before the Congress of the country, solemnly voiced the determination of the people of the United States to yield no longer to the outrages and injuries inflicted on the country and all of its people by the German Government, but to rise in defense of these rights and oppose by force not only the continuance of such wrongs, but to crush forever the formidable attempts now being made by Prussianism to destroy the liberties of the world: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii (the House of Representatives concurring), That the people of Hawaii unqualifiedly indorse and support the position now taken by the United States, as voiced by the President, and will, by every means in their power, aid and assist the country in defending its rights, maintaining an honorable national existence, and opposing the triumph of principles for which Prussianism is contending, which triumph would result in the destruction of individual and national liberty in the world; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forthwith forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 5, 1917.

We hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was this day adopted finally in the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii.

CHAS. T. CHILLINGWORTH,
President of the Senate.
O. P. SOARES,
Clerk of the Senate.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 5, 1917.

We hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was this day adopted finally in the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii.

H. L. HOLSTEIN,
Speaker, House of Representatives.
EDWARD WOODWARD,
Clerk, House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair presents a large number of petitions and memorials which have to do with the pending bill. They will be noted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Printing to determine whether they shall be printed in full or not.

The petitions and memorials are as follows:

Petitions from the Society of the War of 1812 in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; the State Council of the District of Columbia, Daughters of America; the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor; the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii; the Swarthmore (Pa.) Monthly Meeting of the Society of Friends; the Twentieth Century Club, of Washington, D. C.; and the Turpentine & Rosin Producers' Association, of New Orleans. La.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair presents a petition from the Daughters of the American Revolution in congress assembled, and a petition signed by a large number of women of the National Service School of the Women's Section of the Navy League, which will be printed in the RECORD with the first signature only.

The petitions are as follows:

The Daughters of the American Revolution in congress assembled urge that the Congress of the United States cease to retard legislation on the measure for selective draft as recommended by the President of the United States, and, furthermore, the Daughters of the American Revolution urge that the Congress of the United States proceed without further delay to pass the provision for selective draft.

MARGARET M. BERRY.

Seconded by Miss Mary Temple.
This motion was immediately passed.

NATIONAL SERVICE SCHOOL (INC.) OF THE WOMAN'S SECTION OF THE NAVY LEAGUE,
Washington, D. C., April 25, 1917.

To the Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned women of the National Service School of the Women's Section of the Navy League, representing 40 States of the Union, urge Congress to pass at once the bill providing for universal military training and service. We base the justice of our demand on the following:

We know that our country is in deadly peril;

We believe that our country is worth defending, even at the cost of life;

We are convinced that equal rights and privileges demand equal service and duty from all citizens;

We believe that as every man enjoys life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness in time of quiet, so should he be willing to sacrifice those blessings in time of stress;

We know that our present system of sacrificing the willing for the unwilling, the brave for the cowardly, the worthy for the unworthy, is utterly wrong and indefensible;

England found the volunteer system a failure, and we must be warned by her experience and adopt a system of universal military training; and

In this time of peril yours is the unparalleled opportunity to see aright. In the name of the country you serve, we supplicate you to lift the burden of war from the shoulders of the few to the shoulders of the whole American people, that it may not crush us, but may be borne by us to victory.

ELISABETH ELLICOTT POE.

Mr. WARREN presented a telegram embodying a resolution adopted by the Casper Industrial Club, of Wyoming, praying for selective draft, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Willimantic, Conn., and of the I. S. Spencer Sons Co., of Guilford, Conn., praying for national prohibition during the war, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presented a petition of the Rogue River University Club, of Medford, Oreg., praying for conscription, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of the Falmouth Monthly Meeting of Friends, of Maine, praying for the adoption of the provision in the pending Army bill concerning universal military service, whereby members of the Society of Friends and others having conscientious objections to military service may be allowed to render honorable service of a nonmilitary character to the Government in time of necessity, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of the Emergency War Council of Dubois, Pa., and of the congregation of the Church of St. Martin in the Fields, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for selective conscription, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the congregations of sundry churches in the State of Pennsylvania, favoring national prohibition during the period of the war, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions from the Associated Churches of Saginaw; the congregation of the Swedish Evangelical Mission Church, of Stambaugh; and sundry citizens of Atlanta, all in the State of Michigan, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Milan, Mich., remonstrating against compulsory military service, which was ordered to lie on the table.

CONFIRMATION OF KENNETH E. SCHWINN.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the confirmation, as in open executive session, of Kenneth E. Schwinn, a citizen of California, to be second lieutenant in the Marine Corps for a probationary period of two years. If this nomination is not now confirmed, the nominee will be over the maximum age limit to-day, and will therefore lose his commission. This has the unanimous assent of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and, in the absence of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], I ask for the present consideration of the nomination and its confirmation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All in favor of the confirmation of the nomination will say "aye." [A pause.] Those opposed will say "no." [A pause.] There are no noes, and the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the President be notified of the confirmation of the nomination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The President will be so notified.

STATEMENT OF M. RENE VIVIANI.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, M. Rene Viviani, the head of the French Commission to the United States, made a statement to the Washington newspaper men yesterday, which is so eloquent and presents in such a splendid and feeling way the affection of the French people for America, that I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WARREN in the chair). Without objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement referred to is as follows:

I promised to receive you after having reserved, as elementary courtesy required, my first communication solely for the President. I have just had the honor, which I shared with the other members of the mission, of being received by him. I am indeed happy to have been chosen to present the greetings of the French Republic to the illustrious man whose name is in every French mouth to-day, whose incomparable message is at this very hour being read and commented upon in all our schools as the most perfect charter of human rights, and which so fully expresses the virtues of your race—long-suffering patience before appealing to force, and force to avenge that long-suffering patience when there can be no other means.

Since you are here to listen to me, I ask you to repeat a thousandfold the expression of our deep gratitude for the enthusiastic reception the American people have granted us in Washington. It is not to us, but to our beloved and heroic France, that reception was accorded. We were proud to be her children in those unforgettable moments when we read in the radiance of the faces we saw the noble sincerity of your hearts. And I desire to thank also the press of the United States, represented by you. I fully realize the ardent and disinterested help you have given by your tireless propaganda in the cause of right. I know your action has been incalculable. Gentlemen, I thank you.

We have come to this land to salute the American people and its Government, to call to fresh vigor our lifelong friendship, sweet and cordial in the ordinary course of our lives, and which these tragic hours have raised to all the ardor of brotherly love—a brotherly love which in these last years of suffering has multiplied its most touching expressions. You have given help not only in treasure, in every act of kindness and good will—for us your children have shed their blood, and the names of your sacred dead are inscribed forever in our hearts. And it was with a full knowledge of the meaning of what you did that you acted. Your inexhaustible generosity was not the charity of the fortunate to the distressed, it was an affirmation of your conscience, a reasoned approval of your judgment.

Your fellow countrymen knew that under the savage assault of a nation of prey which has made of war, to quote a famous saying, its national industry, we were upholding with our incomparable allies, faithful and valiant to the death, with all those who are fighting shoulder to shoulder with us on the firing line, the sons of indomitable England, a struggle for the violated rights of man, for that democratic spirit which the forces of autocracy were attempting to crush throughout the world. We are ready to carry that struggle on to the end.

And now, as President Wilson has said, the Republic of the United States rises in its strength as a champion of right and rallies to the side of France and her allies. Only our descendants, when time has removed them sufficiently far from present events, will be able to measure the full significance, the grandeur of an historic act which has sent a thrill through the whole world. From to-day on all the forces of freedom are let loose. And not only victory, of which we were already assured, is certain; the true meaning of victory is made manifest. It can not be merely a fortunate military conclusion to this struggle; it will be the victory of morality and right, and will forever secure the existence of a world in which all our children shall draw free breath in full peace and undisturbed pursuit of their labors.

To accomplish this great work, which will be carried to completion, we are about to exchange views with the men in your Government best qualified to help. The cooperation of the Republic of the United States in this world conflict is now assured. We work together as freemen who are resolved to save the ideals of mankind.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the amendment to the pending bill, to which I desire to address myself for a little while and at the same time offer some observations on the bill itself, though it conforms to the general terms of legislation, has a specific end in view. There is no desire to disguise it. Indeed, after the action in the other branch of Congress, it would be futile to attempt to do so. If I did not have an abiding conviction in the sober second thought of Congress, as well as in reliable public opinion, I would think it useless to discuss the amendment now, inasmuch as the other House has for the moment expressed itself in opposition, but I am very glad specifically to say that the amendment has in view a possible volunteer army for immediate and intensive training, to be recruited by Col. Roosevelt, a former Commander in Chief of the United States Army and Navy. It opens the way to provide the earliest possible armed American force to participate in the battles on the western front of Europe. It provides the advance guard of American ideals, bearing the oriflame of New World liberty, New World civilization, and New World humanity, and armed assurance of our everlasting committal to maintained national rights.

Mr. President, not a little has been written and printed about a Roosevelt expeditionary force to Europe. Our people, little realizing the tremendous possibilities of our involvement, but with all thoughts turned to the world tragedy and our association therewith, have wondered why the typically American tender and the typically Rooseveltian tender of a volunteer force should have awakened no encouraging American response. Millions of American voices would have cheered an instant acceptance, and twenty millions of armed allies in Europe—our allies, now—would have acclaimed the hastened coming as the substance of American utterance as so eloquently and so fittingly spoken by the President in his address to Congress.

Mr. President, I am a believer in universal and compulsory military service, ofttimes alluded to as conscription. The latter term is more frequently used to make universal service offensive than to further the Nation's cause. I mean to vote for the pending measure, which has the sanction of the committee. I mean to register my conviction that the privilege of citizenship involves an obligation as well. So it is not to be misconstrued that the amendment offered means a compromise between an army of volunteers and an army enrolled under the obligations of citizenship. Specifically, it is designed to give form to a Rooseveltian expression of eager and ready Americanism and to provide an army of Americans who believe in him and his gospel of Americanism, and afford him and them the simplest means of proving that American expression and American action are in compelling accord.

Distinctly two things are in the minds of those who support this amendment. The first is the effect on our allies in Europe—the earliest possible moral encouragement and soulful heartening of our allies, who are fighting our battles as well as their own. It does not underestimate the impressiveness of our deliberate preparation of an army of a million, while laying the foundation for ten millions more, if need be, to say that an immediate force of one to four divisions of American volunteers would put new life in every allied trench and a new glow in every allied camp fire on every battle front of Europe. A division to-morrow would exert the strength of 10 divisions next year and add to the morale of the allied armies what shells and guns and assurances of food could not add in many months of most cordial cooperation. The psychic moment awaits, and the special volunteer force for Europe will afford the ringing answer.

The second specific thing in contemplation is the psychological contribution to the crystallization of the American mind. American opinion is divided on the plan of providing for an army for defense. Otherwise there would be no contention in Congress. Representatives in Congress are not divided in opinion when the public mind is of one accord. Members are human, and keenly sensitive to political indications. They are not unmindful of that thing we call popularity. They are expected to voice the popular mind. Sometimes they mistake ephemeral reflexes for dependable public opinion, and ofttimes forget that there are times when it is essential to contribute to public opinion as well as to follow it. I think it will not be unorthodox to say that popular government requires leadership in thought as well as sensitive ears.

Ours is a peculiar condition, out of which only the great crisis now to be met can lift us. We have drifted, normally and excusably, let it be said, into the selfish existence. We have arrogated to ourselves the advantages of freedom without a thought of its needful guaranties. We have assumed that we might share in the world's fortunes and escape its misfortunes. We have imagined we could dip into its luxuries without a worry about its great necessities. We have forgotten the inexorable laws of compensation, under which some generation must pay.

We have reveled in opportunity and rewards and rejoiced in abundance and ease, and have cultivated selfishness, though we have resented the very suggestion of such a thing. We have realized that there were principles to be maintained and righteousness to be fought for, but we have assumed that somebody else would do the fighting. We have looked upon the European upheaval and deplored; we have noted the awful tragedy and sorrowed; we have had our sympathies and prejudices, and have suppressed them or violated neutrality in unheeding expression, but we have been more concerned about the result to European contenders than anxious about the conflagration reaching the American temple of freedom. Even now, when we are involved, and when the involvement may exceed the most extravagant fears of those who measure the Old World's madness, our people have come to no realization. It has been said in these debates that Germany must be halted, else the nations of the world must become her vassal States. It is shockingly true. Germany protests a war for self-preservation, but every shell exploded has been on foreign soil. Wars for self-preservation seldom have such a beginning, no matter what the protest may be. Yet our own land has its hundreds of thousands impelled by love or hate, and see only the European issue, without a concern for the fate of our own Republic, now inseparable from the peace terms to which Europe must come. Somebody, Mr. President, must speak the great peril. A German triumph and our American security are utterly incompatible. Germany has taken on a war with the world, and Germany must be brought to terms, or the world becomes her dominion. And yet, if the truth be spoken, and we must speak it, there are tens of thousands claiming American citizenship who would revolt against joining American forces in Europe, though they would gladly bear arms, I can believe, to resist invasion of our own land. To my own mind, to every soberly thinking mind, it is apparent that the allied triumph in Europe is the only guaranty we can have against ultimate invasion. We can fight for maintained rights to-morrow with thousands; if we do not, we shall be compelled to fight with millions next year for separate and safe-guarded national existence.

Popular realization has not yet come. Duty and sentiment have not yet been clearly separated. The great awakening has not come. The pity is that it will never come except in the echoes of national disaster and the convulsive sobs of an American tragedy. I have no fear of the ultimate response. American citizenship will not fail in the ultimate test. But I wish we could minimize the sacrificial offering which must precede the great awakening.

Nothing must halt our preparation for the great conflict. I believe the universal and compulsory service plan will be the least sanguinary we can adopt. It will be a covenant among ourselves that a Republic worth living in is worth fighting for; and it will be notice to the world, and to Germany in particular, that the United States of America pledges its manhood and its resources and its very soul to the armed defense of that which we proclaim a righteous cause.

Meanwhile, Mr. President—and this is the point I should like to emphasize if I knew the way—the Roosevelt volunteer division or divisions, and I specify by name because Col. Roosevelt so well typifies our unalterable resolution and readiness to sacrifice, will prove the agency, the expression, and the assurance of American intent while we make the resolute preparation, while we commit the American mind, while we consecrate the American spirit.

If I can judge from written and spoken expressions, if I can correctly interpret the developing American sentiment, such an army to Europe would answer for the time being the patriotic aspiration to contribute an American force to the allied armies of Europe. No one will dispute that it would hearten the brave men who are now battling for what is our common cause in the western front of Europe. But better and more important than these, it will serve as the illuminating flame which lights the transformation at home, before which the shifting slides give us a picture first confused, then revealing, until the great screen of American life shall reveal us organized, equipped, united, and militant—ready to fight and die, if need be, until the last dollar is expended and the last life is given to the cause of our Nation and its righteous preservation.

The processes of committing a great democratic people to armed contention is one of evolution, unless calamity shocks that people into that state of mind where only one viewpoint is possible. I have believed, and believe now, that this limited voluntary expression of American resolution would hasten the processes of our committal. Not the governmental committal, for that is already and unalterably made, but the committa' of individual American hearts, which must beat in unison to guarantee the strength of the Republic in peace or war.

I have said, Mr. President, that I can not understand—and I want to address this reminder to the other side of the Chamber—nor can the popular mind understand, the hesitancy to encourage so patriotic an undertaking. It will not hinder the universal-service plan; it will popularize the enactment. It involves no hateful favoritism, because there is no offending privilege in allowing any American to make the supreme offering of his life for an American cause. It can not confuse the progress of organized preparedness under conscription, because the amendment makes unavailable to this tender of a division any who are eligible to the compulsory call. It can not be disagreeable to the fighters in the allied armies, because their impelling purposes do not question personalities or take note of the politics of the past. This is a war where the future offers the one great compensation, and no petty prejudices are involved or political debts to be paid. Of course, Mr. President, it is irregular; but war is the great irregularity of the world, and out of irregularity sometimes come our greatest triumphs.

And surely, surely, Mr. President and Senators, the hindrance is not a matter of politics here at home. God forbid that there should be anywhere, in places high or humble, any narrow prejudices of partisanship in these solemn days of a great American crisis. I have rejoiced to note the utter abandonment of partisan lines in the assumption of great burdens which Congress has undertaken. Though I am an extreme partisan, and boast it, and though I opposed the Chief Executive for reelection as persistently though less effectively than many another, and though I saw my party fail in the elections because of the claims made for a peace President, I have cordially supported him, and my colleagues on this side have, with as few exceptions as on the majority side, cordially supported the President in his defense of American rights and his lofty regard for American honor. And we shall continue to do so. It has been a gratifying manifestation of patriotism surpassing politics and Americanism transcending partisanship.

Though little considered and less consulted, this side of the Chamber has upheld the hands of the President unfailingly. We have made policies possible which a partisan minority and a divided majority might have held impossible and hindered the Nation. So then, Senators, this is not a Democratic Party war. It is not an administration war. It is a war of the American Republic, or it will fail miserably. Somebody must speak these things. There can be no exclusions when we are seeking to hold a people strong in their one-mindedness and their one-heartedness.

It may be, in one sense, a war for democracy, though I have already disputed that contention on this floor. I can only consent that incidentally it is a war to prove the capacity of democracy to defend its rights. But it is not a war of a party or an administration; it is the combat impelled by American self-respect and American self-preservation and maintained American rights.

The ideals of popular government, the equalities of democracy, and the aspirations of civilization and humanity do not paralyze personalities or reduce individualities to a common level. Leadership will manifest itself until the last human activity is ended.

Precisely these things are inspiring this amendment and its effects. The objection of partiality does not hold. The amendment is broad enough to cover four divisions if tendered, and I have noticed by the press repeatedly that there are tenders of willing and eager American fighters in numbers sufficient to exceed four divisions. We are not talking, however, of regiments or brigades; the amendment contemplates divisions. This Nation has but two ex-Presidents, both of them distinguished patriots. There are but two living men who are ex-Commanders in Chief of the armed forces of the Nation. To accept from one of them, who has already seen actual and honored service in the field of battle, the tender of one or more divisions of volunteers who shall typify the American eagerness to further our cause on European battle fields is the natural thing and the heartening thing and the harmonizing thing to do. It will be the first manifestation of the American spirit, the first earnest of the American consecration, the tangible evidence of American intent. It will add to the courage and strength of the allied armies of Europe and will set aglow the millions of patriotic hearts at home. More, it will make our universal service, which must be adopted, the accepted plan of highest security and least of sacrifice.

Mr. President, these observations are directed mainly to this special volunteer force, because I think it the fitting prelude to the more serious drama which is soon to follow. I believe it can be raised; I know it can be raised under Col. Roosevelt's inspiring leadership in much less time than Congress consumes in enacting the law, and because of the character of enlistments, including many who have already trained or have seen service, intensive training will make them quickly available. Somebody has said in these debates—the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], I think—that soldiers are made, not born. If he had said armies are made, not born, I should agree. Many soldiers are born. The late Gen. Funston was a notable example. Most of the men eager to furnish the volunteer divisions to be recruited under Col. Roosevelt are soldiers born. They are not seeking adventure; they are eager to fight. They are not seeking notoriety; they are ready to serve. They are not contemplating political preferment; they want to bear Old Glory to triumph in the battle fields of Europe. I do not overestimate what one or four divisions may accomplish where millions are engaged, but I know they are making the supreme offering of life on the altar of American patriotism, and can prove to the 30,000,000 under arms in Europe the metal of which the American soldier is made, and give assurance to our allies that America, too, is enlisted to do or die for a noble cause.

This is no compromise between the volunteer system and compulsory universal service. If it proves the solvent which shall dissolve our heriditary opposition to the conscript system it will hasten the unity and the enthusiasm of popular committal to the policy by which this Nation must stand or fall.

Mr. President, there will be amazement throughout the land if this proposition is defeated. There will be an imputation of motives for which neither Congress nor the Executive ought to give cause. I have read the President's beautiful utterance about wishing to know what the people were thinking of at the fireside. I can tell him, and I do so now, that thousands and thousands of them are hoping that the volunteer expeditionary force to Europe, for which this amendment provides, will be accepted and encouraged and hasten with our colors to the battle front in France. It is the one great answer to yearning American sentiment to-day.

In conclusion, Mr. President, a word about the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like, just to carry out the suggestion of the Senator, to have read a telegram from La Crosse, Kans., showing that the people of that neighborhood favor the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio. If it will not disturb the Senator, I should like to have the telegram read.

Mr. HARDING. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

LA CROSSE, KANS., April 27, 1917.

Senator CHARLES CURTIS,
Washington, D. C.:

Petitions are being signed here to-day by 90 per cent of our citizens, men and women, urging you to use all honorable means to secure permission for Roosevelt and his 100,000 patriots to go to the fighting front without delay. These will follow by mail. We therefore urge you to use every effort to this end.

J. E. Andrews, Frank Fay Kopn, Timiken Bison, J. J. Conrad, W. H. Russell, H. L. Anderson, M. L. Robinson, Elbert Whiteman, L. B. Robertson, F. U. Russell, Frank Russell, and many others.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio will permit me to make an observation at that point, I find that to be almost the universal feeling among the people of my own State—that Col. Roosevelt should be permitted to go; and, if I may say so, they do not understand just why there should be so much objection to it.

Mr. HARDING. Why, Mr. President, the Senators who have interrupted only speak a suggestion of my own experience since this amendment was introduced. I think it is fair to say that it is not my amendment as a personal offering. It was drawn by one of the distinguished Members of this body who has had more experience than I at such work and is presented here not as any one individual Senator's idea but as the answer to a call for this Government at this time, and this administration in particular, to take cognizance of this perfectly magnificent expression of American willingness to serve and patriotic readiness to go. I venture to say that 90 per cent of the thoughtful public sentiment of this land is ready to approve the hastened recruiting of this volunteer army under Col. Roosevelt and the ordering of that army to the battle front of Europe as soon as it is consistent with the development of its training to do so.

Mr. President, I dislike to sound even the semblance of a discordant note, but I think the responsible head of this Government and those in Congress are making a colossal blunder to refuse this contemplated tender, which accomplishes the two things I have sought to point out: First, the quickest response to the call of need of our allies in Europe; and, second and more important, the answer to American sentiment, which will dissolve the opposition to that hereditary feeling that we have against conscriptive measures.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him to say that if I read history aright I think there is a very striking analogy between the proposed visit of Lafayette to the side of Washington and this proposed enlistment of Col. Roosevelt. The officers of the French Government interposed many objections to Lafayette's coming, although they fully sympathized with our cause and aided the struggling colonies with men and money without stint and with the undisguised purpose of helping our cause to victory. He came without the consent of his sovereign. If I read history aright, it was not until he had actually engaged in hostilities by the side of Washington that either his prowess or his disposition or his patriotism was fully appreciated. The early reports of Washington upon the services of Lafayette are most inspiring. They ought to be read into the record of this debate, because they show how he grew as a patriot and as a soldier side by side with the great leader of the American forces at a critical time in our history.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I have thought that this expeditionary force would be the finest manifestation of national gratitude for a memory extending over 135 years that any nation in the world ever found opportunity to express. I have not cared to follow out that line of argument, however, because of the exigencies of the moment. There are others who wish to speak to this amendment, and I will endeavor very hastily to close with just a word about the general bill.

I shall venture no analysis. It ought to be said, in view of the utterances of some eminent opponents, that the call for universal service does not question the loyalty of the patriots who prefer to volunteer. It only conserves that high quality of citizenship which is so impelled. There comes a time in national life when the crisis demands that all the people make one common cause. Universal service, offensively compulsory only to those who would avoid obligation, is the pledge of mutuality, the renewed covenant of equality, and the guaranty of our national strength. Some are opposed because of reverence for our patriotic traditions; many are opposed because it is a complete reversal of our accepted policy, and think compulsion involves the American establishment of the burdens of militarism. The answer is that the American soldier, conscript or volunteer, is a sovereign citizen, and the war we have entered is chiefly aimed to destroy the menace of militarism in dominating the world. Not a few are opposed—not in Congress, of course—because they do not wish the American cause to triumph. It is the distressing truth. There are those who cloak themselves in the garb of American citizenship who hope to see us humbled by Germany, and will oppose any policy which looks to the assurance of American triumph. And there are those in Congress who are honestly seeking to voice the sentiment of those whom they represent. I am conscious of the popular opposition. If I did not think it imperiled the country, if I did not think it involved greater sanguinary sacrifices, I would hesitate long before opposing this long-cultivated sentiment. But I have a deep conviction, Mr. President, that the American people have not yet awakened to the enormity of our task or the danger in this crisis. They little realize the inevitability of our involvement. But these are poor times to measure political considerations. A writer in the morning's mail threatens me, for himself and his followers, with political obscurity if I support conscription. My answer is that if I failed in the performance of a public duty, as I conscientiously see it, I deserve obscurity. I do not question the sincerity or the patriotism or the quality of service of my colleagues or most of my constituents who see differently, but I venture to predict that he who charts his political course according to the unstable compass of the passing day will find his craft far from the intended harbor before the world's tranquility is restored.

Mr. President, we face a war which must be won. A million soldiers prepared may be followed by five millions called or ten millions needed. The world has joined issues with the central powers of Europe, and the world must triumph or become the several vassal States of the conquering powers. No such conflict was ever waged before. We see both civilization and freedom brought to the supreme test. We could not escape our part if we would. We should have been called upon to defend our rights alone if we had not enlisted for maintained right and justice with the allied nations of Europe. Failing to defend, we should not deserve to endure. But the selfishness of the hour and day, which is not peculiar to any party, class, sect, or locality, is fast yielding to the rising American spirit. Compulsory service is democracy's one instrumentality of defense and the very guaranty of continued equality. It is inherent in the tribal forces, where there is no government save the leadership of men; it is the final agency of civilization for its own preservation. It is our encouraging hope to-day; it is our assurance to-morrow; it is that edict of commonality which bespeaks the power and majesty of a people whose cause is just.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I had not intended to express my opinions upon this measure except by my vote, but I can not permit the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to be presented without saying at least a few words in regard to it. If we had had in this country, as we ought to have had, if we even had established two or three years ago, universal military training, which is the sure defense of a democracy, then when war came upon us the universal liability to service embodied in the draft or conscription would have followed as a matter of course. The reserves produced by the years of universal military training would have been called out in successive installments—the youngest first. But unhappily we have not taken that first step, and we are now going to take the second step without it. The second step is the establishment of the principle of liability to universal military service. So long as the bill embodies this principle it will receive my most earnest support.

No one can admire the history of the volunteers in the past more than I. I know well what the country owes to them and what it has owed to them after they had, through tremendous sacrifices, become trained troops. I am quite aware that having had no universal military training the men we get now, whether as volunteers or as conscripts, are equally untrained, and that other things being equal the volunteer, the man who is not only ready but eager to serve, would have the advantage in quickness of training.

But, Mr. President, the principle involved far outruns any of those considerations. The necessity of the compulsory service embodied in this bill should be placed upon the statute books because it is the only just method of raising armies. I do not for a moment suggest that those who do not come forward to volunteer will not make good soldiers, but they are the men who are ready to permit somebody else to do the fighting for them, and they should be compelled to do their share.

In a democracy the liability to service should be as universal as the liability to bear the financial burdens and as absolutely diffused as the rights and privileges which democracy confers. It is sound in principle to make military service compulsory, and it is the only sound and just method. When we are entering, as we have entered, into a great war we must make it clear that the duty of defending the country and upholding the principles of freedom and humanity is to fall alike on all who are able to bear arms.

Mr. President, I should not support the amendment of the Senator from Ohio if in any way it interfered with the conscription provisions of this act, but it does not. Under the provisions of the amendment only men can be taken for this force who are not liable to draft, and if those men are not taken in this way they will be unable to serve their country at this moment.

I can conceive of no good reason why men over 25 who are eager and willing to fight for the country, earnestly desirous to go to France, and who are physically fit for the service should not be permitted to offer their lives if they desire to. Among the men over 25, among the men who would fill the ranks of the proposed volunteer force, there are hundreds if not thousands who have seen service or had military training. It seems to me that it can not possibly injure the principle of conscription, of compulsory service, of universal service, to which I am entirely committed, but that it will have a stimulating effect both at home and abroad.

Everyone knows that, as the Senator from Ohio has said, the man under the limitations of this amendment, who alone probably in this country, would be able to raise a division or two divisions is Col. Roosevelt. He has been President of the United States for seven years and a half and during that time he was Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. He has served with distinction in the only war the United States has had since the Civil War. He is known in Europe as no other American is known. His presence there would undoubtedly be a help and an encouragement to the nations with whom we are allied against a common foe. If he could be there with one or two or four divisions of volunteers beyond the conscriptive age, men who went there because it was their heart's desire to go, it would be of immeasurable service to the cause in which we are embarked.

I am informed that some at least of the military experts to whom our military destinies are at present committed feel that an expeditionary force to France at the present time would be a mistake. They say it would have nothing but a sentimental or a moral value. It is not for laymen to oppose their opinions to the military experts. But, Mr. President, there was a soldier who had a considerable military reputation in his own day, the first Napoleon, who said that moral effect was to material effect in the ratio of two to one. He also said that imagination ruled the world and although modes of warfare have changed human nature has not, a fact which it might be well for our War Department to consider.

I have no question that if the great soldier who is in this city to-day, the victor in the Battle of Marne, were able to express his opinion, as he is entirely unable to express it under the present circumstances, he would tell us that he fully agreed with the views of Napoleon.

It is impossible, in my opinion, to overrate the moral effect of a division of troops of the United States under the American flag appearing on the western front in France. It would have a moral effect upon those English and French soldiers carrying on the great battle which can not be overestimated.

Mr. President, it is impossible for me to conceive why either the administration or Congress should refuse to Col. Roosevelt and to volunteers whose age takes them beyond the conscriptive limits the opportunity to give their lives to their country and in their country's service if they so desire.

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LODGE. Surely.

Mr. HARDING. For fear the Senator does not say it, and it ought to be said, I should like him to put into the statement he is making the fact that Col. Roosevelt has only desired to contribute his distinguished personality to the recruiting of this force and desires a general Army officer to take the supreme command.

Mr. LODGE. I am glad the Senator reminded me that that is the wish of Col. Roosevelt. He does not seek to go in command of the division if he raises one. He would prefer to go in a subordinate capacity with a regular Army officer at the head of the division. His desire to recruit a division is not personal self-seeking. He would merely like the opportunity to fight for the cause of the United States and what he considers the cause of humanity and freedom on the fields of France. For Heaven's sake, is there any reason why he should not have that opportunity? Is he not to be allowed to give his life if he desires to give it for what he thinks is the most sacred of all causes?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have a letter which I was requested, or expected I think, to put in the RECORD, but I did not, from ex-Gov. Sulzer, asking me to do what I might to enable him to raise a brigade in New York to go to France. Why not?

Mr. LODGE. I have a similar letter, which I submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. This amendment limits volunteers under its provisions to a unit not smaller than a division, and if there is any other man who by his own personal influence, by his weight in the community, can raise a division under the terms of the amendment, I should be glad to see him do it.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion which I think is in line with what he is saying? For many years we have been building up in this country what was called a reserve. The plan was submitted by the Army authorities to create a reserve—men who had been trained in the Regular Army and men who had been trained in the militia. In addition to those men there are a large number of men who served in the Spanish War; there are a large number of men who have been drilled and who have been officers in militia organizations, nearly all of whom are past the age of 25. It is a peculiar thing about this bill that it excludes all those men or nearly all of them from service.

If a volunteer organization such as the Senator speaks of were permitted, or if a volunteer organization such as that stated by the minority of the committee were permitted, those men could come to the service of the country. But the peculiar thing to-day is that having for years undertaken to build up a sort of reserve and boasted we had one we are now asked to pass a bill that absolutely excludes it.

As far as Col. Roosevelt or any other man is concerned who wants to raise men, not to interfere with the draft, but to go to serve their country, I can not see why their services should not be accepted.

Mr. LODGE. I am glad the Senator from Missouri emphasizes the point which I think of great importance, that here are men, of whom Col. Roosevelt is the most conspicuous, who have had service, who have had training in one capacity or another, who constitute, as the Senator from Missouri says, a practical reserve; and are we to be told that those men shall not be permitted to give their lives to their country?

Mr. President, this is not a party war. This is an American war; and if men desire to come forward, as Col. Roosevelt and those like him desire to come forward, who are not subject to the draft, and go forth and fight for the country and the cause of right, it is to me incredible that the opportunity should be refused.

If some of our military experts think that it is out of the question to have any men in the service called volunteers, no matter how restricted, it is not impossible to permit Col. Roosevelt to go as a subordinate officer in a division composed of marines, regular troops, and National Guards, who have been recently tested and trained at the border. A division like that could be sent in a month.

But I believe that it is important to avail ourselves of these men who are outside the draft whose going can not hurt the principle of conscription. The whole movement will show the spirit of the American people as nothing else can, and we need to show that spirit in every possible way, not only for its effect upon our allies but for its adverse effect upon Germany.

The whole country and the whole world know that we are at war with Germany, but our own people do not yet fully realize the fact and all that it means. I have believed from August, 1914, that it was inevitable that we should be engaged in a war in which free popular government was pitted against military autocracy represented by the Prussian system. I never believed for one instant that we could escape. It matters not whether it was my opinion that we should have moved earlier or later, the inevitable has come; we have moved; we are in the war. Do not underrate it. We are only at the beginning.

The cause of the other nations who are fighting Germany has become our cause. To desert them now or at any time hereafter would be to place an indelible stain upon our honor, to betray ourselves, to betray the principles on which the whole system of the United States rests, without which it will fall. It is a dominant part, especially at this moment, in our fighting this war to hold up the hands of our allies. They need great help. We have given them the quickest help in the form of money. We shall have to give them more. We must be ready for another loan for their benefit. We may as well face the fact. We must sustain them with money; we must use the German ships at once—the problem largely centers there—we must build ships as rapidly as possible; we must carry supplies to England and France, to Italy and Russia. In the meantime we must also build up a great army of our own, for it may well be that within the year we can not win this war, as it must, as it shall be won, unless we put a million, perhaps two million, men on the front in Europe. In the meantime, however, if we can help our friends and allies by the moral effect of sending some troops to France at this moment, for heaven's sake let us do it. Let us send the men who are ready to go; let us send a division to France. Let the people of France and of England know that we are with them in the way in which alone we can impress it upon the spirit and the imagination of men. There is only one way to do that; and the moral effect will be important; it will be enormous. The way to do it is to show the American flag—if there are only 10,000 men with it—to show the American flag on the frontier of France among the trenches where war is now raging.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think I rose a little bit before the Senator from Idaho and addressed the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think the Senator did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The name of the Senator from Idaho is on the list of speakers which the Chair finds at the desk, and he is recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the rule of the Senate that a Senator rising in his place and respectfully addressing the Chair shall be recognized is abrogated.

Mr. BORAH. No; it is not abrogated. The Senator from Idaho rose and addressed the Chair before the Senator from Mississippi rose. If the Senator from Mississippi, however, desires to proceed, notwithstanding that fact, I can yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to proceed for about 10 minutes—not much longer.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to proceed now, Mr. President, because I wish to say something pertinent to the observations just made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and I think that debate is better encouraged in that way than it is by keeping a list at the desk and the Chair recognizing Senators for set speeches.

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that the American flag ought to be upon the firing line of France or Belgium right now. It seems to me that the quickest way to get it there is to send 10,000 Regulars under the command of competent officers, who have been trained for their lifetime to command men and to fight them.

So far as ex-President Roosevelt is concerned, the personal relations between him and me have always been most kindly, and they are so yet. I think that it would be very well for Col. Roosevelt to go to France in command of a regiment; I think he is perfectly competent to command a regiment, and perhaps even to drill a regiment. At any rate, it would be a great sentimental acquisition to the cause of the allies and against the common enemy to have it known not only that the American flag was upon the firing line but that an ex-President of the United States was upon the firing line in some capacity. I should like to see Col. Roosevelt go.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say this further, although I have risen principally for the purpose of agreeing that far with the Senator from Massachusetts. I think that for an ex-President of the United States to be there and to meet the President of the French Republic and to meet the generals in command of the British and Belgian and French Armies would be a thing which would travel far upon the wings of daily news.

I have sometimes doubted the military capacity of Mr. Roosevelt to command a brigade, and I know that he is by no means fitted to command a division, as the Senator from Massachusetts, I suppose, himself would very readily confess. It is not Col. Roosevelt's fault any more than it is the fault of the Senator from Massachusetts or my fault that he and I are not fitted to command a division. We simply never received the education, never had the training, never had the experience, and so are not fitted for the work.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi will allow me a moment, I desire to say that I think the Senator did not hear me when I said that Col. Roosevelt did not ask to command a division or even expect to do so; that he disclaimed it, that he did not want it, but that he was prepared to go in a subordinate position.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But he expects to command a brigade. In the last interview I saw from him he said that he did not want to command the whole division, but merely wanted to command one of the brigades. I should like to see him there; I should like also to see 10,000 good American Regulars on the firing line; and they could teach European troops some things, just as the Canadians have taught them some things.

Mr. President, I merely want to say this in addition, because I do not expect to occupy the time of the Senate any further while this bill is under consideration. I did not expect to occupy your attention at all, but while I am on my feet I can make a very ready response to some thousand telegrams and letters which I have received, and I propose to do it in very short meter.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am in favor of this bill——

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would rather not be interrupted, because I do not want to take up the time which really belongs to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. HARDING. I make a special request for this one interruption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HARDING. I should like the Senator from Mississippi, who always speaks with authority here for the administration——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not speak with authority here for the administration, and I never had any authority from the administration in my life, and never pretended to have.

Mr. HARDING. Well, I will give the Senator the credit of doing so, nevertheless. I want somebody who speaks the judgment of the other side of the Chamber to state the objection to Col. Roosevelt recruiting this division or the four divisions which the amendment contemplates.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is no objection to Col. Roosevelt doing that, any more than there is an objection to the Senator from Ohio doing it or to the Senator from Massachusetts doing it; but if either one of them desires to volunteer to command instead of volunteering to obey, and wants to volunteer for the very high command of division commander, much as I love them both, I would say that neither one of them is fit for it. [Laughter.] That is the answer to that.

There is no sort of personal objection upon my part to Col. Roosevelt in any regard at all. He was extremely courteous and nice and sweet to me while he was President, and has been since he retired from the Presidency. It has been only a few days since I got from him one of the nicest telegrams or letters—I have forgotten which—that I ever received in my life from him.

I am in favor of this compulsory selective-draft measure for these reasons: First, we have in America about 1,000,000 traitors, and amongst them are a considerable number of German, Austrian, and Hungarian spies. I want by this measure to weed out men of that sort. So far as a man is a naturalized American citizen, I want to invite him to resist this draft. If he does not resist it, we will enlist him. If he does resist it, we will watch him; and if he does anything wrong while he is being watched, we will interne him. So we will separate the true from the false; we will separate the loyal from the disloyal; we will separate the Americans from the traitors; we will prove that this is a people instead of being, as has been charged, an accidental conglomeration of many peoples. That is one reason why I want the selective-draft measure—to spot traitors.

Out of 10,000,000 German, Austrian, and Hungarian Americans in America, 9,000,000 of them are loyal, and would shoulder muskets to fight for America. There are two boys whom I appointed to the Military Academy—one, young George Quekemeyer, and the other young Charley Haverkampf—both of them from parents who, on both sides, were German. They are Army officers now and absolutely loyal, absolutely true; but I want to find out those who are not; and this draft will put us upon the trace of them.

Now, Mr. President, I want it for another reason: I want to resort in America, as an emergency measure, to compulsory universal service, with the hope that at the end of this war, when we throw our weight upon the side of the allies and have waged it successfully, we may be able, as a part of the treaty of peace, not only to put an end to compulsory military service for all time to come in America, but to force Germany and Austria and Turkey and the balance of the world to put an end to it all over the world. I am for compulsory military service now in order that we may put an end to compulsory military service for all future time all over the world; put an end to the mad, idiotic, insane spectacle that has faced the world for forty-odd years, of nation after nation gathering all of its manhood in armed camps, watching and suspecting and fearing other nations whose populations are also gathered in armed camps. That is one reason.

I am in favor of this war, and I am for carrying it to the end, no matter what it costs, for another reason—with the hope that at the end of this war we may put an end to most wars; that we may agree upon some sort of league among civilized nations whereby it will be said by those having the power and the force behind them to execute their sayings, "hereafter whenever any civilized nation in this world shall dare to make war upon any other civilized nation without first submitting the question in controversy to arbitration, or proposing to do it, that nation shall be declared an outlaw, beyond the pale of international law and beyond the pale of civilization; its overseas commerce shall be stopped; it shall be strangled and choked until it voluntarily comes back by due repentance, and after due punishment, into the pale of civilization." It sounds like a paradox, but I am in favor of compulsory military service in order to put an end to compulsory military service; and I am in favor of war in order to put an end, so far as is possible, human weakness being considered, to war itself.

Mr. President, I am glad that America is in this struggle, because it is a struggle finally to fix a place under the sun on the earth for democratic institutions, unmenaced and unthreatened and unawed and unterrorized by autocratic militarism from any source whatsoever. My hope and my dream as a fanatic peace advocate, which I am, which I always have been, and which I always shall be, God granting me aid; because it has not been many months since gentlemen were ridiculing me around the cloakroom and elsewhere and charging that I "carried unhatched peace-dove eggs" in my pocket to release on short notice. My dream, I say, is that at the end of this war we may put behind international law, which thus far is a mere conglomeration of precedents, a force; that we may in some way organize an amphictyonic council of the civilized nations of the world; and that we shall make the outlaw nations bring their controversies to that tribunal under all ordinary and normal circumstances. Of course, I appreciate that there are abnormal and extraordinary circumstances when such a system would not work.

The municipal law says to me that I shall not attack the Senator from Idaho, but shall bring him into court to settle any controversy I may have with him; but the law does not say to me that if the Senator from Idaho attacks me I shall stop and propose to leave the question in controversy to arbitration, while unresistingly I leave him to continue his attack. So every nation has the right of self-defense; and, of course, in arriving at the conclusion I have indicated we will not erect any structure which will make a nation which has been attacked stop for breathing time and leave the question of resisting attack to arbitration. My dream, however, is that there shall be somewhere, sometime, somehow on this earth a "parliament of man, a federation of the world," where "the common sense of most shall hold the fretful realms in awe." I also dream of a time when we will be rid of that form of individual or family insanity that makes a man or a family imagine that he or they have "a divine right to rule," and that God and they exist as a private partnership of overlords on the surface of this earth.

Mr. President, I have just said these few words because, principally, I wanted to answer a lot of letters and telegrams. I beg pardon of the Senator from Idaho. My only excuse for breaking into the discussion at this time and against the holy list was that what I wanted to say was in part very pertinent to what the Senator from Massachusetts had just said.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have been from the beginning of this discussion impressed with one thought, from which I am unable to be free. I have read with industry the opinions of military experts and those connected with the Army. I have listened with unusual interest to the speeches which have been made in this Chamber in support of the bill; but through it all I have been impressed with the belief and the thought that there is one element essential to a great fighting force and an efficient and successful army which has not been sufficiently stressed.

We seem to be well on the way toward laying the foundations for a thorough organization of our fighting forces, toward establishing the basis for a thorough fighting machine, as it is called, for efficiency and organization, all of which I recognize to be essential; but, if I may be permitted to say so in view of the array of arguments in support of the bill and of the eminence of some who are sponsors for the measure, there seems to me to be one element left out, which has been recognized as essential and indispensable to a fighting force from Alexander to Lee, and that is, for the want of a better name, the spirit, the enthusiasm, the heart, the soul of your Army. There is no place left in your scheme or plan for the play of those elements of strength which come not from discipline, not from organization, but from the volition, the initiative, the patriotism, the spirit of your Army. I venture to say that any plan which does not recognize that force is defective, and that contention can be sustained by every military genius who ever dominated a battle field from Frederick the Great to that mysteriously singular figure of the Civil War, Stonewall Jackson.

You may construct a fighting machine just such as Prussia has; you may organize your citizens into mere cogs in a great military mechanism; and when you shall have done so, you have accomplished all that the German Empire has accomplished in the way of providing a fighting force. But we will make a mistake if we leave out of this organization and out of this force that which the German Army, it is said, does not possess—initiative, patriotism, self-reliance, enthusiasm upon the part of the individuals who constitute the cogs in that great fighting machine.

Perhaps I can best express my idea by two lines from one who had a right to speak upon this subject, and that is Gen. William T. Sherman, as that expression is found in his memoirs. He says:

> There is a soul to an army as well as to the individual man, and no general can accomplish the full work of his army unless he commands the soul of his men, as well as their bodies and legs.

In other words, one of the great geniuses of the Civil War recognized that it was not sufficient simply to call men into the service and train and discipline them and make of them a mere fighting force; that it was not safe to crush out and discipline out and train out that which ought to belong not only to the individual but to the Army—the soul, the spirit, the patriotism of the collective body as well as of the individual.

Lord Northcliffe—and I cite English authorities in these days with some assurance—in an article which appeared only yesterday in the Saturday Evening Post, gives expression to the same idea. He says:

> Had that wonderful army that poured through Belgium been inspired by the enthusiasm and the conviction of free men, I do not think that anything could have stopped its progress. It is just that which is lacking in autocratically ruled armies. They go as far as they are told to go, and wish to go no farther.

The German Army is founded upon conscription. Conscription is the basis of militarism. It is the beginning of the military policy of every despot. It is the last resort of a republic, and has been so from the beginning of time. This is the very first time in the history of the Anglo-Saxon race when conscription was ever proposed except in dire necessity and absolute requirement, because, among other reasons, it has the tendency to eliminate, to keep out that soul, that enthusiasm of free men which is just as essential to a thorough fighting force as the discipline itself, and further reason that it has always been regarded as the most dangerous virus against which republics have to guard. You can not proceed in safety without both discipline and spirit, I agree. I contend that you may have both in a volunteer system, and that you can not have both in a conscript system. I oppose conscription, therefore, because it does not provide the best army, and I oppose it because it is fundamentally at war with the essential principles of free institutions. I am aware free governments have appealed to it, but always and only in dire necessity, always in reluctance, and always as a temporary expediency and not as a policy, not as a settled principle as we are proposing to do.

We have listened this morning to the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] and to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in favor of what? In favor of putting some soul into this fight, some enthusiasm into this cause, of arousing and crystallizing and uniting the American spirit and sending it to the line of battle. The manifestation of voluntary spirit is worth many, many soldiers who go there under compulsion, and every man here recognizes it. While I am thoroughly in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, I believe in giving play to that spirit throughout the country and permitting that manifestation of enthusiasm and of sentiment to have its place in this organization, just as Canada has done, just as Australia has done. If you take the selective volunteer system you will combine the enthusiasm, the soul, the spirit, the discipline, and you will have what Canada has—one of the finest fighting forces in Europe.

Mr. President, there is one other proposition preliminary to a discussion of the details of this bill. In my judgment, we can fight this war through, fight it effectively, fight it triumphantly, and depart not at all from the great underlying principles of republican institutions and the fundamental tenets of constitutional government. In my opinion we can be as thorough and efficient and effective in absolute adherence and conformity to the great underlying principles of republican government as we can by departing from them.

I have as profound a respect for my associates in this Chamber as any man could have for those with whom he associates; and yet did you ever stop to think that there is a certain element of Pharisaism in our constant assertion that the American people are not aroused, that they are not responsive, that they are not equal to the emergency? In my humble judgment, the patriotism outside of this Chamber will be found to be as universal, as responsive, and as willing to sacrifice, and even to die, as that inside of the Chamber or among those in high positions. Let us rid ourselves of some of this doubt, this want of faith in our people. Let us carry the people along with us or go with them. Let our measures here have a broader basis than that of our own patriotism. So long as we doubt the people will doubt us. So long as our measures here are based upon manifest distrust of the people we can not expect that outpouring which you seem to expect.

John Bright, the great commoner of England, once said that he would be willing to take the first 300 men you would meet upon the Strand and accept their judgment as quickly as he would accept the judgment of the 300 men assembled in Parliament. It was an unusual manifestation of the confidence of that great commoner in the wisdom, the patriotism, the discretion, and the judgment of the common people. I venture to say that if we will throw ourselves upon the patriotism of the American people and manifest our confidence in their patriotism, we will find that it is quite as sensitive and quite as alive to this great controversy as those who are trusted for a brief time with the power to call them into service. I believe the people understand this conflict, and, in my judgment, if the President had been authorized to call and had called on the 5th day of April for 500,000 volunteers, there would have been 1,000,000 responding and in camp now, out of which to select the 500,000. Let us quit talking of "slackerism"; it puts the brand of Pharasaism on ourselves.

In my judgment, we started wrong in this war, so far as the details of carrying it out are concerned, because we have not been willing to throw ourselves upon the patriotism of the American people. The first thing that we did, or one of the first things, was to propose here to the Senate what is known as the espionage bill, the "spy" bill, which puts the brand of suspicion upon every man and woman in the United States, high and low, rich and poor, criminal and innocent alike. It has its basis in the fact that we believe that this whole country is honeycombed with disloyalty, that the press is not to be trusted, that the private citizen is not to have our confidence, and that the real patriotism, the real reason, the real judgment, is lodged in those who for a brief time hold office. The spy bill is an impeachment of the loyalty and love of the American people, for it discriminates not at all as to the guilty and the innocent but treats all the people as unworthy and as suspicious characters.

The second proposition which we put forward is a conscript bill which, in its last analysis, in its final philosophy, is based upon the theory that there is a powerful element of slackerism in our country. When you analyze all these arguments, they proceed upon the theory that out of 100,000,000 people you can not get an army of 1,000,000 men—that we are slackers all.

Mr. President, we ought to stop and reflect a moment that in this we may be very greatly mistaken; that the people of the United States, being given an opportunity, will give that manifestation of loyalty to the cause of democracy for which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] spoke so well this morning.

Mr. President, I entertain the same views in regard to this question of conscription that I have entertained throughout my life. I entertain the same views that the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, and 98 per cent of the people of the United States entertained 90 days ago. I do not easily put off my convictions and my views. They are not subject to change as my clothes are in the spring of the year when the warm days come. I hold to those convictions to-day because, notwithstanding the able arguments which have been adduced, I have not been able conscientiously to put them aside.

I have a profound respect for the man who has a wider vision, a greater comprehension, and can deal with these subjects perhaps from a broader and more statesmanlike point of view, but I must go the way my own convictions point as the right way.

While this is a time for national devotion, for national unity, for consecration to a great cause; while this is a time for nonpartisanship, a time for Americanism, at the same time it is not a time for men to yield the conviction of a lifetime unless they are yielded in conscience and in judgment. If ever men in responsible position should put aside political expediency and stand by the admonitions of a loyal heart and a clean and honest judgment, it is now. I think we should record our views as we entertain them, and take the chances that the majority judgment will be the wisest when it is recorded in accordance with the absolute convictions of those whose duty it is to decide.

A little over a year ago the President, in writing to Mr. Garrison, said:

> As you know, I do not at all agree with you in favoring compulsory enlistment for training, and I fear the advocacy of compulsion before the committee of the House on the part of representatives of the Department of War has greatly prejudiced the House against the proposal for a continental army.

Again, on the 30th day of May, 1916, the President said:

> I have heard a great many people talk about universal training. Universal voluntary training with all my heart, if you wish it, but America does not wish anything but compulsion of the spirit of America.

I do not quote this, Mr. President, to criticize the change of view of the President, I accredit to him the same integrity of purpose in changing his view that I claim for myself in not changing my view. But permit me to say here in this presence that I accredit to him no higher integrity of purpose than I claim for myself. I think the most contemptible creature that slimes the public service in the hour of national peril is the man who changes his vote or his attitude before he changes his mind.

One of the great papers of the country—a powerful journal, a journal with which I seldom disagree upon governmental matters, and with which I generally disagree in political matters, the New York World—said in an editorial some time ago:

> It has been our pride and our boast that unlike the monarchies of the Old World our Government has never been compelled either to resort to a conscription of its citizens or the employment of foreign mercenaries. * * * It is a hereditary and heretofore an honored tradition of the Anglo-Saxon race that exemption from extorted military service is one of the peculiar privileges of freemen.

In a later editorial in 1916, referring to Australia's action with regard to conscription, the New York World said:

> Australia is committed to the war. She has put into the field more men than the United States had in actual conflict in the War with Spain. Her sons gained renown in the "glorious blunder" of Gallipoli, repelled the Turk from Egypt, won a noted naval victory with the cruiser Sydney, have gained in France a reputation second to none.
> In the midst of a war in which she is so deeply concerned, on the result of which her independence itself may hang, Australia has rejected the policy of conscription by probably 80,000 votes. Premier Hughes himself, the leader of the Labor Party, an orator ranking in persuasiveness with Mr. Roosevelt, strongly urged conscription, and promised for it a 70 per cent vote. That advocacy and promise cost him his greatest defeat in one of the most democratic of lands.
> In a time of peace in this country Gov. Whitman last winter put through a scheme of military conscription so extreme that under it the agents of the State can enter any factory and recruit its employees by name, or any farm and recruit its owner. He did it because the people did not know he was doing it. He has not dared to make use of the law, though the National Guard of New York needs recruits to fill its quota under the Hay bill; but the power remains, inviting abuse.
> What was done in secret is now in the light. The people of the State are becoming informed upon the Stivers act. To the extent that they do become informed they are likely to express an opinion. Why should New York in peace be more complaisant than Australia in war?

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch of November 8 says:

> The fact that the Australian Government did not dare to put a conscription law in effect without submitting it to a popular vote is immensely significant.
> This first conscription referendum sets a precedent marking progress for democracy.

Mr. President, those were the views I believe of this great paper, of all the great journals, of the President, and of the Congress, and of the people of the United States, in my judgment, of 95 or 98 per cent, until within the last 90 days. It was a strong conviction. It was and is based not upon suspicion; it is based not upon prejudice; it is based not upon ignorance; it is based upon one of the profoundest convictions, one of the most sublime intuitions, that control and guide freemen with reference to their institutions.

When this conscription fight started in England one of the strong periodicals of that Dominion and an earnest advocate of the war, known distinctly as a war periodical, had this to say in regard to conscription. I read it as a fine expression of the real fundamental basis for the conviction which the American people and all Anglo-Saxon people have entertained in regard to this matter. I read from the Round Table Quarterly:

> The conscription controversy has its roots deep in English history. The passionate hatred of militarism, and of the system of conscription in which it is incarnate, dates back to Cromwell and his major generals. Nothing save dire necessity would induce the people of the United Kingdom to submit to anything approaching the continental system of conscription. That any government, however responsible to public opinion, should be in a position to declare war, and then muzzle opposition to it by calling every able-bodied man up to middle age to colors is utterly repugnant to the idea of liberty as it lives in the British Isles. And the spectacle of how Austria-Hungary and Germany are able to coerce Slavs and Poles to fight their own brethren contrary to their will, and more recently of how an autocrat has been able to force an unwilling nation into war also against its will by means of the conscript system, has only intensified the hostility to it. Further, the history of the struggle for political liberty in England has been largely bound up with the triumph of the civil over the military power.
> Conscription in any form has always been regarded as a return toward militarism and a more ready recourse to military methods and power within the State.
>
> What was the good, people said, of fighting for liberty abroad, if it was to be lost at home. If Prussianism had to be fought anywhere they would prefer to fight it in Britain than in Germany.

Mr. President, by way of preface I call attention to these matters that I may persuade my colleagues, if possible, that those of us who look with disfavor upon conscription are not controlled by mere suspicion, by ignorance, by want of information, by unenlightened prejudice; but we are acting in accordance with what we believe to be fundamental principles, essential and indispensable to the maintenance and preservation of republican institutions. I do not accept at all the glaring paradox of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that we want conscription in order to put an end to conscription. I can not understand any intellectual legerdemain of that kind. I do not propose to fool anybody, much less myself, by indulging in such delusive delusions. The basis of the contention against conscription goes further and deeper. It goes to the fundamental question. If it is not in the beginning it is the end of that which Anglo-Saxon freemen have regarded as essential to republican institutions.

Mr. President, I am told that this is universal military training and universal military service, and therefore democracy. Let us see. This bill covers those from the ages of 19 to 25. It touches in its effect about 6,000,000 of the people of the United States. It leaves on the outside about 30,000,000 who are available for military service. Only 6,000,000 of those who could render military service and who are under the same obligation as every other citizen to render military service are affected or touched by the bill at all. Within the 6,000,000 it is expected to raise 1,200,000. So you have both universal training and universal military service based upon the proposition that one-half of 1 per cent of the people of the United States are to be effected. Is that universal? Is it democracy? Has it any one of the elements of universal service or universal training? It lays its heavy and incriminating hold upon all between 19 and 25; it touches not at all the able, the fit, and the available man who is 26 and single and possibly idle; it touches not at all the men of 27 to 40. Can that be universal? Can that be democracy which calls to the youth and leaves the mature man? Is that universal? Is that democracy which goes into a neighborhood, finds 20 young men and takes 5, and leaves 15 of equal fitness and station of life?

For instance, Mr. President, take the boy 19 years of age or 20 years of age. He is in school. He is preparing for life. He is getting ready to meet the tremendous responsibilities which will rest upon every citizen when this war is over as well as while it is going on, because I venture to say that the industrial conflict which will come at the close of the war will test American citizenship equal to the test which is being applied upon it in the war. The young men throughout the country of 19 and 20 who are preparing for the future, equipping themselves for the duty of citizenship, are taken and put not into training and sent back home in six months, as the Chamberlain bill contemplated, which was introduced some years ago, not for physical development and military training, to be returned at the end of two months, but he is taken and put in a place where he may be called to the European trenches as soon as his discipline will permit of it. Those outside the age of 25, men of 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, and 35, physically equipped, ready to go perhaps—you leave outside this vast mass of people and you draft the schoolboy, the college boy, and call that universal military training and democracy.

Let us see how it works. The law is enacted. The representatives of the bureau, the provost marshal, starts down the street with the names of those whom he desires to conscript, after the gambler's hazard has settled whom it shall be. He passes down the street of one of our great cities and he sees a hundred or 200 or 300 men lounging about those places where men will idle their time away very often, even in time of war. He passes by a hundred men or 200 or 300 from 25 to 35 years of age; but he is not looking for them. This is democracy; it is universal military service. He is looking for the boy with his books under his arm going to school. The boy comes down the street. He takes hold of him and leads him back to the place where he must answer to the service of his country. Perhaps the boy is graciously given a few minutes to go by his home and leave his books and bid his mother and father good-by. By this time he has elicited the attention of the bystanders, and when the mother inquires how it is her boy is taken and every other boy in the neigbhrhood is left, the answer is, "It is democracy; it is universal service."

Mr. REED. And equality.

Mr. BORAH. And equality. Some of this crowd of a hundred men or 200 men who are lounging about in the city have followed the boy back to his home and heard his mother ask the question, and we hear 10 or 15 or 50 of them say, "Let the boy stay at home; I will go; I will take his place"; and you could not fail to find among 50 or 100 American citizens 10 of them who would say it. But the conscript provost marshal says, in the name of democracy, of universal service, I call the schoolboy to the trenches and leave the man from 25 to 35 to pursue his avocation and speculate, if he desires, upon the honor and patriotism of the boy at the front. The schoolboy, the youth, eager and ambitious to prepare for life, is snatched away; the matured and the fit are left at home.

Will you tell me that is universal military service, that that is democracy, where it would touch one-half of 1 per cent of the American citizens? If you will change this bill and write in it from 21 to 45, and lay this conscript obligation upon every man who is fit and capable of serving his country, and then select as you need them, you will have approached something like universal service and democracy and equality before the law. But as the bill stands it is an insult to intelligence to call this universal service, to call it democracy; it is cold, cruel, narrow, arbitrary autocracy.

Mr. President, I have received telegram after telegram asking me to support universal military service, the Chamberlain bill, because they are in favor of that proposition. I refused to support this bill because it has no element of democracy, of universal service, of universal training, of equality, of common responsibility of the citizen, in it.

I want to say just a word now in regard to the volunteer service. First, let me say as to the selective principle as applied in Canada with reference to the volunteer service just as you propose to apply it here. It is true, as the brilliant Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] said, that in the beginning of this war certain regiments were decimated and the men in them perhaps ought to have been saved under the selective system for higher duty. But that was in the beginning. It was at the time of the rush and turmoil of preparation in which Canada had no opportunity to organize her selective volunteer system. That would not happen in Canada now. It does not happen in Canada now. She has preserved what Sherman said is essential to an army. She has preserved the volunteer spirit, the volunteer enthusiasm; she has the volunteer patriotism; she has the discipline and the training, and she has the selective principle all at the same time. Why should we be permitted to say that it is impossible when it is working with marvelous effect here upon our very border? They select so as not to interfere with industries, with agricultural industries, just as you propose to do here.

But let us go back for a minute to the volunteer system. It has its defects. I do not deny it; all things human have. For instance, politics has been adverted to. Is the Regular Army without its politics? Has there been a time in your service or mine here in the last 10 years in which we have not seen the most glaring and demoralizing effect upon the Regular Army by the play of politics in the Regular Army, not by the men themselves, but by those who control their destiny. Is it an old thing? Is not that politics at play within the last few months. Are not Army posts, naval stations, maintained through shameless, selfish politics? Are not men promoted in brutal disregard of service and merit? Do you expect to have politics absent from any kind of an organization which you may have? I anticipate if you do you are doomed to disappointment. There will be some politics in any institution which is created under a government where politics is the nerve and sinew of its moving power, and you can not prevent it.

But the volunteer system also has its virtues, and here, again, I want to call attention to a statement by Gen. Sherman. He was not a pacifist; he was not a German sympathizer; he was an American. He was so truly and loyally an American that he is the only American I ever heard of who had the courage to refuse the Presidency when he could have had it, in all probability, because he believed his duty was elsewhere; that his service to his country was elsewhere. What does he say? He says, in referring to the Civil War:

> We tried almost every system known to modern nations, all with more or less success—voluntary enlistments, the draft, and bought substitutes—and I think that all officers of experience will confirm my assertion that the men who voluntarily enlisted at the outbreak of the war were the best, better than the conscript, and far better than the bought substitute. When a regiment is once organized in a State and mustered into the service of the United States the officers and men become subject to the same laws of discipline and government as the regular troops.

He goes on to discuss not only the volunteer soldier, but he goes on to discuss the volunteer system. Those who have read this paragraph say that it relates to the soldier. Well, that is of prime importance, even if it related alone to the soldier. But Gen. Sherman proceeds to discuss not only the volunteer soldier but the volunteer system, and he has no hesitancy in saying that it is altogether the best system for a free country or republican institutions.

Now, Sherman had the opportunity of observing the volunteer from the time he came to the enlisting station until he passed on to the service of his country. He saw him enlist; he saw him training; he saw him disciplined; he saw him in the trenches and on the march; he saw him fight, and he saw him die; and he says the volunteer soldier and the volunteer system, according to the experience and common belief of generals of the Civil War are better than the conscript, and infinitely better, of course, than the hired substitute.

Permit me to read another statement, and this is from an English authority—Col. Henderson, in his Life of Stonewall Jackson. There has been a great deal said about the Battle of Bull Run and the disasters at the beginning of the Civil War. I would like my colleagues to take the time to read this book, if they have not done so. Col. Henderson's reason, as he viewed it, for the disaster of Bull Run would not reflect discredit upon the volunteer soldier; it would reflect upon the West Pointers who happened to be in control at the time of the volunteer soldier. I digress from the thread of my argument and read a sentence at the conclusion of his discussion:

Thus the Federal soldiers, through no fault of their own, labored for the first two years of the war under a disadvantage from which the wisdom of Lee and Jackson had relieved the Confederates. The Army of the Potomac was an inert mass, the Army of Northern Virginia a living organism endowed with irresistible vigor.

By reason of the fact of the kind of men who were in command and not to the volunteer soldier.

I read another page from this brilliant writer. This book is now a textbook, I am told, and has been for years in the military schools of England.

German soldiers have told us that in the war of 1870, when their armies marching on Paris found, to their astonishment, the great city strongly garrisoned and hosts gathering in every quarter for its relief, a singular apathy took possession of the troops. The explanation offered by a great military writer is that "after a certain period even the victor becomes tired of war," and "the more civilized," he adds, "a people is, the more quickly will this weakness become apparent." Whether this explanation be adequate is not easy to decide. The fact remains, however, that the Confederate volunteer was able to overcome that longing for home which chilled the enthusiasm of the German conscript. And this is the more remarkable inasmuch as his career was not one of unchecked victory. In the spring of 1863 the Army of the Potomac, more numerous than ever, was still before him, firmly established on Virginian soil; hope of foreign intervention, despite the assurances of the politicians, was gradually fading, and it was but too evident that the war was far from over. Yet at no time during their two years of service had the soldiers shown the slightest sign of that discouragement which seized the Germans after two months. And who shall dare to say that the southerner was less highly civilized than the Prussian or the Bavarian? Political liberty, freedom of speech and action are the real elements of civilization, and not merely education. But let the difference in the constitution of the two armies be borne in mind. The Confederates, with few exceptions, were volunteers who had become soldiers of their own choice, who had assumed arms deliberately and without compulsion, and who by their own votes were responsible that war had been declared. The Germans were conscripts, a dumb, powerless, irresponsible multitude, animated, no doubt, by hereditary hatred of the enemy, but without that sense of moral obligation which exists in the volunteer. We may be permitted, then, to believe that this sense of moral obligation was one reason why the spirit of the southerners rose superior to human weakness and that the old adage which declares that "one volunteer is better than three pressed men" is not yet out of date.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HARDING. Would it annoy the Senator from Idaho, in his interesting quotation of authorities, to let me suggest a sentiment on this subject by a very eminent American soldier?

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection.

Mr. HARDING. In 1864, when the most modest and most eminent of American military authorities was urging the close of the War of the Rebellion, Gen. Ulysses S. Grant wrote the administration at Washington urging the draft, and he used this language:

The greater the number of men we have, the shorter and less sanguinary will be the war. I can not too strongly urge the draft.

Mr. BORAH. I will come to that in a few minutes, if the Senator will permit and I can find the time. But I make this observation now: Grant wrote this before the draft had been tried. I can find nowhere that he indorsed it after it was tried. Sherman wrote after it had been tried—20 years after—in calmness and in the light of experience, and condemned it.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask a question a little apart from the Senator's argument. He was referring to the Federal commanders at Bull Run. Is it not true that both Lee and Jackson were West Pointers?

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. What I said was not in condemnation of West Point as an institution. I believe in it thoroughly; but, notwithstanding the fact that a man passes through West Point, he may be the greatest blunderer who ever escaped a commission of lunacy. Even the skilled and trained may egregiously err.

Mr. REED. The Senator believes every southern commander was a West Pointer—I think clear down the line, almost.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am going to read a statement from a West Pointer on this subject—a man who, I believe, was the greatest military genius of the Civil War, who came more nearly possessing a Napoleonic mind with reference to war than any other man who was developed in that great contest, and that was Stonewall Jackson. He is a man who has elicited greater praise and commendation from the military experts in other countries than any man who fought in the Civil War for his sheer force of genious in military affairs. At one time during the war, while he was in actual service, the very question we are discussing here—the comparative value of the regular or conscript man and the volunteer—came up. One of the Army officers who was discussing it with him made the statement that he preferred the regular to the volunteer. Stonewall Jackson replied in a single sentence which contains, to my mind, all the philosophy on this discussion, so far as my view of it is concerned, that "the patriot volunteer, fighting for his country and his rights, makes the most reliable soldier upon earth."

Mr. President, these men do not stand alone. Lord Roberts has said the same thing, notwithstanding he was an advocate of universal military training. Roberts said, in an article only a short time before the breaking out of this war:

I hold that the man who voluntarily serves his country is more to be relied upon as a good fighting soldier than he who is compelled to bear arms.

I might quote other military authorities, but I recognize the fact that I am trespassing upon other Senators' time, and I will hasten on. I have other men's views who were and are experts, who won their laurels in the ordeals of battle.

Now, a brief word with reference to conscription during the Civil War. I say brief because time will not permit of a full discussion of it. When Mr. Lincoln called for 75,000 volunteers over 200,000 men responded. There was an outpouring of loyalty throughout the North. They were not used. Gen. Sherman was reprimanded for his severe criticism of the policy which did not use them. Had they been utilized at that time and put under training there never would have been a conscript law passed during the Civil War. But it was the volunteer who constituted the Army of the Cumberland, who won the battles of Fort Henry, Fort Donelson, of Vicksburg, of Shiloh, and Gettysburg, and the Wilderness. They were with Sherman on his march to the sea. I call you to bear in mind also that after your conscript system was put into effect it took 20,000 soldiers, volunteers of the line, to enforce it, and then you only got about 50,000 conscripts, the poorest soldier, save the substitute, of the Civil War. He won no battles. He was conspicuous upon no battle field. On the other hand, as against this fifty-odd thousand there were a million and a half of volunteers who bore the brunt of the terrific conflict, who marched and suffered and sacrificed and died and saved the Union. It was not the volunteer system which broke down, it was the conscript system, which ignominiously failed. I deny the infamous libel that the Civil War was won by the conscript. It was poorly aided by the conscript. It was won by the volunteer, and it would have been won by the volunteer had no conscript law been passed. I want to quote here a single paragraph from the report of the provost marshal, Gen. James B. Fry:

The order for the draft was the signal for violent disturbance in many portions of the loyal States, and much blood was shed before these disturbances were quieted. In some portions of the country, particularly in the city of New York, certain districts in Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Illinois, the draft was conducted under the protection of troops sent there to overawe the lawless, and in other districts the draft was deferred until troops could be furnished to protect the officers. The draft was not completed till late in the year, and produced but few men for the service. (Report of Provost Marshal Gen. James B. Fry, Mar. 17, 1866.)

I want here to read a statement which I clipped out of a newspaper the other day which seems to bear upon its face the evidence of verity.

HARK, FROM THE TOMBS COME AN ARGUMENT AND A SONG ABOUT EQUAL IN QUALITY.

To the EDITOR OF THE EVENING SUN.

SIR: Within the last six months a great deal has been said about regulars, volunteers, and drafted men. Nearly every old soldier of the Union Army knows that during the Civil War the volunteer regiments did more than nine-tenths of the fighting. In Fox's report of the 300 regiments that did nearly all the fighting, he has 296 volunteer regiments, four regiments of Regulars, and no drafted regiments.

Also, of the 46 regiments that lost between 200 and 300 killed in action, the whole 46 were volunteer regiments. Pennsylvania's share was 11, nearly one-fourth; and a New Hampshire regiment had the highest number (298) killed in action. No regiment reached 500 killed in action.

VET.

BALTIMORE, April 17.

It is a sad commentary upon the sincerity of this movement that you must resort to misrepresentation, to a misleading misconstruction of the sacred history which tells of the saving of the Union, in order to sustain your false views of conscription, which you euphoniously call democratic service.

Mr. President, there is another phase of the volunteer system, and that is as it has manifested itself in this particular war. It has been reverted to several times, and I need only briefly refer to it in order to follow the continuity of my thought, and that is, for instance, the Canadian system. They have sent out nearly 400,000 men to the war. Canada has a population less than the State of New York. Now, what is it that characterizes the Canadian soldier upon that fighting line which distinguishes him in his achievements and in his prowess? What is it that he has? First, he has the training which he got after he volunteered, which any man must have, whether he is conscripted or whether he volunteers; he has the discipline; and he has what Gen. Sherman said was indispensable and essential to an army—he has a soul, a motive, the enthusiasm, the loyalty to the great cause of the war. He has that combination of discipline and training and heart and spirit and soul without which an army can not do its best.

Why can not we have it? Why can not we have the same service here? I will yield my time for some one who will tell me. Why can we not take the Canadian system instead of the conscript system of Europe? Why do we reject republican principles which have proved successful in the greatest war of all time and rush for the conscript system of tyrants and despots?

Take the Australians. They have sent some 300,000 or more to the allies. They have manifested their capacity upon the field of battle. One of the great generals of this war said that they were among the most perfect fighting men upon the battle fields of Europe. The Australian and the Canadian share the glory together of being among the most effective fighters upon the battle fields of Europe, because I maintain they combine that which is essential to a great army and which the conscript system omits and leaves out entirely. Why reject these examples so in harmony with free institutions, so at war with all military castes, so productive of great soldiers and great armies, and accept that system which is the basis of all militarism and without which militarism can not exist, without which Napoleon could not have deluged Europe in blood, without which this war would never have been started, and with which no republic can long exist?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I would like to ask the Senator a question. In my humble opinion the world has never seen more splendid fighting than the fighting of the French from the beginning to the end—more self-sacrificing, more devoted, more brilliant. They are all what the Senator calls conscripts.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that the fighting of the French soldier in this war has been a marvel. I do not detract from him at all. I admire him beyond any feeble language of mine to express.

Mr. GALLINGER. He is fighting on his own territory.

Mr. BORAH. But, Mr. President, there is that in the French situation which supplies that which is essential. Their heart and their soul is in it. In my judgment, every one of them would have been there if there was no conscript system. It is a matter of preserving their country. The fight is at their door. They are fighting for their homes, they are fighting for their families. It is within hearing of every home in the land, and I think that spirit is there by reason of that fact. Had there been no conscript system in France, their situation would have been just as favorable.

I believe firmly, Mr. President, that if there had been no conscript system in France at all, this manifestation of marvelous patriotism, of suffering, and of sacrifice would have been exhibited upon the part of the French in the same sublime way, and I believe they would have been just as good soldiers.

Mr. President, I shall conclude my remarks in just a moment. I want to say a word in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. I am in favor of that amendment because it is in harmony with my views of the manner in which the army should be raised in this instance. I have no doubt at all, however, but that it is in absolute conflict with this bill, for the reason, in the first place, that it is thereby proposed to take men outside of the age limit; it is proposed to go outside of the age from 19 to 25 and to permit men to volunteer. I think that one of the vices of this bill is that it limits the conscript service to from 19 to 25 years of age, and that there ought to be a method by which those outside of that age could either be conscripted or permitted to volunteer. I think, therefore, that the amendment is in harmony with the views which I entertain in regard to the bill. But aside from that I am in favor of the amendment for another reason. It may be merely sentimental, but you have impressed me anew this morning with the value of sentiment in this fight. We are told that the army which we are proposing to raise may be carried to European soil as soon as it is fit to go there; that we are to share our fortunes with the fortunes of the armies of France and of Britain, and possibly of Russia. I do not now stop to discuss either the expediency or the wisdom of such a course; I accept it in this debate as the program of this war.

It is said that the fact—the sentimental fact—of an army of the United States, of the only real Republic that has ever existed upon the earth, marching to the relief of the beleagured nations of Europe will inspire the hearts and animate the minds of men wherever liberty is revered and freedom loved; it is said that when you fling the flags of France, of Britain, and of the United States to the European sky it will hearten the soldiers of Europe more than all else that we can possibly do; that it will have greater value than the preparation of ships and food; it will give them that which in their lagging and trying hours is essential to sustain them. I accept all your eloquence, all your logic with that. Therefore, I am in favor of sending Col. Roosevelt with his men to the front just as soon as he can gather and discipline them for that purpose.

I can not, however, help believing, Mr. President, that there is another element of sentimental power in this conflict which we overlook and which this bill will stifle. I believe that if 500,000 or 1,000,000 men from the United States were taken to the trenches, if that is to be your program, not under the conscript system, not driven to the task, but going voluntarily, devoted to the great cause of democracy, conscious of the responsibility of this Nation to sustain its part, willing to suffer and to die for a cause not exclusively their own, but for the cause of mankind, that its inspiring effect upon the world and upon the cause involved in this great fight would be far beyond the power of human language to tell—volunteers all from that people who are the inheritors of 150 years of liberty and freedom. There is a human element in this thing which, in my judgment, the conscript system eliminates and drives from our organization which we as Americans ought to retain. We ought to be big enough and be strong enough and brave enough to mark out our own course and to retain it, to fight for it and die for it.

Mr. President, as I have said heretofore on the floor of the Senate, one of the discouraging features of this great war to me is the alacrity with which the free governments of Europe have adopted the Prussian system in this contest. I believe that this great Republic can set an example to the world, and verify once and for all that a republic can make war, and that we can fight this battle in accordance with republican institutions, with republican principles, with republican policies, and fight it effectively and triumphantly without engrafting upon the blessed American system the hideous doctrine of Prussianism.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, when I came to the Senate I never dreamed that I should be called upon to cast a vote for war. I never passed through a sadder day than when I voted for the joint resolution declaring the existence of a state of war; but I never voted with a clearer conscience or with more confidence in my judgment as to my duty.

Mr. President, I am going to assume in what I have to say this afternoon that everyone who has spoken on the floor of the Senate has been perfectly sincere in the thoughts to which he has given expression. We are all true to this great democracy. We want to preserve it; but when it comes to a conflict between democracy and a military autocracy it may become necessary that democracy in her own defense shall wield the weapons that have been forged by military autocracy.

I love the word "volunteer." Necessarily every one of us feels an aversion to being compelled to do any service. Hence some of the sentiment against conscription. It may be a characteristic of military autocracy, but if it is going to help win the war I am ready to accept it. Many things have been said in favor of the volunteers and the great work that they have done for America; much has been said in favor of the conscripts and what they have done. I would not cast one word of reflection upon either volunteer or conscript, for they have rendered great service to this country.

Those who have spoken in behalf of the volunteer system have referred to many men who have favored it and to the deeds of valor performed by volunteers; but for every man to whom they can refer who has favored the volunteer system we can name many others who have preferred the conscript system. It does not do to say that because the most of the Federal forces were volunteers and were successful in the war to preserve the Union, therefore their success was due to the system. We had both the volunteer and the conscript in that war. The Southern Confederacy had both volunteer and conscript. Would it be right to say that its defeat was due either to the volunteer or to the conscript system, or to both? When we look at the situation as it exists abroad to-day we find both the volunteer and the conscript fighting side by side, and apparently with equal valor and effect.

Much has been said with reference to what the Canadian has done and what the Australian has done. All honor to them. But, at the same time, let us not forget the Frenchman who was conscripted or the brave German soldier who was conscripted. I dare say that we may study that situation as we will; much may be said in favor of the conscript and much may be said in favor of the volunteer, but you must not wholly approve the one or wholly condemn the other. The question is, What shall we do now?

Mr. President, if we were about to adopt some permanent policy to prevail for all time to come in this country, then we might take one position; but to-day we are thrown into the maelstrom of the worst war that civilization has ever known. Time is of the essence of what we are doing here now. England has seen fit, by force of necessity, to leave off her volunteer system and to adopt the conscript system; Germany has the conscript system; France has it; and no belligerent has changed from the conscript system to the volunteer system during this war.

If we are to take active part in this war, the sooner we can get an army together and thoroughly train and equip it the better we will be off. Why then delay? We know we can get the army with reasonable dispatch by the conscript system. The advocates of the volunteer plan are not certain their plan will be a success, because they provide that after 90 days the President may conscript.

Within the last few days eminent visitors have come to us from the seat of war, and I understand that all of them—I do not speak authoritatively, but I speak from information gleaned through the newspapers—have favored the conscript system rather than the volunteer system.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion along that line?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POMERENE. I will yield if it only takes a moment.

Mr. REED. It will take just a moment.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Missouri will observe that my time is very limited.

Mr. REED. I simply want to suggest that at least one of these European visitors has expressed a great deal of dissatisfaction at having been misquoted by the press.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well; I will accept that statement if it be true; but his Government has the conscript system.

Senators, my distinguished friend from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] referred very beautifully to the necessity of having a soul in the Army. I concede that; but will anyone say that Germany has no soul in her army or that France has no soul in her army or that Great Britain has no soul in her army?

I recall the experience which the South had with the volunteer system during the war. She changed in 1862 from the volunteer system to the conscript system. She did it of necessity. But will anyone say that the armies of the South from 1862 to the close of the war did not have a soul? Did ever more valiant troops meet other troops on the field of battle?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. POMERENE. I do, if it is only for a brief question.

Mr. THOMAS. I will be very brief. Does the Senator contend that the armies of the South, after the passage of that act, which went into effect concurrently with the volunteer system, were composed of conscripts?

Mr. POMERENE. For the most part.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, I have before me Pollard's The Lost Cause.

Mr. THOMAS. That may be; but the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. POMERENE. And I want to read just a few sentences from it. I am not going to read all of these several paragraphs, because there are some very offensive things said about those who favored the volunteer system in the Confederacy.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, every soldier of the Southern Confederacy was made a conscript after that act went into effect.

Mr. POMERENE. After the author speaks about the policy of the volunteer system and the fact that the terms of enlistment were expiring, he says:

> Such was the condition of affairs when the Congress in 1862 took up the thread of Confederate legislation. It at once broke it and commenced a series of measures of startling vigor. Its most important act was the conscription law of the 16th of April, 1862, from which properly dates the military system of the Confederacy. Previous to this the Confederacy had nothing that deserved the title of a military system and had relied upon mere popular enthusiasm to conduct the war.

I will omit something here and go a little further.

> But it was no time to hesitate for popularity, and to entertain the prejudices of the ignorant, when the entire fortunes of the country were at stake. The conscription law was barely in time to save the Confederacy.

Further on, omitting certain sentences, the author says:

> In every State one or more camps of instruction for the reception and training of conscripts was established, and to each State an officer, styled a commandant of conscripts, was appointed, charged with the supervision of the enrollment and instruction of the new levies. The conscription law, besides its great value for recruiting service, gave solidity to the military system of the Confederacy and centralized the organization of the army.

Mr. President, reference has been made to the success of Great Britain in getting a large number of volunteers. She was successful in many respects, looking at it from the standpoint of the organization of the army, but it must be borne in mind, when we are waging a war of such momentous proportions as that which now confronts us it is not the soldier at the front alone we must take into consideration, but we must bear in mind also the welfare of the entire Nation, because the men in the shops and in the mines and on the farms are as essential to the winning of battles as are the soldiers at the front.

What was Great Britain's experience when the volunteer system, so called, was in operation? Many of her best and her bravest men went to the front to the battle line and many of them never came back. The volunteers went to the front—the shops, the mines, and the industries of Great Britain were depleted, and many of these men had to be called back because it was believed that they could render their country greater service in the mine and in the factory than on the battle line.

Mr. FLETCHER. Whole divisions were brought back.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; whole divisions were brought back. After her experience with the volunteer system, she finally took up the conscript system; and while we are speaking of volunteering just bear this thought in mind, that the so-called volunteer system in England was in fact not a volunteer system in its operation. The papers are filled with accounts of the methods that were adopted to press men into the service. I shall only refer to one or two instances: Little children would go to school with buttons on their breasts, bearing the words "My father has gone to war; has yours?" Women on the street, in their enthusiasm for the cause, begging men to go to the front who perhaps could have better served their nation if they had remained at home. By such means men were forced in the service. They were not real volunteers.

Now, let us see what this situation is. It is wrong to speak of this bill as wholly a conscript measure? It is a combination of both volunteer and conscript features. I shall not take the time to go into details, but I want to call attention to a very few figures.

The Secretary of War the other day, in a letter addressed to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] said that it would require 151,519 soldiers to fill up the units in the Regular Army now provided for under the national-defense act; 206,349 to fill up the units provided for in the National Guard; for the first training cadre, 148,850; recruit training units for existing National Guard, 110,000; recruit training units for the Regular Army, 98,000; in all, 724,718. All of these places can be filled by volunteers.

The distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] referred to the fact that recruits at the present time were coming to the Regular Army at the rate of about 2,000 a day. If we should continue to recruit at the same rate, it would take just 362 days to recruit the volunteers provided for in the national defense act, if the figures quoted are correct. Under the pending bill, if men sufficient do not volunteer, the President may raise the balance required by conscription.

Then, in addition to these, we provide for the conscription of 500,000 men; and if there is no increase in the rate of volunteering now going on, it would take 250 days more time, or 612 days in all. Oh, it is easy to speak of theories.

Personally I would prefer to go as a volunteer rather than as a conscript. One distinguished public official the other day said that a "conscript" was next to a "convict." I take it that phrase was a mere license of rhetoric; it did not express his real opinion; but let me suggest that if we devote ourselves solely to a volunteer system there may be many who ought to serve their country at the front who will not go; and I dare say that if we would have exclusively the conscript system there is not one who otherwise might volunteer who, if selected, would refuse to go because he had been conscripted.

Senators, I see I have only a few minutes and I must hurry along, but there is one thought further that I desire to leave with the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I understand the Senator will have 10 minutes to speak on the bill after the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. POMERENE. I thank the Senator very much.

It must be borne in mind that these great armies—and I understand that there are 37,000,000 men now under arms or in uniform ready to be called to the front on the European Continent—have all been trained; they are seasoned soldiers. Britain, out of the abundance of her own experience, has suggested that it takes at least 11 months to train a man before he is fit to go to the trenches. Our armies should be raised in the quickest way possible, and that is by the conscript plan.

To-day the need of the allies is not so much men as it is military supplies. If I were to say to our allies, "We can furnish you 1,000,000 well-equipped men and send them to the front, or we can furnish you with food and military supplies," which would they choose? In my judgment, they would say to the United States of America, "Send us your food products, your military supplies, your guns, and your ammunition; and send us your ships. We have the men."

Looking at this question from the standpoint of the common good of all the allied forces, in what respect can we serve them best? They are depending upon our farms for their food products; they are depending upon our mines and our oil weils for their fuel; they are depending upon our great machine shops for their guns and their munitions; they are depending upon our shipyards for the ships with which to carry these supplies to the other shore. Ought we, then, to permit men to go to the battle field who may render better service at home?

What is the duty of the President and what should be the duty of Congress? Shall we say that we will leave it to the option of our men to go if they wish and to stay at home if they will? Is it not the duty of every man to hold himself ready to answer the call of the President and to go where he may direct, whether it be to the front, to the battle field, or stay in the machine shop, the mine, or the factory, or on the farm?

Mr. President, a weighty responsibility lies upon Congress and upon the President. If any one of us had a serious piece of litigation, we would consult a lawyer; if one of our dear ones at home was sick, we would call a physician; if we wanted to build a magnificent mansion, we would employ an architect; if we wanted a mechanic, we would go to the best machine shop we could find and get him; and when we are thrown into the midst of this war, whose advice ought we to take? Certainly it should be the advice of the military men who have devoted their life work to the study of war problems. At least we ought to credit them with more technical information on this subject than we possess. We can not disregard what they say and accept the judgment of a few men, back home or elsewhere, who have not had the same means of perfecting themselves in the military art that these men have had. I realize that I am wholly without any military experience, and I would rather, when we come to determining the policy which this Government shall adopt, accept the judgment of a military expert than of a nonmilitary man.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock on this the 28th day of April, 1917, having arrived, in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of, first, amendments to the pending bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I suppose the committee amendments will be first in order. I might offer one, and I think probably the Senator from Ohio would have a right to proceed before an amendment is offered; would he not, Mr. President? I think probably the Senator would have a right to speak 10 minutes on the bill under the agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is for the Senate to construe, of course. The opinion of the Chair is otherwise. The opinion of the Chair is that the amendment being before the Senate, the discussion must proceed under the five-minute rule on the amendment. While there is no rule of the Senate that requires a Senator to talk to the question, and he might talk about the bill, he would certainly be talking on the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, my own thought was that each Senator would have 10 minutes to speak upon the bill generally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has in accordance with this agreement, and that is for the Senate to decide. The Chair has not any interest at all in the matter. The Chair's opinion has been that, the amendments coming first, the five-minute rule was first in order.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to call attention to the language which is used here:

That after the said hour of 1 o'clock p. m., on the said calendar day, April 28, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has read that and knows just what it is. It is simply a question of the construction of what it means, and that is for the Senate. If it shall be taken by unanimous consent that at any time a Senator may talk 10 minutes upon the bill, the Chair does not care. The opinion of the Chair is, however, that the amendments were first to be disposed of and that then Senators could talk 10 minutes upon the bill; but the Chair does not care. Is it the idea that Senators may talk at any time, and that the Senator from Ohio may proceed for 10 minutes?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I shall not ask that, if the Chair has ruled otherwise. I will resume my seat.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then, Mr. President, I offer the following amendment——

Mr. STERLING. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio be allowed to proceed with the discussion of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That can not be done.

Mr. POMERENE. I appreciate that very much, but I will not ask it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That can not be done.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the construction that has been put upon this agreement by myself and a good many of the Senators is that a Senator can proceed for 10 minutes to discuss the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has placed the construction of the Chair upon it. If Senators want to appeal from the construction of the Chair, let the appeal be taken and let it be settled. The Chair tried to ascertain whether there was any objection to the Senator from Ohio proceeding. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I desire to call up an amendment which I thought the Senator would accept.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, let us get rid of the committee amendments first.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. A parliamenaary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is there not an amendment pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not yet. The Senator from Oregon has been recognized to present the amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The first amendment is the one at the end of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to ask whether it is the ruling of the Chair that no one can speak for 10 minutes upon the bill until after all amendments which are intended to be proposed to it are disposed of?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has been the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think that was the meaning of the unanimous-consent agreement at all, but I shall not appeal myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not care, just so it is decided. It has to be decided one way or the other; and the Chair thinks that in view of the burdens that have been imposed upon whoever sits here of keeping the time and keeping account of speaking, it is not only a fair construction of the agreement, but it is very easy to dispose of the amendments.

The Senator from Oregon submits a committee amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes the following amendment: On page 13, add a new section, after section 10, as follows:

SEC. 11. That no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall sell, supply, or have in his or its possession any intoxicating or spirituous liquors at any military station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, which is being used at the time for military purposes under this act, but the Secretary of War may make regulations permitting the sale and use of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes. Any person, corporation, partnership, or association violating the provisions of this section or the regulations made thereunder shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the amendment speaks for itself, and there is no use in undertaking to discuss it; but I understand that there are one or two substitutes to be proposed for it. I have nothing to say until they are offered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for that part of the amendment beginning at line 1 and ending at the word "purposes," on line 8, the matter which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The substitute will be stated.

The SECRETARY. From the committee amendment it is proposed to strike out all of lines 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, down to and including the word "purposes," and in lieu of those words to insert the following:

It shall be unlawful to sell, furnish, or give away any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, or to knowingly furnish to such person or persons intoxicating liquors, whether in uniform or not, or to any person in the employ of the Army.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in offering this amendment I am not going into a discussion of the question of prohibition.

That question has been debated in this body very frequently heretofore, and I suppose every Senator has made up his mind just how he will vote on any question of prohibition.

In explanation of my amendment I merely wish to say that the substitute I have offered is a real prohibition amendment, that will be effective. It will prohibit the sale of liquors to the soldiers in our Army, officers as well as men, It is a real, live, effective prohibition measure. It means precisely what it says. It is an amendment that has been approved by all the temperance forces in the country.

Now, for just one moment I want to discuss the amendment that is offered by the committee. I will say the amendment offered by me is substantially the same amendment that I offered in the committee, and I think it is proper to say that the amendment was at first adopted and then, upon a reconsideration, the substitute—that is, the committee amendment—was adopted in place of the amendment which I now offer. The difference between the two, Mr. President, is the difference between a real prohibition measure and a pretense at it. I read the language of the committee amendment:

That no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall sell, supply, or have in his or its possession any intoxicating or spirituous liquors at any military station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, which is being used at the time for military purposes under this act, but the Secretary of War may make regulations permitting the sale and use of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes.

The committee amendment is absolutely meaningless. Men can sell liquor to our soldiers just as before. There is no reason why they can not. It merely prohibits the establishment of saloons in posts. That is about all that it does. It is a subterfuge pure and simple, put in the bill probably to make it more in accord with general sentiment on this subject, but it is not effective. All I can say about the matter in explanation of my amendment is that if you do not want these boys—and we are putting 19 to 25 year old boys in the Army—to have liquor sold to them, if you do not want them corrupted and, maybe, ruined by the use of liquors while they are in the Army, you will vote for my amendment. I hope the amendment I have offered will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the chair). The time of the Senator from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am very heartily in accord with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] on his substitute. I was with him in the Military Affairs Committee, of which I have the honor of being a member, on this matter, and I am with him now; and I hope that the action of the committee in this matter will be overturned by the Senate.

It just comes down to this question: For all we know, before this war is over we may have to raise, equip, and train an army of 5,000,000 men. It is agreed that troops will have to be trained from six months to a year before they leave here and go to Europe. Now, training troops is just exactly to warfare what the foundation of a building is to the building. You can not build a solid, substantial building on a foundation of sand, on a rotten, crumbling foundation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator tell me how you will keep liquor from being in officers' quarters under this amendment? Why can they not have it in their quarters and drink it there themselves?

Mr. MYERS. I will say——

Mr. McKELLAR. Under which amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Under the Senator's amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, anybody who sells to officers or to their quarters, or to any soldier in uniform or out of it, is liable to the fine.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, does this come out of my time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It comes out of the Senator's time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. MYERS. I want to ask, Shall we have sober training or not? When you are having your million soldiers or maybe 5,000,000 soldiers trained, do you want them to be trained and drilled while they are perfectly sober or not; while they are under the influence of liquor or not under the influence of liquor? Which would be best?

I believe that workers in munitions factories, in mines, on farms, in Congress, in the Government departments, any and everywhere, can work better, more effectively, more intelligently when they are not under the influence of liquor than when they are under the influence of liquor; I believe that men can be trained to be soldiers better when they are not under the influence of liquor than when they are under the influence of liquor. Who will deny that? Will any Senator arise and deny it? You may say that a soldier may take a drink, that a captain or other officer may take a drink, and not be under the influence of liquor. It my be, but he will not be any better off because of the drink. He is not going to be any worse off by not having that drink, either, so far as training and discharging his duty is concerned. Give me the workman who works without liquor in him everytime; so with soldiers.

We have a gigantic undertaking ahead of us. We have to get right down to rock-bottom business and a common-sense foundation in every respect. We must stop waste. We must conserve our food, our energies, our brains, our products. We must waste nothing. No food should be allowed to go to waste. No exertion of mind or body should be wasted. Drilling men with whisky in them is time worse than wasted. We need the greatest efficiency. That is the only way we can defeat Germany, the most efficient nation on earth. Sobriety makes for efficiency. Any kind of liquor makes for inefficiency. The committee amendment is all right, as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. The McKellar amendment is much better. I was for it in the committee and am for it here. There is an article in a morning paper, this morning, stating that the world is confronted with starvation, a world shortage of food. We must take notice and begin to conserve our food. Likewise, we must conserve the health and welfare of our troops and keep them from drinking when they are being trained. We must have the utmost efficiency. Now, is a man up to his utmost efficiency when he has one or two or three or half a dozen drinks of liquor in him? I claim he is at this best when he has no liquor at all in him, as far as work of any kind, mental or physical, is concerned; if the McKellar amendment should be adopted, it would not, at least, hurt our Army. You may be sure of that. It will not hurt it the least bit. If not adopted, the efficiency of our Army may be hurt, so why take any chance?

I call on the Senators, all of whom must realize that the greatest efficiency can be attained in all kinds of labor when men are not under the influence of liquor, when they have no liquor in them; I appeal to their common sense and knowledge on this subject to overturn the action of the committee and say that when our troops are being trained they shall not be allowed to use liquor. It will make for efficiency, better training, good morals, clean living, pure patriotism, and better equipment in every way. Liquor never did any human being any good. It is among the worst foes of mankind. It is the foe of efficiency, good morals, industry, humanity, religion, accomplishment—all that stands for improvement of mankind, upright living, higher ideals. No man ever took a drink of liquor but who would have been better off without it. Let us keep liquor away from our soldiers, and the more strictly we keep it away the better. The McKellar amendment is the best way to do it. Let us start this war right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Montana has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator. Is this offered as an amendment to the bill or as a substitute for the provision offered by the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McKELLAR. This is offered as a substitute; but with the permission of the Senate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is offered as an amendment to the amendment, as the Chair understands.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should prefer to have it that way, and ask to leave the section just as it is offered by the committee, with this amendment to come in immediately after the word "purposes," in line 8, on page 13, of the bill. In other words, I should like to have the Secretary restate the amendment and offer this as an amendment to the committee amendment to be inserted immediately after the word "purposes," in line 8, on page 13.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think that is much better than offering it as a substitute.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent to have that done.

Mr. STONE. Let us have it read.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on line 8, page 13, of the bill, after the word "purposes," it is proposed to insert the words:

It shall be unlawful to sell, furnish, or give away any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, or to knowingly furnish to such person or persons intoxicating liquors whether in uniform or not, or to any person in the employ of the Army.

So that, if amended, the section will read:

SEC. 11. That no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall sell, supply, or have in his or its possession any intoxicating or spirituous liquors at any military station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, which is being used at the time for military purposes under this act, but the Secretary of War may make regulations permitting the sale and use of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes. It shall be unlawful to sell, furnish, or give away any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, or to knowingly furnish to such person or persons intoxicating liquors whether in uniform or not, or to any person in the employ of the Army. Any person, corporation, partnership, or association violating the provisions of this section or the regulations made thereunder shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, it so happens that I offered section 11 as an amendment to the committee bill. The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] offered an amendment that was much more stringent, and which I would much prefer to support rather than this amendment or the one that I offered myself; but I did not believe that it would be possible to have the Sheppard amendment passed, and for that reason I offered this amendment that appears as section 11.

There is no objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, except that I fear it is liable to cause the defeat of the whole amendment, and the best way to handle the question of the control of the traffic in intoxicating liquor is by moderate and fair action at first.

I, as executive of my State, signed the first temperance law that passed forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquor in my State. We commenced on the precincts; from the precincts to the city, from the city to the county, and from the county we covered the State with a prohibition amendment and a legislative or statutory enactment covering State-wide prohibition. Two years ago my State passed a State-wide, bone-dry prohibition law by constitutional amendment, making it a crime to have liquor in one's possession; and communities that voted against the old original liquor law even by precincts gave large majorities for total prohibition.

It is my desire to drive intoxicating liquors of any kind from the Army, used in any form; but I believe that by commencing in this way we can gradually have stronger and stronger laws passed until such time as the constitutional amendment which will be passed forbidding the manufacture or sale of liquors in this Nation, which I hope will be passed at an early day and which I heartily support. The amendment of the committee will at least be reasonably beneficial.

I am in favor of the strongest amendment that can be passed, and shall be glad to see the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] added to my amendment, for I believe it will make it stronger.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] makes an astonishing statement, and one that I am satisfied he does not mean in all of its import. He says that to put this amendment on this bill that has been presented would defeat this measure. Is it possible that the liquor interests of this country are so powerful that simply because we propose to protect our soldiers from the sale of liquor they will cause the defeat of a great measure like this, deemed necessary to carry on our part in this war? The Senator certainly did not mean that. I know that he did not mean it, and yet that is the import of his suggestion.

Mr. President, we can put this amendment on this bill. We have a right to do it. We have the power to do it. We ought to do it. Why, we are going to the homes of this country and going to take their boys and put them into the service of their country. We are going to take them where they will be subject to the worst temptations to which human nature is heir and to which it can be subjected, and we ought to throw about them every possible guaranty that we can to protect them from these influences.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can not yield to the Senator; I am sorry. I have but five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the warring nations have had their experience along this line. I hold in my hand a statement showing the effects of this traffic in England and in France. I should like to read to the Senate the facts here set out, but I have not the time. What does it say as its conclusion? It says:

The day will come when it shall be known to all men in this land—

Referring to Great Britain—

that prohibition of the drink trade during the war would have—Saved, in drink expenditure and its results, £1,000,000,000;
Added a hundred days to our war work;
Saved over 200,000,000 cubic feet of shipping;
Set free for war work 100,000 trains of 200 tons;
Saved the waste of 1,000,000 acres of land;
Released man power enough to lift 60,000,000 tons;
Enormously relieved the strain on the Red Cross;
Released thousands of doctors and nurses;
Saved food to feed the nation three months; or Saved enough food to feed the army and navy all the time.

Yet they say they appeal to us for food; but listen to what it says:

We know the ghastly ways in which our enemy has worked its will abroad; we know too well of the ruthless destruction of Belgium, the enslavement of helpless and innocent people, the butchery of men and women and children, the stealing of the food of civil populations, the throwing of little children to the sharks, the sinking of peaceful ships at sight. Those have been the ways of the enemy power abroad; what have been the ways of the enemy power at home? It has robbed our people of their food; it has robbed our army of guns and shells; it has robbed our fleet of shipping power and slowed down ships to make a target for a German submarine. It has kept our men from labor, on which liberty depends; it has tempted the wives of our soldiers and driven them to ruin and death; it has stolen the food of little children and of wounded soldiers; it has rewarded wounded men by planting in them the seeds of raving madness; it has used up sugar, while soldiers have begged for it in vain; it has slowed down transports while the bitter needs of war have cried insistently for help. It kept back machine guns from men dying for them in the trenches; it kept back shells for want of which men died, while Germany bound herself round with a ring of steel. Those are the ways in which our enemy has worked at home.

If that enemy did that with Great Britain, it will do that with our armies. I say it is the highest possible duty of the Senate and of Congress, while we are securing an army to fight the battles of liberty, not to undermine that army by permitting this nefarious traffic to prey upon the boys that we send to the front. If it did that way with the boys of the English Army, if it decreased their efficiency and their power in this way, if it undermined their strength and their lives, and those that it did not destroy it sent back home to scatter disease and suffering, it will do the same thing for our armies. Congress has the power to prohibit this. It should not be sold to the soldier in uniform. It should not be permitted to be sold to the soldier by anyone knowing him to be a soldier. We have the power to prohibit this; we ought to do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Washington has expired.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask if it is in order to offer a substitute. I understood that the Senator from Tennessee modified his amendment and offered it as an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the parliamentary situation as the Chair understands it.

Mr. GRONNA. Would it be in order to offer a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be in the third degree and not in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I agree entirely with what the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has said. This committee amendment is good as far as it goes, but it stops before it reaches the point of greatest danger. It simply excludes liquors from the camp, and that is all. We gather 500,000 boys from their homes into large camps. Inside the camp they can not drink, but the moment they leave the camp there will be hangers-on around seeking to furnish them and ready to furnish them liquor to make them drunk. Ought we to allow it to be done?

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. BRADY. I wish to say to the Senator that I am under the impression, from information I have, that the amendment could not be passed with this change added. I am very much in favor of the amendment if it can be put in this bill, and I shall vote for it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I believe if we stop a moment and think about it we will all feel that it should be put there. These boys will be hundreds of miles away from home. They are no longer under the restraining influence of their fathers and mothers and friends. Some of them undoubtedly will be boys who have been in the habit of drinking to excess. Temptation will be thrown around many of the boys to drink as never before in their lives. Shall we save them, or shall we leave them with no protection whatever, subjected to temptation with no safeguard?

Mr. President, I heartily indorse the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. I think it would be almost cruel to expose these boys with no restraint when they leave camp. This provision will at least cut off the seller of intoxicating spirits from seeking to make money by debauching the boys. I hope the Senate will support it, and I believe it will. I believe we can pass easily the amendment of the committee with the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee added to it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I am able to add but little to what has been said in behalf of this amendment, but I wish to express myself in its favor. I wish to call attention to the fact that the nations now engaged in the great European war, a struggle in which every energy is strained to the utmost, have realized that the liquor habit is their deadliest enemy. Kitchener said that liquor was a worse foe to England than all the opposing armies in the field. Russia has abolished vodka altogether and wine and beer except in a limited area, sacrificing $500,000,000 of revenue with a single stroke of the pen; and the almost universal opinion is that Russia has been infinitely the gainer by the transaction. France has invested her authorities with power to restrict and stop the sale of alcoholic liquors in any given section, and the German Emperor has said that the dominant nation of the future would be the nation consuming the least amount of alcohol.

Mr. President, in this conflict the American people constitute a great service army. And if it be desirable in order to increase the efficiency of soldiers at the front to stop the sale of alcoholic liquors to them, it is equally desirable to stop the sale of liquor to the civic soldiers, to the economic soldiers, at home.

I therefore hail the passage of this amendment as another step toward the entire abolition of the traffic in alcoholic liquors throughout this Republic, another step toward that day when we shall see a saloonless Nation and a spotless flag.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can not speak any more.

Mr. BRADY. I have not spoken my full five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can speak only once under the unanimous-consent agreement and not longer than five minutes. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to call the attention of the author of the amendment to the amendment to the fact that unless he qualifies it in some way or inserts it in a different part of the amendment the result will be that it will be unlawful for an enlisted man under rules made by the Secretary of War so to purchase liquor for medicinal purposes and anyone selling it to him will be punished.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the two will have to be construed together.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not think so. I think if the Senator wants to construe the two together the provision should be inserted after the word "act," in line 6, or the amendment will be contrary to the terms of this provision. Either of those changes will make it acceptable.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to amend by adding in the amendment proposed by me the words "contrary to the terms of this section."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his own amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I modify the amendment to that extent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is all right.

Mr. BRADY. I ask unanimous consent to request the chairman of our committee to accept the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee as the committee amendment so far as he can, and then permit us to act on the section as a whole with the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee in the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the committee amendment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I desire to express my hearty approval of this amendment. I see no reason, in fact no reason can be given, why it should not be adopted. It is the consensus of opinion of the enlightened world that the use of liquor is hurtful to man physically, financially, morally, and mentally. It is an evil without a mitigating incident. This is one of the possible advantages that may grow out of this unfortunate conflict. I sincerely trust the amendment may be agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, so far as I am personally concerned, and so far as I can do so, at the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], I am willing to accept the amendment with the addition suggested by the Senator from Nebraska. In other words, I do not want the bill fixed in such a shape that if a man happens to be ill a man would be punishable for a crime for furnishing him liquor.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, as I understand, it is argued that this amendment has two purposes. One of them is to maintain sobriety in the Army, and the other is for the purpose of conserving food products. If the object is to obtain sobriety on the part of all those who have the burden of the war upon them, then the amendment should be extended and have a wider scope. It should not only apply to every Army officer and every soldier, but it should apply to every member of every department of the Government. It should apply to the Secretary of War and his subordinates who are directing the Army officers. It should apply to the Congress of the United States, which is legislating with regard to this vital subject.

In this emergency if partial prohibition is essential to the successful carrying on of the war, then every loyal citizen of the country should be willing to follow the same practice, and this provision should be made applicable to all of them, as far as our constitutional authority extends. If this emergency demands the elimination of the use of liquors during the war, then there should be no discrimination. If those in charge of the conduct of the war measure believe that prohibition is essential to victory, then I am prepared to go to that extent, but I do not like to vote an incomplete and discriminatory amendment.

Again, this measure does not reach economically the situation at all. The Senator from Washington has shown that by the manufacture of liquors in foreign countries, as well as in this country, millions of tons of grain are consumed that would go to support life. That is true, and it is an economic question which should be considered.

If those who are studying that question and those who are directing the war policies of the Government demonstrate to me that the elimination of the manufacture of liquors because of the economic situation is essential to the success of the war, I will vote for it. But this amendment does not accomplish any such purpose. The fact that Army officers and soldiers only are prevented from drinking liquor manufactured from grain during the war would have no effect upon the production of liquor from grain throughout the world. If you want to make an economic question of it, then go the full limit. Do not say that it shall reduce the manufacture of liquors from one-half of 1 per cent but that the entire manufacture of it shall be prevented during the existence of the war.

Mr. SHEPPARD. We can not do everything in the bill. We will reach that later.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is exactly the position. I take it that the committee, in the consideration of this matter, by the advice of the War Department, by advice from the Army Board, have considered that they must approach this subject by degrees. Therefore, I am prepared to vote for the committee amendment. If we are not to approach the matter by degrees, if the Army Board is wrong, if the committee are wrong, then settle the entire question at once. I do not see how one can stand here and argue that the manufacture of grain into alcohol is an economic loss and yet not vote for prohibition. I do not see how we can say that total abstinence is essential to the highest efficiency of those in charge of this war and then limit it to only one class of such persons. It seems to me to be a compromise of the whole question, and a cowardly compromise at that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the difficulty with the proposition just made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is that he wants to extend it beyond our jurisdiction. The only way Senators and Representatives can be reached or the other people he refers to would be by a constitutional amendment by which the traffic would be absolutely prohibited. That is pending in this body and I have no doubt it will be passed upon, and perhaps favorably passed upon, by the Senate and by the House when it is reached.

But as to the theory that we should take halfway steps in this matter when these men are to go out in the field and they are to be trained all at one time, it seems to me it can not admit of a halfway measure. We have to take steps to prohibit the use of intoxicating liquors by the soldiers, and we must do it not by a halfway measure but by a full and complete measure. When we do that we will have better soldiers. The experience of the European countries is unanimous in favor of the prohibition of the use of intoxicating liquors. It seems to me that experience, together with the known evil of the use of such liquors among our own people, should prompt us to be in favor of the amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I recognize in time of war, in time of stress, ordinary rules of governing mankind must be set aside and that we must face the conditions. I recognize that the amendment offered by the committee to the bill is to bring about a reasonable system of protection to young soldiers who go to the military camps of America. I was prepared to vote for and accept that amendment, and am now, as it stands in the bill.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee goes far afield from that proposition. So far as I know, the great forces in this country that have been fighting the battles of prohibition in the last 20 years have never reached a point as yet where they were prepared to say that it should be a crime for a man to drink liquor. They have systematically, uniformly, and consistently pitched their battle on the proposition that they propose to prevent the manufacture and sale of liquor, but not to invade the personal rights of the individual.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not yield; I have only five minutes.

I recognize the fact that when we come to the man with the uniform on, carrying the badge of the country on his breast, you may adopt such rules and regulations that he must conform to. I do not object to it. I want to see every reasonable precaution thrown about the military camps that are established in order to protect the health and the morals of the young men who are going to be at those camps. But when the Congress of the United States steps out of the camp life, the life of the individual soldier and officer, and goes to the question of providing rules and regulations for the government of the individual, you are going so far afield that you are invading a jurisdiction I know of no Government on earth that has ever invaded yet.

In the first place, as I said, I am perfectly willing to support and vote for the committee amendment. It is a reasonable amendment; it is intended for a reasonable purpose. The amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee goes into the homes of this country. If thoughtlessly you offer a glass of wine at your table, without remembering the law, to an officer of the United States Army who is sitting in your home without his uniform on, you are liable to the pains and penalties of the law. There is no reason for it.

More than that, when the armies reach the battle fields of Europe they pass beyond the jurisdiction of your law and the control of your law, except so far as it is a military measure in force in the military camps which your armies occupy. If you want to go to the question of saying that in this great stress——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to offer an amendment and to speak to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment would not be in order, being in the third degree. There is an amendment pending to the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Tennessee amended his amendment. He has a right under our rules to change it. There is only one amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a committee amendment, the Chair will state, and the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is offered as an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I presume if the amendment to the amendment is adopted it would be in order to offer an amendment to make the provision apply to the Congress of the United States as well as the Army of the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly that amendment would be in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I will wait until an opportune time.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee and am somewhat surprised at the statement made by the junior Senator from Alabama. The young men in the service need protection from those who would sell them intoxicating liquors in the camps and in the clubs, and they surely need protection when they are away from the camp and out from under the observation of their officers.

Any person who has lived in the neighborhood of a fort knows that the young men in the Army need protection from the joints in the neighborhood of the forts and the bootleggers who hang around on the outside and induce the young man to go to houses where he can get intoxicating liquor. He needs the protection now. If the Senator from Alabama does want to protect the young men in the camps at the forts I should think he would vote to protect them while they are off duty.

I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I imagine there are a good many Members of the Senate who have not really heard the amendment to the amendment. It reads:

It shall be unlawful to sell, furnish, or give away any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, or to knowingly furnish to such person or persons—

By the way, it shows not only an ignorance of human nature but ignorance of grammar, because the gentleman who introduced it has split his infinitive. To correct his English, it would read—or knowingly to furnish to such person or persons intoxicating liquors, whether in uniform or not—

I suppose he means "persons in uniform," but it reads "intoxicating liquors whether in uniform or not"—

or to any person in the employ of the Army.

I have a son-in-law who is a naval officer. I will have at least two boys in the Army, probably three out of my four. I think all of them will pass the examination after the training-camp drill and get commissions, but if they do not they will go into the ranks. At any rate they will be soldiers. This would absolutely punish me for giving my son-in-law or one of my sons a toddy in my own home at my own sideboard. It is fanaticism run mad.

I have voted for all sorts of prohibition measures here in obedience to the will of my State. I have always contended that this was a representative and not a misrepresentative Government, and that I would do whatever Mississippi wanted unless it violated my oath to the Constitution or violated some principle that I regarded as fundamentally and indispensably moral and right. But to pass a provision of this sort would reduce every officer and every soldier in the Army and everybody in the employ of the Army to a degree of personal servitude as to his habits and his appetite. The Army regulations take care of any man who drinks too much or who drinks on duty, but to say that, as this amendment says—or to knowingly furnish to such person or persons—

Who are the person or persons?—

any officer or member of the military forces.

And then, as if not satisfied with that, it goes on to say—

or to any person in the employ of the Army.

If one of the Cedar Grove plantation darkeys was employed as a teamster and came to my back door and said, "Boss, I wish you would give me a little drink, I'm tired and sick," and I gave it to him, he and I both would be punished under this—not while he was on duty but while off of duty.

You are carrying this too far. You may create a reaction. You may create a reaction which will be just as powerful as the reaction under the Stuarts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wished to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator had not expired. The Chair thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I had not. Somebody interrupted me in the course of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has one minute further.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I intended to add was this: There is great danger of hurting, if not destroying, a good cause and a great cause by creating a reaction, as strong a reaction as that under the reign of the restored Stuarts against the previous puritanic rule in Great Britain, a reaction that will lead to the absolute loosening of all moral ties, because you will create laws that nobody will respect. If my son came to me as a lieutenant in the Army or as a private soldier, whichever it was, as I was preparing to take a toddy from my sideboard, and I would give him one, I would be punishable under this amendment. I would nevertheless offer it to him or to any friend in my house.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays were first demanded by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, a moment ago I rose to a parliamentary inquiry. I shall not oppose the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee; I shall support it. But I had hoped that the parliamentary situation might be such that I could offer as a substitute a bill which I have pending before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

I wish in my time to ask the Secretary to read for the information of the Senate this amendment, and whether the pending amendment is rejected or approved I shall, after it has been voted upon, offer it either as an amendment or as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That for the purpose of conserving, during a period of war, all agricultural food products, and to prohibit the manufacture of said food products into alcoholic liquors, it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association to use for manufacture into alcohol or alcoholic liquors any cereals, vegetables, fruits, or any agricultural food product: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Government of the United States, through the Secretary of Agriculture, from issuing to any person, firm, corporation, or association a license to use any such agricultural food products in the manufacture of alcohol for use in the manufacture of high explosives, or for any other purpose necessary to carry on the war: Provided, however, That the manufacture, sale, or gift of any such alcohol or alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

SEC. 2. That any person, firm, corporation, or association who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be guilty of felony, and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not wish further to delay the proceedings of the Senate, but I simply want to say that this measure would conserve 100,000,000 bushels of grain. It would prevent the manufacture of grain into alcoholic liquors. I think if we are going to make prohibition effective, we should stop the manufacture of it.

At any rate I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee. But he does not go far enough, and, in a measure, there is an injustice in it, because, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has said, it applies only to a certain class of people. It should not apply only to the Army officers and to those employed by the Government of the United States. It should apply equally to everybody. If the amendment which I shall propose is adopted to stop the manufacture, it would prohibit the use of it, because there would be no liquor to be sold.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], which I transfer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness. I vote "nay" on the amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] because of illness, and likewise the absence, for the same reason, of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], and to announce the pair of those Senators with each other.

The result was announced—yeas 57, nays 30, as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to amend the amendment as now amended by adding, in line 3, after the word "uniform," the words "and the Members of the Congress."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to speak to my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will first state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment just agreed to, in line 3, after the word "uniform," it is proposed to insert the words "and the members of the Congress."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. So that it will read?

The SECRETARY. So that that portion of the amendment will read:

It shall be unlawful to sell, furnish, or give away any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, and the Members of the Congress, or to knowingly furnish to such person or persons intoxicating liquors whether in uniform or not, or to any person in the employ of the Army, contrary to the terms of this section.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama a question, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have only five minutes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want one minute. I merely want to ask the Senator if we ought not to have the press gallery included as well as the Members of Congress?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not if it will take any of my time.

Mr. GORE. I do not want to take any of the Senator's time, but I shall offer as an amendment, following the words "and the Members of the Congress," the words "or anybody else."

Mr. MYERS. May I ask the Senator from Alabama if he intends to vote for his amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do, and I am going to state right now why I am going to vote for the amendment.

I believe in protecting the young men in their uniforms and in their camps, and such a provision was in the original Senate committee amendment. If the first part of this amendment had not applied to following these boys to their homes, I would have accepted that; but you are invading the individual privileges of the men of this country after they have left the camp and taken off their uniforms by the amendment which you have adopted. I assume that you have adopted this amendment for the protection of the Nation. I admit, and I am glad to admit, that when a man takes too much liquor he is unfit to serve and incapable of serving his country; but I know that we need as cool heads and as good judgment in this crisis under the Dome of this Capitol as we do in the soldiers' camps of this Nation. I am not in favor of invading the individual rights of the citizen; but I do not consider myself any better than the soldier boy from my district, and I think I should have the same safeguards thrown around me, if they are necessary, as are thrown around the soldier boy from my State. I also think, so far as my having a cool and level head to meet the exigencies of the Nation are concerned, that it is more important that my head should be cool and that my brain should be clear than it is as to the individual members of these camps. Therefore, I say, if the Senate is going to the point of invading the rights of these men when they are out of camp, when they have got their uniforms off, I think, if we want to be good soldiers, we had better stand with them. I am, therefore, perfectly willing to vote for this amendment, and I am going to do it. If it is necessary for the good of the Nation that the soldiers from my State should have no liquor furnished to them, I think it is good for me that the same rule should apply.

I do not believe in this kind of legislation, as a rule; but I do not believe in discriminating; I do not believe in our picking out somebody that does not affect us in our lives, and then avoiding the question ourselves. I think, if the Senate wants to be consistent in what it has just done, it will vote to put this amendment into the bill.

I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, before the Senator from Alabama takes his seat I will ask him if he believes——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has yielded the floor, has he not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Alabama has yielded the floor, the Chair will recognize the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as a public benefactor, and in behalf of such men and the one woman in the Congress who may need this protection, I give it my hearty approval.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I very heartily concur with the most of what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has said. I concur very heartily with all he said about the responsibility that is resting upon Congress. I believe that Members of Congress have as great responsibility resting upon them in this crisis as have the officers and the soldiers of the Army, and that there is just as much need of sobriety, clear minds, and cool heads here as there is in the Army. In fact I believe that a human being can better perform any sort of work, whether it be shoveling coal, plowing, working with a pick, fighting, or legislating, without liquor in him than with liquor in him. I believe that is a proposition that is incontrovertible. Liquor is the deadliest foe to efficiency. I am not willing to vote for restrictions or regulations upon anybody else that I am not willing to vote upon myself and upon the people with whom I am associated.

I think the Senator from Alabama is entirely correct when he says that if this body is to be consistent it must adopt his amendment to the committee amendment. There can be no controversy about that. Therefore I am very heartily in favor of the amendment. I know that anyone can perform his duties as a Member of Congress better without liquor in him than he can with liquor in him. There is not a Member of the Senate but who will do better legislating for his country, better work for his constituents, better service to mankind, without liquor in him than he would with liquor in him. Any man is better off without liquor in him. Let us be practical, let us be sensible. We have applied enforced abstinence from liquor to the officers and soldiers of the Army. By all means let us apply it to ourselves. People will respect us more for it. Let us be consistent. I am for the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator from Alabama whether he would accept an amendment including members of the Cabinet?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will tell the Senator what I will do, if the Senator wants to put it in that way. I want to put it right up to the Membership of this body first. Then after that the amendment will be subject to an amendment, and I am willing to vote for such an amendment if offered by the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. My reason—and I am asking the question in good faith—is because the reason given by the Senator for his amendment applies with greater force perhaps to these heads of departments than to Members of Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am willing to vote for the Senator's amendment if he will offer it, but I ask him to allow me to have a direct vote on the amendment that I have proposed.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall not offer such an amendment, because I am going to vote against the Senator's amendment; but I did not want to offer an amendment to an amendment and then vote against it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I stepped out of the Chamber for a moment, and in my absence the amendment was offered. I wish the Secretary would read the amendment, so that we can see what the joke is before we vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "uniform" it is proposed to insert the words "and the Members of the Congress"; so that portion of the amendment will read:

> It shall be unlawful to sell, furnish, or give away any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, and the Members of the Congress, or to knowingly furnish to such person or persons intoxicating liquors whether in uniform or not, or to any person in the employ of the Army, contrary to the terms of this section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, so far as I am personally concerned, I am perfectly willing for this amendment to pass. I would be willing to see it practically enforced voluntarily by every Senator and every Member of the other House; but, Mr. President, let us not be misled as to the value of what we have just done by the effort to throw ridicule upon it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to imply that I am trying to throw ridicule on this by my amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It looks so.

Mr. UNDERWWOD. Well, I want to deny that right now. The Senator can not put me in that attitude.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am glad the Senator does deny it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I offered the amendment to the amendment in good faith, and I will not submit to any man putting me in a false position on this floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I would not put the Senator in a false position. I am glad that he did not offer the amendment for that reason; but before the public it is calculated to place ridicule upon what we have done, and therefore I desire in a few words to call attention to what we have done.

We are about to bring 500,000 boys from their homes; we are about to consolidate them in camps of from 10,000 to 50,000 men. Part of the time they will be in camp, and a considerable part of the time they will be out of camp, away from home restraints, away from the influences which have strengthened them and sustained them, associating with men who undoubtedly, in part at least, are accustomed to debauchery, with debauchery around them as soon as they leave the camp, with the hangers-on that frequent localities where camps are established, absolutely certain to be subject to the most violent temptations seeking to lead them astray and make drunkards of them. Now, when we vote that it shall be a crime to sell or to give those boys liquor to debauch them we do a splendid thing; and those who would ridicule it by suggesting that we broaden the provision and extend the prohibition to others—and I except the Senator from Alabama from that category, because he says he does not intend to ridicule the amendment that has been adopted, and I accept freely what he says—but the outsiders who might think he intended to ridicule what we have done should realize the difference between this proposition and what we have done.

Let us not be swept away from the conviction that we have done right in keeping liquor from those boys. If there were a way to modify the provision as affecting officers when they were off duty I might be willing to relieve them, although I think they will be better off to let liquor alone.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the reasoning of the Senator from Alabama is quite as applicable and his conclusion as pertinent to what the Senator desires to accomplish as the position which he himself has taken. The Senator from Alabama has pointed out the fact that we need clear heads in the Congress, and that the intellect is impaired, the judgment is distorted, and the reasoning beclouded by the use of intoxicants. Then why not extend the prohibition, as suggested by the Senator from Alabama? Brains unclouded by drink, hearts free from the poison of alcohol, are needed in the Congress of the United States quite as much as sober men are needed in the Army.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, if reason is to be clouded by the use of intoxicants the prohibition should also extend to the officers. Their reasoning powers certainly should not be clouded. I am perfectly willing for this amendment to pass, so far as I am concerned, although I may not vote for it.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to the amendment reported to the committee as amended.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I had occasion a few moments ago to state that I believed that if there was a good purpose behind the amendment then pending, it should be extended to reach all of those within the jurisdiction of this body who might be affected by the use of liquor. I had occasion to suggest that I thought in fairness it should include Members of Congress, and it should include all persons who will have any duties to perform in the conduct of the war. I was in earnest when I said that, just as the Senator from Alabama is in earnest. I do not desire to have the Senator from Georgia include me among those who he says are seeking to place ridicule upon the proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to exclude everybody who did not mean it in that way.

Mr. PITTMAN. But the thing that is peculiar in this matter is that the distinguished Senator from Georgia, who has such an astute mind and who is so careful in his analysis of the motives and sentiments of others, should consider it perfectly proper to have Gen. Scott and other members of the Army controlled in the use of intoxicating liquors, and yet charge that the same control over the Members of the Senate is ridiculous.

I want the amendment to go further, and I intend to vote for it when it is in such form that I believe does not discriminate against the Army. So I intend to offer—not now, because I want this question voted on directly, in the first place, but after the amendment is voted on—I intend to offer the following amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama:

Or other officer, employee, or representative of the United States Government.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] questioned a while ago the constitutional authority of this body to include everyone. Possibly he is right in that, but certainly we have the constitutional authority to control officers, agents, and representatives of this Government. I intend to offer the amendment I have suggested after the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is voted on; and I think everyone who is sincere with regard to this question will vote for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I merely want to say—and I am not going to take even one minute—that it looks to me, this being a military bill, as if we ought to confine its operations to the Military Establishment itself.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Constitution provides that the Senate shall make its own rules. [Laughter.] As I take it, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama affects the habits and conduct, directly or indirectly, of the Members of this body, and hence it is not proper to regulate the conduct of the Members of the Senate by an amendment to a general bill which requires the concurrence of the other House. I therefore make the point of order, first, that the amendment to the amendment is not in order, and then I will move, if the Chair overrules the point of order, that the amendment to the amendment be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. PHELAN. I move, then, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a moment. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order because Congress has a right, by legislation, to regulate the conduct of Members of Congress, who are officials of the Government, as much as it has to regulate the conduct of soldiers. This amendment proposes to regulate the conduct of Senators as citizens, and Senators are included as Members of Congress and not specified as Senators alone while on duty, but at all times as citizens or officials, and this amendment does not affect the rules of the Senate as a legislative body. Therefore the point of order is overruled. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I have made a motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not catch the motion.

Mr. PHELAN. I have moved that the amendment to the amendment be referred to the Committee on Rules. I did not understand that the Chair held that that motion was out of order.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order after the yeas and nays have been ordered on the question, and they have been ordered in this instance.

Mr. MYERS. I make the further point of order that it is contrary to the unanimous-consent agreement, which provides that this measure and all amendments pending, offered, or to be offered must be disposed of this day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Referring the matter to the Committee on Rules would be a disposition of the amendment. The Chair thinks it in order, and if the Senator from California insists upon it he will submit the motion to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I think it would be a proper disposition of the matter, and I request that the motion be put.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The motion, if carried, would have the same effect as defeating the amendment offered by me, and I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment reported by the committee as amended, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not know whether discussion is in order on the motion, but I want to say, as the Senator from Georgia has suggested that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama makes the original proposition ridiculous, that I do not take that view of it at all. If it is right to impose national prohibition as to one particular class of citizens of this country, then it is right to make it apply to others as well. If it is proper to apply it to the men who are to do the fighting in the field, then it is right to apply it to the men who legislate and vote the sinews of war in the form of money and other legislation necessary to prosecute this war. I am in sympathy with the amendment, and I shall vote for it, on the theory that I am not willing to adopt a rule of action for my neighbor which is not made applicable to me in this emergency.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I hope that the motion of the Senator from California will be defeated; that the Senate will adopt the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, just as it adopted, on motion of that other distinguished opponent of prohibition, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the so-called "bone-dry" amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill in the last Congress, and I hope very soon to have the pleasure of welcoming another distinguished antiprohibitionist into the bone-dry ranks.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not think that the point of order made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] was properly ruled on. I think the unanimous-consent agreement means a final disposition, and it is not a final disposition to refer a matter to a committee which has power to report it back.

Mr. President, while I have the floor, let me say just this much: I voted against the McKellar amendment to the committee amendment. I did so upon the theory that the committee amendment undertook to limit the sale of liquor in the camps and within the precincts that would be under the direct military jurisdiction of the United States, and we undoubtedly had the right to go that far; but to undertake to prohibit the sale of liquor to a soldier out of uniform and off duty who was in a State and outside of a military camp is, in my judgment, an attempt which is very likely to be held unconstitutional and to defeat the entire purpose of the bill. So, I voted against it. Now, however, since that amendment has been adopted, clearly if it is constitutional, then it is also constitutional to make the same rule apply to the Congress; and I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama; but I want to warn the advocates of temperance that in all probability they have destroyed a proposition which was brought in here by the committee which would have been constitutional by adding an amendment which will probably make it unconstitutional.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I rise to protest to the Chair that an examination of the precedents of the Senate will show that the Senate has expressly ruled in the year 1914, when the war-tax measure was before the Senate and was being voted on under a unanimous-consent agreement, that a proposition to commit certain portions of it, or certain motions relating to it, was not a compliance with the spirit of a unanimous-consent agreement which provided that the bill and all pending amendments should be acted on. I was not then a Member of the Senate, although a Member-elect; but I happened to be in the Chamber and heard the discussion, and it occurs to me now. I think it is not only the correct rule, but that the Senate has expressly so ruled. Of course I express that view with all deference to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to state that if this were a question of referring the bill itself, the Senator would undoubtedly be right. This, however, is a question of referring an amendment to the committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Chair will permit me, the proposition there was not to refer the bill as a whole, but to refer a certain amendment. The Senate, on appeal, voted that a unanimous-consent agreement which provided that the bill, with all pending amendments, should be disposed of, required a disposition of the bill and its amendments.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, on the point raised by the Senator from Georgia, I offered in the last Congress an amendment to recommit the revenue bill, and the Vice President, then in the chair, ruled it out of order as not a final disposition of the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly. That motion would be out of order here, because it would not be a final disposition of the bill, and the unanimous-consent agreement was for a final disposition of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not amendments.

Mr. PENROSE. That is the parliamentary status.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I only want to say that I think the ruling of the Chair is perfectly correct in this particular matter, for this reason: If this amendment is referred to the committee, under the rules of this body the committee can not act within the time that this bill must be disposed of, because it may not sit during the sessions of the Senate without special permission. Therefore a reference of this amendment to the committee, the bill having to be disposed of before we adjourn, will be a final disposition of that amendment; and for that reason I think the ruling of the Chair is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I do not know anything about the question of constitutionality that has been raised in connection with this amendment, but I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. I believe it is a good amendment; but I can not agree with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] when he says that the following amendment, offered by the Senator from Alabama, to include the Members of Congress in the amendment that applied to the soldier, would be looked upon by the country in the manner he says. I take just the opposite view.

I voted for the amendment, and I will vote for the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I believe that the Congress of the United States wears the shoulder straps of authority for defense the same as officers of the Regular Army and the Navy; and I believe further that if the Senate should refuse to consider the amendment of the Senator from Alabama it would put the Members of this body in the position of trying to pass legislation prohibiting certain people from using intoxicating liquors and not prohibiting themselves. It would certainly put the Senate of the United States in a very ridiculous position, as I see it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to state to the Senate, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, that the unanimous-consent agreement provides as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 1 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Saturday, April 28, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of S. 1871, a bill to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, and that before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon the bill (S. 1871) through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the said hour of 1 o'clock p. m., on the said calendar day, April 28, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto; and, further, that from this nour on (the hour of 12.30 p. m., calendar day of April 26, 1917), if any Senator announces his intention to speak upon the bill or any amendment thereto, no motion to take a recess, to adjourn, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, or to proceed to the consideration of any other business, shall be entertained by the Chair.

It will be observed that the unanimous-consent agreement states "that before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon the bill (S. 1871) through the regular parliamentary stages to its final passage."

There is nothing said about amendments being considered and voted upon to their final disposition. There might be a thousand amendments offered, and we might arrive at the hour of 5 minutes of 12 o'clock to-night without the amendments being finally disposed of, and yet the vote must be taken on the bill, the amendments left undisposed of and entirely unacted upon in order to keep the agreement to vote upon the bill on this calendar day, which ends at 12 o'clock to-night. So the Chair thinks the decision that has been made is correct.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I submit that an amendment offered to a bill is part of the bill when it is being considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly. It is not a part of the bill until it is adopted, however.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, before this vote is taken I desire to say that I have here a telegram that I think is pertinent to this discussion, and I will read it:

COLUMBIA, S. C., April 28, 1917.

The SOUTH CAROLINA CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION,
Care of Senator B. R. TILLMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

The student body of the University of South Carolina respectfully request that you do all in your power to have passed, as an emergency war measure, a bill to prohibit the sale or manufacture of alcoholic liquors during the war.

ROBERT R. HARLEY,
President of the Student Body of the University of South Carolina.

Our people are very anxious that this war shall come to a speedy and successful close.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on referring the amendment to the committee. On that the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. KNOX), which I transfer to the senior Senator from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES) and vote "nay."

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming (Mr. KENDRICK) and withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 20, nays 65—as follows:

NOT VOTING—11.

Beckham	Hughes	La Follette	Owen

So the motion to refer the amendment to the Committee on Rules was rejected.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I voted not to refer this amendment to the committee because I am willing to vote directly upon the question now. I voted for the proposition offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] because I could see great value in that provision. Notwithstanding the statement of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who offered his amendment, and other Senators who may favor it, there can be no question about the fact that it would not have been offered if it had not been that the original proposition which the Senator opposed had been adopted. The result of adopting it is to render very doubtful the constitutionality of the original provision. This is to be followed, we are told, by another amendment to make it apply to all of the officers of the Government, executive and judicial, and it can apply with equal force to all of these officers. It can also be applied to an amendment offered, or proposed to be offered, by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], making it, as a war measure, apply to all the people of the United States, because all of them will be more or less interested in producing things which will be used in the war.

I think there can be little doubt in the minds of lawyers here, at least, that such a provision would be unconstitutional, and that it would affect and go to the very heart of the original amendment which has been adopted. Favorable as I am to the cause of prohibition, I shall not be carried off my feet by any appeal at this time which in my judgment will have but one effect, and that is to render nugatory the beneficial temperance legislation which a great majority of us feel ought to be adopted.

I say to the Senators here, if you are in favor of protecting our boys in the Army, you will not load up this bill with provisions which will have every tendency to destroy it.

I shall be obliged, in the interest of the cause of our soldiers, to vote against this proposition and all the other ones which have been made which can have but one result, and that is to defeat the very thing which the friends of this reform desire.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I have always been a strong supporter of a general prohibition law, but I think these amendments and propositions are reaching into the realm of the ridiculous.

If there is any Senator here who thinks that his own addiction to intoxicating liquors is such that he can not perform his duties during this war as a Senator of the United States, the proper thing for him to do is to resign. If a Senator thinks that any other Senator is incapable of performing his duty because of his use of intoxicating liquors, he should then immediately point out that Senator, and allow the Senate to reject him as an unfit associate.

I do not believe there is a single Senator who needs this prohibition applied to him particularly. I do not believe that we need to single out the Senate of the United States and cast a slur upon this great body by even an assumption, in an amendment of this kind, that we need a particular law to govern us.

Mr. President, I shall assume that any Senator who believes that the Senate of the United States is incapable of performing its duty on account of the bad habit of overdrink will vote for this amendment, and that Senators who do not believe it, but who do believe that this is an honorable body and a capable body of men which does not need to have thrown around it the protection suggested in singling it out to protect it against itself, will vote against it.

In voting against a proposition of this kind I am voting that I have confidence in the honor and intelligence of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. STONE. The Senator narrows the question too much. He confines the operation of the amendment to the Senate. Of course such a provision in the law would be wholly unnecessary if it applied solely to the Senate; but it applies to the Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCUMBER. Such a law, in my opinion, is an insult to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if this provision is necessary to the conduct of this war, and is to be applied to the Army and Navy and Members of Congress, I think it is fully as important that the judicial and executive branches of the Government should be included; and I offer an amendment to include them all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Connecticut that that amendment is in the third degree. He can offer it after this amendment is acted upon.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. I will offer it then.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the earth is sometimes shaken by seismic disturbances which puzzle the scientists to account for, and disease germs apparently permeate the atmosphere, causing epidemics which the physicians are not able to diagnose. It seems to me that certainly an intellectual "la grippe" germ has been permeating the atmosphere in some portions of this country recently. If I were voting and not paired upon this particular proposition, I should be inclined to suggest at least the propriety of an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama to the effect that the Members of Congress to whom this prohibition clause should apply should be chosen by the President under the selective-draft provisions of this act.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I believe that the Congress has at this time an opportunity to enact some legislation that will be really beneficial. The Senator from North Dakota seemed to think that it would be presuming that the Members of this body needed a special guardian or some special law in order to protect us from intoxicating liquors. I do not believe that the boys who are going out to fight the battles for this country need any more protection in that line than the men who enact the law that sends them there.

Only a few days ago, on the Post Office appropriation bill, we succeeded in accidentally putting on an amendment similar to this. The general supposition was that it would be thrown out in conference. The amendment was adopted in the House, agreed upon in conference, and is now a law. The same condition exists relative to this amendment to-day.

Let us assume for a moment that half a dozen Members of the House and of the Senate go down to the Willard Hotel with three officers of the Army. They are not in uniform, but at the same time the proprietor knows that they are officers of the Army. The hotel can sell drinks to the Congressmen and the Senators while the Army officers must sit there and look on and watch the other men drinking. I do not believe it is fair and right.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BRADY. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. This dreadful situation will be impossible after November.

Mr. BRADY. Well, let us save the Congressmen until November, anyway.

Therefore, Mr. President, in all earnestness, I hope that this amendment may be adopted. I believe that when it is adopted it will be approved by the House and agreed upon in conference, and that we will then have a law that places us on an equality with the boys we are sending to the front to fight the country's battles and paying them $15 a month.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely wish to remind the Senate that we have spent an hour and fifty-five minutes of our time upon this single amendment. There are something like 40 amendments which have been offered, and we now have eight hours in which to consider them. Unless, therefore, we expedite the business of voting upon these amendments, the time for passing upon the bill itself will arrive before one-third of the amendments shall have been disposed of.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, let us vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I move that the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama be laid on the table. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. ASHURST. Call the roll.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MYERS. Is not the pending question the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; that amendment was not in order, because it was in the third degree.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The question having been taken by yeas and nays, the result was announced—yeas 39, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—39.

So the Senate refused to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the amendment of the committee, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The question having been taken by yeas and nays, the result was announced—yeas 45, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—45.

NOT VOTING—8.

Fall	Hughes	La Follette	Newlands
Goff	Kendrick	Lane	Tillman

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to explain my vote in voting "nay," that I regard this as nothing but frivolous.

Mr. PITTMAN. I gave notice before the vote on the last amendment that I would offer an amendment immediately following the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. I now offer the amendment to follow the language of the amendment just adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "and the Members of the Congress" insert "all other officers, employees, or representatives of the United States Government."

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I think that the Congress of the United States could set no better example to the people of this country than to adopt that amendment. It would be setting an example that would be appreciated by the people of the country and would have a highly beneficial effect, and I hope it may be adopted. Let us enact a law that every employee of this Government, high and low, shall abstain from using liquor during this war, and we will take a grand step and a long step toward winning the war. More than that, we would come out of the war a better people. It would be a noble example to set to the people of the country. We could not do better. I am for the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the noble sentiments expressed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. I believe the Government, with all its beneficent activities, ought to be administered without discrimination, and now that the Congress of the United States, or at least the part of it which is represented by the Senate, has seen fit to erect this palladium over our heads to protect us against ourselves and the evil influences which we are powerless to resist without legislation, I think the same protecting ægis should be extended over the feeble heads of the judicial and executive branches of the Government.

If it is important for the Legislature, as the Senator from Alabama has asserted, to keep level heads and not get befuddled at these important crises, it is equally important that those who interpret the laws which we enact and those who are to enforce them and carry them into effect should also be shielded from their weaknesses.

I hope the amendment will prevail, so that this shall be a government of law and not of discrimination.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I am very reluctant to take even a moment in this hour, but I want the people I am trying to represent in this body to know something about my position. I am going to say to the Senate now that I shall vote against every question that is raised in the form of an amendment in this body at this time, because I think it unbecoming to the Senate of the United States to be indulging in such trivial and ridiculous action as we have taken here to-day. I have sustained the attitude of the Senator from Alabama because I thought it becoming to make the amendment adopted previously to his amendment a ridiculous thing in the eyes of the people of the United States. It went beyond sane and reasonable requirements.

Mr. President, I am not a spokesman of the wet interests of this country. In some years in public life I have done as much to promote the cause of prohibition as many a more pretentious Member of this body who seeks legislation in that direction, and I am expecting in the progress of legislation that has to do with this great war to be called upon to vote upon a good many more measures which are looking to prohibition, and I shall have no hesitancy in meeting the issue.

But if there is any merit in these several offerings relating to the proposition, and there doubtless is merit in them, they can well come before this body and stand upon their own merits instead of being intruded as amendments to this urgent measure which ought speedily to secure the sanction of this body.

What a spectacle it is, my countrymen, that the Senate of the United States, on our entry into a world-wide war, while sitting as a deliberative body, should be giving hours to questions like these and collateral amendments.

Mr. President, I do not want to take the time merely in my own defense. From this time on I want it known that I will refuse to consider these various questions which are dragged, without justification, into this body for consideration in the name of war measures. The socialist wants confiscation of property in the name of a war measure. The suffragist wants suffrage for women in the name of a war preparation. Every faddist wants his fad adopted as a governmental policy in the name of defense. The fanatic of every kind has his specialty for national strength. Very well, if these are good things, let them be considered in due time. I have not the slightest doubt that I shall cast my vote for some measures looking to some forms of prohibition, at least some forms of conservation, during the pendency of this world conflict, but let us not have them brought up now in the name of emergency.

We ought to be passing this bill, which provides for an American Army for defense. I only want it known, Mr. President, for one, I refuse further to be drawn from my line of duty in the consideration of such propositions.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, we have now taken 2 hours and 20 minutes in the consideration of one amendment and the amendments thereto, with some very important amendments which ought to be considered before we reach the time for taking the final vote under the unanimous-consent agreement.

I cordially indorse what has been said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] upon the pending amendment. It is known, Mr. President, that I am opposed to this measure; in the discharge of my duty, as I understand it, I shall vote against it; but I, too, refuse to be a party to a proceeding which tends to belittle not only the Senate but the country at a time when those who support the bill did so because of the pendency of the mightiest crisis which this Nation has ever confronted.

Senators, at this time with these amendments and the shortness of the hours, let us proceed to the consideration of the bill and dispose of it upon its merits instead of loading it with these; yes; I will say it, these ridiculous amendments however sincere may be the motive which prompted their offering.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to cordially concur with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. We are on the threshold of a great war affecting the lives and souls and the fortunes of this great Nation. Can we not act in a becoming spirit with the legislation we are considering?

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the pending amendment may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. Add after the words "the Members of Congress" "or other officer, employee, or representative of the United States Government."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senate of the United States having just now voted by the number of 45 as against 43 that it is incompetent to perform its duties as a Senate unless it is hedged about with a prohibition law, is it not about time that we took an adjournment after getting this proposition through and allow us time to sober off and then deal with the critical question that is before us?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senate did not prove itself incompetent to govern the country upon the last vote; it proved itself incompetent to govern the country upon the vote just preceding it. The Senate voted just preceding that that no American citizen who was an officer or a private in the American Army or Navy or in any wise employed for the war service, should be permitted to take a drink, to offer a drink, or to accept a drink from anybody, under a criminal penalty.

Now, then, I say that if you are going to apply that rule to the men who are going to shed their blood for the United States, you had better apply it to yourselves. We are going to shed nothing except our voices [laughter], and we are not going to shed them very wisely, because a great many of us are engaged in the business of attempting to interfere with the Navy and the Army in the management of this war. As a distinguished Representative at the other end of the Capitol said the other day, the prayer that ought to be made to-day to God by the American people is that the laity and the politicians of America shall not interfere with carrying on this war.

Just a moment ago you voted that no man who goes to the front to shed his blood and to endanger his limb shall be permitted to accept or offer a drink because you in your august wisdom—I started to say "disapprove of it," but you do not even do that; there are influences behind you that disapprove of it, but you do not—but because you in your representative capacity disapprove of it, you just passed an amendment that an Army officer or a Navy officer or a private or anybody employed in the military service of the United States should not be allowed to take even a glass of beer without being a criminal. You went further than that, and you provided that he should not offer anybody a glass of beer without becoming a criminal. You went even further, and provided that if anybody offered to him a glass of beer he should not take it without being a criminal. Now gentlemen are reading the riot act because a moment ago some of us acted a little bit consistently with your former vote and simply said that "if you are going to apply that rule to the men who are willing to bare their breasts to the enemy's bullets, then apply it to yourselves." So these lectures which are being read are out of place. They ought to have been read earlier.

The Senator from North Dakota says that we have just passed an amendment to the effect that Senators of the United States can not be trusted, or that Congressmen can not be trusted, to control their appetites or to control themselves, or something to that effect. What was it the Senator said?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I said that the Senate had just voted by a vote of 45 to 43 that it was incompetent to carry on the business of the Government without having a prohibition law applying to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon. What I said I think amounted to what he has just stated, but at any rate I will now quote him accurately. He says that the Senate has just voted that it thinks Senators are incompetent to carry on the public business without hedging themselves around with a prohibition law. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The previous vote was that the men are very much more important than he and I; very much more important than the Senate; that they shall be thus hedged about not only in uniform and on duty but out of one and off the other. If there were a bomb thrown from that gallery right now, destroying me and every other Member of the Senate, it would not interfere with the progress of the American Government 48 hours. We voted that the men who are very much more important, who are going to the front to fight, can not be trusted to fight without a provision of this sort. If you are going to hedge them around, hedge yourselves. If you are going to revoke your last vote, revoke the one previous to it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if it is in order, permit me to say that I hope this bill may be proceeded with. The discussion which is now pending is likely to defeat the purpose that the unanimous-consent agreement had in view. Therefore, in order to try to clarify the situation, I move to reconsider the vote by which the McKellar amendment was adopted.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Oh, no.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a pending amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PENROSE, and others. Question!

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I understand the amendment now pending, it is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] extending this rule or principle to the employees of the Government generally.

Mr. PENROSE. Including the judiciary.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we are dealing with a particular subject here and one of great moment. While I think a great many of us are firm believers in the principle and policy of prohibition, it seems to me that we might separate that proposition from the great question with which we are dealing, except in so far as it actually relates to the Army. Whatever is necessary to protect the Army and to make it efficient and successful as an army we may properly deal with; but it does seem to me that we ought not to extend the subject of this legislation beyond the important question which is before us. I shall, therefore, vote against all these propositions to extend it beyond the question of protecting the Army or of legislating in any manner which we think is sufficient to protect the Army. There will be other measures before the Senate in a very few days to which we can properly offer amendments concerning the whole subject of prohibition.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I opposed the McKellar amendment and I stated why I opposed it. I opposed it because it attempted to impose a coercion under the supposition of necessity upon a few men who are going to conduct this war. That was enlarged by including a few other men who are going to participate in the conduct of the war, namely, Members of Congress. If the original amendment to the amendment just adopted will facilitate the successful termination of this war, then it must follow that all of those who are engaged, either directly or indirectly, on behalf of the Government in the conduct of this war must be equally affected by the policy that we have already adopted with regard to certain classes.

There is more, I think, in the conduct of war than simply the soldier going to the front and firing. I believe that, as wars are conducted to-day, it is a matter of system. I believe that that part of the war that looks to preparation for actual battle is just as essential, if not more essential, than the actual fighting. I believe that the conduct of the executive departments of this Government is just as important as is the conduct of the battle field or the conduct of the legislation of this body.

I am satisfied that this is a good provision. I do not know that I have ever before stood for prohibition, but I recognize that present conditions are abnormal. I recognize that it has been found necessary in Russia, in France, and in other countries, to a large extent, to extend prohibition to all classes. I know that the King of England and the high officials of that Government voluntarily adopted prohibition because it was enforced upon the soldiers. I do not think there is a high official in this Government, I do not believe that there is an official in an executive capacity to-day who would feel humiliated if he were included in this amendment. I believe that those executive departments and the employees of the executive departments of this Government who must look to the preparations for this war should be in that sane, sober, thoughtful, cool condition that the Senate feels that the Army and the high Army officers and the Members of this body should be in. I have offered the amendment so that it may be consistent with the whole character of the legislation which has already been so overwhelmingly approved by this body.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the request seconded. [A pause.] The Chair does not believe that one-fifth of the Senators present have seconded the request for the yeas and nays. All in favor of the amendment will say "aye." [A pause.] Those opposed will say "no." [A pause.] The noes have it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President. I think enough Senators rose to require the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators will hold up their hands, please, until they may be counted. [A pause.] There are a sufficient number, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The yeas and nays having been taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 54, as follows:

So Mr. PITTMAN's amendment to the amendment of the committee as amended was rejected.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for the committee amendment as amended the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio as a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee as amended will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment as amended it is proposed to insert the following:

That no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall sell, supply, or have in his or its possession any intoxicating or spirituous liquors at any military station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, which is being used at the time for military purposes under this act, but the Secretary of War may make regulations permitting the sale and use of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes. Any person, corporation, partnership, or association violating the provisions of this section or the regulations made thereunder shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I make the point of order against that amendment that it is not in order as a substitute, as it is word for word the committee amendment which the Senate has now amended.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, it is not word for word the same. If the Secretary will read the first part of the amendment, I think the Senator from Washington will agree that it is not the same.

Mr. JONES. I tried to follow the reading pretty closely.

Mr. HARDING. I think the Secretary overlooked reading the first part of the amendment. If he will read that, I think the Senator from Washington will see the difference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment was not properly stated by the Secretary and will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment as amended it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 11. That the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army is authorized to make such regulations governing the prohibition of alcoholic liquors in or near military camps and to the officers and enlisted men of the Army as he may from time to time deem necessary or advisable; that no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall sell, supply, or have in his or its possession any intoxicating or spirituous liquors at any military station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, which is being used at the time for military purposes under this act, but the Secretary of War may make regulations permitting the sale and use of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes. Any person, corporation, partnership, or association violating the provisions of this section or the regulations made thereunder shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] as a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I shall support that amendment, or substitute. I agree with what was said in so timely a way by the Senator from Ohio, that we have been rather belittling the dignity of the occasion. I do not believe that the prohibition question, the suffrage question, or any other like collateral question should be injected into the consideration of the grave and important subject before us, except, and only except, in so far as any such collateral question may bear directly and materially upon the main question we have under consideration.

So far as concerns the protection of the Army itself, the forces actually enlisting, against the encroachment of any undue temptation, it seems to me that there should be no difference of opinion. That ought to be done. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio is in entire accord with that thought; but if we go beyond that we are injecting into this discussion and into the consideration of this great and important subject immaterial things that detract from the dignity and gravity of the really solemn business upon which we are engaged.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am loath to take up the time of the Senate, but I want to state one thing. Our soldiers, like our sailors, need protection from the liquor fiend. This amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, like the original amendment to the bill, is of no value whatever. They can put a zone right around the camp, but the soldiers will go to the cities adjoining the camp, to the saloons, and get liquor there.

In the State of Minnesota, Fort Snelling is situated between two large cities—Minneapolis and St. Paul. They can establish a zone around that fort and keep liquor out of the camp, but that is a small matter unless they keep the soldiers interned there perpetually. The soldiers get out and the runners for the whisky houses and the saloons will be after them. If they get out there, they will fill up and spend their money and come back drunk and be in the guardhouse. So if you want to do anything for the soldiers you have got to adopt the McKellar amendment. The other is no protection at all.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am opposed to the substitute offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. The Senate has deliberately gone on record as to what it wants by yea-and-nay votes. If any of the Senators who helped to decide the questions decided here to-day voted frivolously, humorously, or flippantly, that is their business. That is a matter between them, their consciences, and their constituents. I never vote otherwise than seriously. I can not agree with the statements which have been made here that some of the proceedings of this body to-day have been flippant or frivolous, and I do not concur in any of the white-heat indignation which has been vociferously expressed here by some of the Senators about some of the votes which have been taken here to-day.

I believe that if every man and woman in the employ of the Government, in any capacity, were frugal and abstemious, and would abstain from the use of liquor during the entire period of this war, they and the Government would be better off. Is there anyone here who will deny that? Will anyone arise and deny it?

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that because the country is engaged in a war the Federal Government ought to take charge of all the municipal and domestic affairs of the States, and regulate what we should eat and drink and wear in the States?

Mr. MYERS. No, sir; I do not; and no amendment here has proposed that; but I believe it is within the province of Congress to provide that those who may work for the Government, whether in the Army or in a civil capacity, shall not indulge in the use of intoxicating liquor while in the employ of the Government. If working in a civil capacity, they can take their choice—either abide by the law or give up their positions and not work for the Government.

I do not believe that anybody can deny that if every employee of this Government should be diligent and sober and abstain from the use of liquor during the entire period of this war, the country would be better off. I pause to observe if anybody denies it. Nobody denies it. Then why should we not put it in force?

I do not believe that we have been engaged in frivolous business at all. There have been propositions made here, and voted upon, which certainly must commend themselves to the judgment and common sense of thinking, serious-minded people. This is one of that kind. I believe it is of the highest importance that we start out in the conduct of this war by providing that as little liquor shall be used as possible, as little food shall be wasted as possible, and many other wise restrictions; and before we whip Germany we will see the necessity of some of these things. Germany is the most efficient nation in the world. When you whip Germany you have a job on hand. Let it not be said that anything which tends to sobriety in Government employees in time of war is frivolous. We will need all the sobriety we can get before we accomplish our task.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, while I am not entirely satisfied with the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, I feel that the Senate ought to adopt that amendment and get rid of the unseemly wrangle that is now going on before the Senate at a time when the nations of the world are looking to see what America is going to do in this serious crisis. I think the Senate ought to get rid of this, and get rid of it promptly; and I think the Senators who feel more intensely upon the subject of prohibition than I do ought to be willing to sacrifice their convictions a little for the purpose of hurrying this important legislation.

The Senate knows that I have voted for every prohibition amendment that has been up here, and every measure that tends to the uplift of our people. This might be made very much stronger than it is, but I think we ought to dispose of this question and take up this bill seriously and get rid of it, and get rid of it promptly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am going to take just a minute.

In my judgment, we can not do a more important thing in connection with this legislation than to throw safeguards around our soldiers, who, the experience of all wars has shown, will be the special prey of this deadly traffic. It is not frivolous for us to try to put important provisions upon this bill in order to do that, and the experience of all the nations at war has shown that the worst enemy they fight is not the enemy at the front but the enemy at home and that surrounds the boys in the camps.

Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] stated clearly and definitely the objections to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. It is useless and it is no better than the amendment submitted by the committee, and in addition to that it is objectionable, because it tries to throw the responsibility on the President of the United States. I am willing to discharge my responsibility. We ought to say what we want done in this matter—we know the facts; we know the situation—and not try to throw the responsibility and the blame, if any should come, upon the President of the United States. He will have enough responsibilities to discharge in connection with this war. Let us say definitely what we want done, and not leave it to him.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just one question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator advise that the Congress of the United States, in attempting to regulate the discipline of the United States Army, should disregard the policies now in vogue in the most successful armies in the world?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Senator and I may not agree as to what the conditions are in these armies. I have facts and records and reliable statements showing that the worst enemy they have really sapping their strength and their efficiency is what we are trying to guard against here. I am not going into the discussion of any technical matters with reference to the handling of armies and the handling of our men. It may cause dissatisfaction with some; but, Mr. President, 80 per cent of the territory of this country from which we are going to take these boys is dry. These boys are going to the front, and the mothers and the wives and the sweethearts and the sisters have a right to insist that the Government shall throw around these boys the protection that they ought to have and that they can not get in any other way. I am satisfied that this will do more to promote the efficiency and the strength and the power of the Army than any other action that we can take. The Senator from New York may not agree with me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I simply wanted to remark upon this occasion, in commenting upon the remarks of the Senator from Washington, that the British Army and the French Army and the German Army make it a policy to serve wines or liquors as part of the rations of the soldiers in the trenches at stated, regular intervals; and it is to be assumed that they do that because they believe that that is the best way to regulate this problem, to maintain discipline, and the contentment of the men.

As I read the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, the military officers of the United States will be prohibited from doing anything of that sort. It seems to me that the men who know most about the preservation of discipline, camp sanitation, and military hygiene are the officers of the Army. The men who have the deepest interest in the health, the morals, and the contentment of the troops are the men who command them. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio is for the purpose of leaving it to the discretion of the President, and inferentially the commanding officers of the Army, to regulate these things in the best interests of the soldiers themselves. That is why I think that amendment should be adopted.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, after inveighing against the introduction of amendments which he pronounced frivolous, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] proceeded to introduce the most ineffective and indefinite amendment that has been presented here to-day. I desire to call the further attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that these additional amendments, that have been pronounced unnecessary and frivolous, have been introduced by those who opposed the McKellar amendment. The consumption of time they have occasioned is not chargeable to those of us who favor this amendment but to those who opposed it; and I think that there may have been some purpose in the introduction of one of these amendments hostile to the McKellar amendment.

The substitute of the Senator from Ohio nullifies what has been accomplished by the McKellar amendment. If changes should be desired, if the amendment should need to be whipped into shape, vote the substitute down and let the entire matter go to conference. That is the best and quickest solution of the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, it was, if my recollection serves me right, in a spirit of frivolity that Congress abolished the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol of the United States. My honored friend on my right [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and other Senators on this floor recall that it was in a spirit of playful frivolity that the sale of intoxicating liquors in this Capitol Building was abolished.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it was started in a spirit of frivolity, but the Senate took it seriously.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senate did take it seriously, and I am very glad it did.

Mr. GALLINGER. So am I.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And I assisted in its ratification.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think the provision to which he refers was in an immigration bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It was.

Mr. PENROSE. I was chairman of the Senate committee. The House sent over this prohibition amendment thinking the Senate would never agree to it, and we disappointed them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Exactly.

Mr. LODGE. And that is what has happened.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; we did disappoint the House very much by agreeing to it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I agree with the Senators. The amendment was not even germane; it had no appropriate place where it was finally put, and yet who will undo that act? Not a Senator on this floor would undo that wholesome yet frivolous act, and no Member of the House of Representatives would move to undo it. The Nation's respect and its morality have been greatly enhanced by reason of the abolishment of the sale of intoxicating liquors in this Capitol. It will not be very long before no soldier or civilian can get intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, and it will not be long before, under the constitution of my State, it will be impossible to get intoxicating liquors there. The State of Michigan is dry by the choice of its citizens, and I have no apology to offer for it. We made the District of Columbia dry. Years ago I helped make this Capitol Building free from the sale of intoxicating liquors; and people who denounce those things as frivolous must have some motive for attempting to distract attention from this question.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] has, I am sure thoughtlessly, said that those who introduced amendments to the so-called McKellar amendment introduced them with an ulterior purpose; that they were opposed to the McKellar amendment. I can not rest under any such imputation. I was opposed to the McKellar amendment, and stated why. I do not need to restate it. I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] as I thought that it was an improvement on the McKellar amendment. I offered another amendment because I thought that it eliminated some of the unfair discrimination in the McKellar amendment; because I was unwilling to impose on certain officers of this Government burdens that I was unwilling to impose upon myself.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I meant no reflection whatever upon the good faith or the sincerity of my cherished personal friend, the Senator from Nevada.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas has spoken once.

Mr. SHEPPARD. There is no Senator for whom I have a higher regard than the Senator from Nevada.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas has spoken three times now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute of the Senator from Ohio. In line 8, after the word "purpose," I propose the following amendment:

It shall be unlawful to sell, furnish, or give away any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, contrary to the provisions of this act.

Mr. HARDING. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have eliminated the clause which will apply to them when not in uniform. I think if we extend it to the uniform together with the provision in the amendment of the Senator from Ohio which permits regulation by the President we cover the whole subject.

Mr. HARDING. I accept the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have refrained from taking any time that I could possibly avoid in the discussion of this bill, because I am quite as anxious as any Senator to have it acted on. But, Mr. President, I want to occupy simply one minute in saying that I sincerely hope the substitute offered by the Senator from Ohio will not be agreed to. The Senate has acted wisely in adopting the McKellar amendment. My mail is loaded down with letters and telegrams are coming to me by the score almost demanding that we shall go further than the amendment adopted goes in absolutely prohibiting the sale and use of liquor to any of the people of the United States during the continuance of the war. I hope such a measure as that may be agreed upon before we get through with the work of this session, but for the present the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee reaches a very important matter, and the Senate in its wisdom agreed to it.

Now, I hope that that good work will not be undone by agreeing to a proposition that practically undoes it and that weakens absolutely what the Senate has already accomplished

I trust, Mr. President, that the substitute may be disagreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING].

Mr. STERLING. I should like to understand whether the substitute is to be voted upon with the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio accepted the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, and thus the amendment has been modified. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. JONES of Washington. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and having been taken, resulted—yeas 51, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—51.

Bankhead	Harding	Martin	Smith, S. C.

Hughes	Lane	Smith, Ariz.

So Mr. HARDING'S substitute was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to offer the amendment of which I gave notice a while ago.

Mr. REED. I think we ought to go on with something else.

Mr. GRONNA. It will take but a moment. I offer the following amendment——

Mr. MYERS. I call attention to the fact that the committee amendment has not yet been adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A substitute has been adopted for it.

Mr. GRONNA. I move to strike out the amendment just adopted and insert the following——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate having adopted a substitute for the entire clause as amended, it is not at this stage open to amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order. The amendment is out of order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The next amendment of the committee——

Mr. GRONNA. I give notice that I shall offer this amendment in the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The next amendment is, in line 14, on page 13, to substitute the figures "12" for "11."

The SECRETARY. Changing the enumeration of the section from "11" to "12."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The next amendment of the committee is on page 3, line 9.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 9, strike out "Thirty-fifth" and insert "Thirty-second," so that it will read:

Thirty-second Statutes at Large.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I send up the next amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 7, after the word "exclusively," insert the following:

but this provision shall not prevent the transfer to any force of training cadres from other forces.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The purpose of the amendment, I will say, is to allow the department to put some trained soldiers, say, of the Regular Army, into untrained units for the purpose of training the whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I send another amendment to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 6, after the word "discharge," the last word in the line, insert a colon and the words:

Provided, That the President is authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment or draft, as herein provided, special and technical troops as he may deem necessary, and to embody them into organizations and to officer them as provided in the third paragraph of section 1 and section 8 of this act.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill whether the President, acting under that, would be limited to the ages of 19 to 25?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Whatever age is finally adopted in the bill he will be confined to.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us try to dispose of the amendment now pending.

Mr. CURTIS. This is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I may state first that the Secretary of War writes me that the purpose of this proviso is to permit the President to organize special and technical troops, such as are needed to construct roads, operate railroads, and so forth, and as such it is one of the essential provisos of the bill.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator why he keeps the age limit on for that kind of men? Clearly, it ought not to exist there.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I may possibly be mistaken as to whether the 19 to 25 limit would apply there. It does not expressly state so in words.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator ought to amend his amendment by saying "regardless of age."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I would suggest, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, that the question of age ought to be left to the discretion of the Executive.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that the age limit here for volunteers is 19 to 40.

Mr. REED. In that clause?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In the bill itself.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There might be men of special ability qualified to perform some special duty or work which the President might require to have done.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This is for volunteer enlistments, and covers the ages between 19 and 40.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the amendment of the committee, following the proviso:

Provided further, That all persons within the designated ages voluntarily presenting themselves for registration as herein required, and when selected for duty as herein provided, voluntarily present themselves at the time and place designated by the President, shall be held and deemed to have volunteered for military service, and shall be so carried upon the rolls of the organization to which they may be assigned.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that amendment. So far as I can do so I am willing to accept it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The next amendment of the committee is to change the phraseology of section 4, on page 7.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, section 4, after the word "All" and before the word "persons," insert the word "male," and after the word "persons" strike out the words "liable to military service under the provisions of this act" and insert "between the ages of 19 and 25 years."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I offer to amend that amendment by striking out "19" and inserting "21" and striking out "25" and inserting "28."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The whole of the committee amendment has not yet been stated by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the remainder of the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On lines 19 and 20 strike out the words "every such person liable to military service under the provisions hereof" and insert "all persons of the designated ages," and on line 21 strike out the word "himself" and insert "themselves"; in lines 21 and 22 strike out the words "liable to military service," so that the first portion of section 4 will read:

All male persons between the ages of 19 and 25 years shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President, and upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him or by his direction setting the time and place of such registration it shall be the duty of all persons of the designated ages to present themselves for and submit to registration under the provisions of this act; and every such person shall be deemed to have notice of the, etc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, there are various opinions as to how high this amendment should go. I have made it at 28. It does not seem to me there can be any great difference of opinion that this age limit should be raised from 19 to 21. These young men are being registered and drafted not for military training, but they are being drafted for war. In every one of these ages we have a million men. So we have an abundant number from which to select. If we cover six years, we shall have 6,000,000 men.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that confronted, as we are, with a strong opposition to this drafting measure; confronted, as we must be, with a feeling throughout the United States that to draft men into military service against their will and to send them across the ocean is a revolutionary and offensive step, we should do what we can to mitigate it. We should not go into a man's private family and take a 19-year-old boy for such a service when there are an abundant number of men who are 21 years of age who are left at home.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can not very well yield for a question now.

Mr. WATSON. I merely wanted to make a suggestion to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will yield for that.

Mr. WATSON. I suggest that the House of Representatives has just voted by a vote of 207 to 6 to fix the age limit at from 21 to 40.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not any doubt, Mr. President, that this change will comport with the sentiment of the Senate and make this proposed law less offensive to the people of the United States. I say "less offensive" in the sense that it is necessarily offensive. It is offensive for me to vote for it. I am voting for it under dire necessity. I believe that the country is confronted with a great emergency. I believe that this war which we have entered upon is a much more serious proposition than we originally thought it was. I have come for that reason to support conscription, but I do not want to have conscription made unnecessarily offensive and unnecessarily objectionable to the people. So long as we have adults who are capable of military service I think we ought not to go into families and select boys who as yet have seen very little of life, who have never had a voice in the Government, who are still under the control of their parents, and take them against their will and against the will of their parents. That is unnecessary and would work a hardship on the American people. I hope that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator's amendment to be to raise the minimum age from 19 to 21 and the maximum age to 28?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I propose to raise the minimum age to 21 and the maximum to 28.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of the first part of that proposition, and shall ask, when the vote comes, that the question be divided. It occurs to me that there are very many good reasons why the minimum age should be raised to 21 years, but in the space of five minutes these reasons can not be fully submitted to the Senate. The Senator from Nebraska has mentioned some of them, but there are very many more.

The bill is providing for a temporary army; it is not providing for a permanent one, but for a temporary military establishment. I believe it is an unquestioned fact that not only would it be more popular, but it would be more just, to allow our boys to finish their education and to prepare themselves for their life work than to force them into the Army. Why not call upon men whose habits are established and who are better fitted for service? However, I want the maximum age raised, also. I suppose my experience is the experience of every other Senator here. I know men—I think I have literally known hundreds of men—who have had experience in the militia and in the Regular Army in our war with Spain who are ready to serve their country. They ought to be ready to serve it; and this list of eligibles from which we are to take our conscripts should be enlarged. It would be enlarged by more than 200 per cent if the maximum age was increased to 45 years, and if so enlarged the liability to conscription would be less than one-third of what it is under the bill as reported. Such men must be physically fit or else they can not be accepted. I think it would be infinitely a better bill to enlarge the age limit to 45. I wish we might vote on the larger provision first, and if we can not agree on the highest proposed maximum we can try some other limit.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. At the suggestion of several Senators, if there is no objection I will divide my motion, and first move to make the minimum age 21 years.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am very much in favor of that and will not discuss it longer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have that first voted on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out "19," where it occurs, and the words "between the ages of 19 and 25 years," and in lieu of "19" to insert "21."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Just a moment, Mr. President. There is something to be said on both sides of this question. On sentimental grounds the argument is all one way, and that is that the age limit ought to be 21 years, after a young man becomes of lawful age. On the other hand, every military enactment since the earliest days of the Republic has placed the limit for the reserve service usually between 18 and 45 years. I think that is also the legislation of the countries across the water.

It is barely possible, Mr. President, that we should have plenty of men within the limits fixed by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], but it does seem to me that the Senate had better fix the lower age at 20 and leave the other at 25. I think out of those classes there would be abundant material for the first needs of the Government. I hope the Senate will place the limit at 20 and 25 years instead of 21 and 28.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, I move to amend the maximum age provision, and in place of 25 years to make it 28 years.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, for "28" I should like to substitute "40," in order that we may test the sense of the Senate on this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is compelled to say that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia is not in order, it being an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. HARDWICK. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests that, if the pending amendment be voted down, then the Senator may suggest some other age limit.

Mr. HARDWICK. I merely wished to ask the Chair the question if the only method by which to get at these different ages is to vote the amendment down?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the Chair's opinion—vote each age down.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand the motion now is to amend the amendment by raising the age limit to 28?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Michigan a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. If this amendment is voted down, will the Senator then offer his amendment to raise the age limit to 40 years?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I want to raise the limit to 45, and I want to speak on that proposition before the vote is taken, giving my reasons why 45 is a better limit than either 28 or any age under that.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from Michigan will yield to me for just a moment, I will not take more than a minute of his time. I want to give notice that before that amendment is voted on I want to submit to the Senate, if I can get an opportunity to do so, a proposition to extend the age limit to 40 years.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I had hoped that we might first vote on the larger limit; but, of course, if the Senator from Georgia insists upon his amendment that would have to come before the larger proposition. I am not going to vote against the Senator's amendment, for I would prefer the limit should be 28 instead of 25 years. I would prefer any enlargement of this age limit up to 45. That is my desire. I believe that up to 45 years of age men who are physically well and strong, and who pass the physical examination, really make the very best soldiers for the present emergency, and that is what we are legislating to meet. They may not have the fire and vim and vigor of the boy, but they have discretion, and many of them have had experience and are in that condition where they can be of real service to the Government. They have reached manhood. They have a voice in their Government. They can legally speak on questions of peace and war.

I have, as other Senators have had, letters from fathers who have had military experience asking that the age limit be raised so that they can be included as well as their sons. Those letters are not out of the common; they speak the real desire and patriotism of the writers.

Mr. President, I do not believe that in undertaking conscription we can in justice limit the number of men who are equally able to serve to a class which the future must depend upon if this country is to permanently endure. This is a serious matter, Mr. President. Have Senators considered the possibly direful effects of war upon the youth of this country, upon the boys who are to preserve the Nation in the future when the war is over—the effect upon them physically, the effect upon them when they assume the responsibilities of husbands or families?

The men, Mr. President, of older age and equal physical ability, who have their habits fixed, ought to be permitted to serve in the Army and to take their places in this conscript line from which the soldiers are to be drawn. I think it will be a serious mistake if we do not enlarge this field. Therefore I hope that we may have an opportunity to vote for a higher age limit hereafter.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I think if the volunteer system should be adopted it would be well to extend the age limit, but if we are to force men into the service, I do not think it would be wise to extend the limit as high as 45 years. A man at that age, while he may be vigorous and healthy, is more liable to disease, recuperates more slowly, and is therefore less useful as a soldier. It seems to me that 45 years is putting the age limit just a little bit too high. I think 30 years is a fair limit, the proper age, if men are to be conscripted, if they are to be forced into the service. But if they were given the right to volunteer, I do not think 40 or 45 years would be too high. I should like for the law to be so liberal that every able-bodied man who desired might be permitted to defend his country's flag.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I submitted some days ago a proposed amendment fixing the age limit at 35, and, if I get an opportunity, I will offer that amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the Senate should stop one moment and consider the reasons which have been given for establishing the limit between the ages of 19 and 25. We have sought to secure the greatest number that would be out of school and at the same time not yet engaged in general business. We have recognized the fact—and let us not forget it—that we will need to carry on this war all the productive capacity in this country which can be mobilized; and we ought not to take men who are engaged in productive capacities to such an extent as we would be compelled to do if we should fix the age limit at 40, and include the great number of men who are needed to produce the things which will be necessary to the successful prosecution of the war. I think 40 years is too high a limit.

I wish also to suggest to the Senator—and I think it is proper that we should bear in mind the fact—that if we start at 21 the boy will be probably at least 22 years of age before he will ever be really engaged in this war; and if now, after having shut out boys between the ages of 19 and 21, boys who probably would not be in business and in all probability would be out of high school—if now we can not take that unemployed element into our soldiery and are compelled to reach into business channels and take men from the plow and the anvil and from manufacturing industries up to 40 years of age, we shall have trouble right here at home in producing what we want and what our allies want.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator before he takes his seat that under the selective-conscription plan which is provided for, the men to whom the Senator refers will be assigned to the duties for which they are especially fitted, just the same as they will be in case a lower age limit is fixed, so far as that is concerned? So it seems to me it can not more extensively affect the industries.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; we want 1,000,000 men in the Army, and those 1,000,000 will be taken for the Army and not for the industries.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he can state approximately the number of men who will be registered if his amendment prevails fixing the age limit at 28?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I only have a general estimate that has been made, but generally accepted, that there will probably be about 1,000,000 of each age required each year. One of the objections to raising the age limit to such a high figure as 40 would be that it would cause the registration of 20,000,000 or 21,000,000 men, which would be cumbersome and excessive, and result in considerable delay.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I was just about to state that it would seem unnecessary and inadvisable at this time to make so large a registration as would be required if the amendment of my friend, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], should prevail. The Government certainly does not need to register 21,000,000 men in order to make a selection of 500,000 or 1,000,000 soldiers.

There are many other objections which suggest themselves to so large a registration. We do not need to provide for an Army at this time exceeding 1,000,000 men. If we make the registration embrace 21,000,000 men, the difficulties and expense and delay of selection will be enormously increased thereby; and, instead of accomplishing what the selective draft is contemplated and designed to accomplish, we will occasion inefficiency and delay.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. If the amendment of my colleague [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is agreed to, increasing the age limit from 25 to 28, will it be in order after that to move to strike out "28" and insert a higher figure?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will not be.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, Mr. President, I want to ask my colleague if he will not withdraw his amendment and permit those who desire to offer amendments fixing a higher age limit an opportunity to do so, and have them voted on first?

I think there are a good many Senators who feel as I do—that they would rather have the age limit fixed at 28 than at 25—but still they do not want to put themselves in the position by voting for an age limit of 28 of defeating their purpose to vote for a higher age limit. It seems to me we ought to commence to vote on the higher age limits and go down. That would be only fair; and if the Senator will withdraw his amendment it will permit Senators who want to make the limit 40 or 35 to have their motions voted on first.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Presiding Officer whether it would be in order for me to ask unanimous consent that, without debate, the Senate first vote on "40," then on "35," then on "30," and then on "28," until one is adopted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can only entertain motions to amend.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to call up my amendment, which is now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator say it is before the Senate?

Mr. FRANCE. The amendment was presented yesterday and is lying on the table. I wish to offer it as a substitute, inasmuch as it carries a still higher age limit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We must first dispose of the pending amendment. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland is not now in order. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Nebraska will consent to withdraw his amendment fixing the age limit at 28, and let the vote first be had on the amendments fixing higher age limits. I think he will get beaten if he combines all the higher ages against 28; and yet we may be successful in settling upon a lower age than 40 or 35. I think it is a mistake to put too many years in the same class. Really we would have acted wiser if we had divided them into four classes. The English divided their male citizens in this way—20 to 30, unmarried, first class; 30 to 40, unmarried, second class; 20 to 30, married, third class; 30 to 40 married, fourth class. I do not give it exactly, but they classified them to be called—the unmarried and then the married, and establishing the classes according to age. Now, we are only proposing by this call to get 1,000,000 men. If we put 20,000,000 men into the class from which the selection is to be taken, it takes more time to enumerate them; it makes the selection more difficult.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But is it not fairer, Mr. President, among equally fit men, that the field for selection shall be enlarged so that every man's chance shall be enlarged as to his being conscripted?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know that it is. I think that it would, perhaps, be perfectly fair to take classes of 10 years at a time—20 to 30 and 30 to 40—in different classes. It seems to me that it would be very difficult to cull 500,000 men out of 20,000,000. I do not see how any uniform rule could be adopted; but the officers in charge evidently prefer younger men, and even though we enlarge the age to 40, with their view that the younger men are best, they will pick the younger men,

I take it for granted. I think if we go beyond the age of 30, it would be a mistake.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, would it be in order to submit a unanimous-consent request of this fashion?—

"I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to vote on the amendment to raise the maximum age from 25 to 40."

Would that be in order, if the Senator from Nebraska consents to the vote being taken in that way?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that if the Senator from Nebraska withdraws his amendment the Senator from Indiana can move to substitute "40" for "25," and it would be in order.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator from Nebraska withdraw the amendment and permit the larger number to be first voted on?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No, Mr. President.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I am speaking to the amendment which is now before the Senate, and I desire to say that I am in favor of raising the age limits. I have given this matter a considerable amount of thought, and I have gone over the matter with the chairman of the committee and others who are interested in this bill, and I feel that it is necessary, while we are considering this bill, to consider the advisability of giving the Commander in Chief larger discretionary powers by raising the maximum age limit to the ordinary maximum age for military service, namely, 45 years. If the Senator from Nebraska will withdraw his amendment and allow me to read my amendment and to submit it, I think he will find that all of the points of his amendment are covered in mine.

My amendment raises the maximum age limit to 45 years, but it does something more than that—and this, I believe, is what the military men interested in this bill desire to have done: It provides for a classification by age of all of those falling within the military ages, such classification to be determined in the discretion of the President. It says:

Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, classify all such citizens liable to military service by such classification according to age as he may deem advisable, and that he may call for draft into active service as heretofore provided such class or classes as may, in his judgment, be needed at any particular time.

This amendment—if I may have the attention of the Senator from Nebraska—merely provides a maximum age limit which increases the discretionary powers of the President and at the same time provides against the objection which is offered to a very large number being called for the draft—such a large number as would necessarily be called if all of those between the extreme ages mentioned in the bill, as I would amend it, were included.

I trust that the Senator from Nebraska will withdraw his amendment for a moment, in order that we may consider my amendment first. This amendment, I believe, as I have modified it, has the approval of the chairman of the committee, as well as the approval of the War Department.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, before this vote is taken, I wish to say that I really am disappointed that the recommendation of the committee as to the ages inclusive from which this draft shall be taken, being the ages from 19 to 25, has not been accepted by the Senate. It goes without saying that the higher in age you get the more responsibility the individual has assumed; and in removing him in the first place from his family under the draft system, when the head of a family is taken, if he be their support, it is the moral duty of the Government to see that that family is taken care of. You get no better service from the older man. The fact is that he is less amenable to discipline than the younger man and more liable to disease, as has been suggested. In addition to that, you have taken those who can not stand the same hard service as the younger men could stand. You have disorganized the domestic and the commercial organization of your country. We have such a vast population between the ages of 18 and 25 that an army as large as the one we propose to raise could be raised from that class of our people the drafting of whom would produce the least confusion or disorganization at home and render the very best service in the line.

I can not understand why Senators are asking for the higher age limit when every argument is against it—the physical resistance of the individual, the fact that he is already organized and incorporated in the work of the Nation at large; and, in addition to that, the young unmarried man has no division of thought. It goes without saying that the head of any family who may be drafted necessarily carries a mental burden when he knows that those whom he leaves at home, whom, perhaps, he was responsible for bringing into the world, are suffering for the lack of his own care, while the younger man has no such thoughts to distract him from the duty at hand.

I do not know of a single argument that could be brought forward to cause us to raise the age limit until after the necessity forces us all to go to the front to defend our country, and I can not understand how we, deliberating for the best interests of the country in this emergency, knowing that the forces at home will be just as necessary as the forces at the front, do not with judgment and discretion select those best qualified physically, those best qualified by reason of having the least entanglements, and those who are most amenable to the discipline and to training.

Now, I understand that there are exceptions. I understand that this is also the formative period of the character, the time of school age; but under our system of public schools the vast majority of those who would fill our ranks will never see the colleges that require the age to be beyond 19. The great rank and file of the young men of America have already received at the age of 18 and 19 all the academic education they are likely to get; and even if that were not so, I submit to this body whether it is not better to deny a few years of academic training to those who have not the great responsibilities.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, there are reasons, which I think will appeal to the Senate, for making this age limit higher.

In the first place, the liability to military service ought to extend to all citizens who are capable of rendering it, and it ought to extend equally to all such citizens. There is no reason on earth why a man 27 years old, for instance, perfectly sound in mind and body, without any dependents upon him, should not go; why he should be arbitrarily excluded because he is 27, and some man of 26 taken. If we are proceeding in this legislation on the theory that every man owes this military service to his country, then every man of military age owes it equally, and although it is not necessary to raise more than 500,000 men or a million men, every man of military age ought to stand equal chances in raising those men. Why not? Is it not democratic? Let everybody stand on an equal footing about this thing if they are within the proper military age.

They say this is a democratic measure. Let me ask you what democracy there is in saying that men of certain ages only shall be liable to render this service? The age limit ought to be the ages that military men tell us are the ages in which military service can be best rendered with service to the State, and that ought to be the only limit. I think it is universally accepted that that period of life is between 18 and 45. We have already seen fit—wisely, I think, without division—by practically a unanimous vote, to say that we will not require minors, men who are infants in the eyes of the law, to take up this burden. We ought to go further. We ought to say that we will require not some men but all the men 21 years of age and over, up to a wise age limit of capacity for service, to stand upon an equal footing, shoulder to shoulder with each other, and equally ready and equally liable to render this military service to the country.

It will not be much more trouble; it will not take much more machinery; it will not take much more time to take a census of 20,000,000 men than it will to take a census of 6,000,000 men. We may have to do it in the end, anyhow. Why not do it now and get them all on the rolls? Then, if we have to draft them, as we have to select them, make the choice from all the men who, in common justice and fair play, should be equally liable for the service.

Talk about democracy and fair play, Senators! It seems to me that is the only basis on which this matter should rest. No matter how many men we need, the selection ought to be made from all men equally liable for military service.

Mr. President, it seems certain to me that that is fair and just about this thing. Every man ought to take an equal chance and bear an equal burden about it, and I have no doubt that it was in obedience to a sentiment like that that at the other end of this Capitol only a few minutes ago, by an overwhelming vote, the age was fixed from 21 to 40, so that each man might have an equal chance for service, an equal duty for service, an equal obligation for service. All this talk about delay because of more machinery, and more cumbersome machinery, seems to me to be without sound foundation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Georgia has expired.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, perhaps it might be well for us to make a note of what has been gained by experience in the present war.

Mr. Bennett, who had charge of the organization of the military forces in Canada, under whose direction some 400,000 men have been enlisted, was in France in 1915, and he says upon this point:

The experience at the front all goes to show that men from 18 to 30 are the best type to stand up under the strain upon infantry in modern warfare. From 30 to 35 there is a marked increase in wastage by disease and breakdown, and corresponding loss in efficiency. From 35 to 40 the increase is 100 per cent.

That is, the increase in breakdown and loss and wastage is 100 per cent during the years from 35 to 40.

The human system is so constituted that it is best adapted to resist the strain of trench fighting at the younger period. Unless the fighting men are fed and kept in prime condition, we might better never send them across the seas.

That is the result of his observation on the field in France; and it seems to me it is a strong argument why we should not increase this age limit beyond, I should say, either 28 or 30 years.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not think sufficient consideration was given to the suggestion of the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] with regard to his amendment and its application to the proposed amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. It is in direct line with the suggestions of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and proposes to make that classification a similar classification to the one which he suggests.

If we are to raise this limit—and I think we should—then it gives the President the power to classify all the citizens liable to military service, which will not only be following the matured thought crystallized in British legislation on the subject, but it will very largely minimize the difficulty growing out of the enlarged area of classification. I think the Senator from Nebraska can improve his amendment by accepting the proposed classification of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE].

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the amendment that has been offered by the Senator from Maryland is a scientific solution of the manner of enrollment, and before any flat age is taken as a maximum that amendment should be considered. The fundamental principle of the legislation which we are now passing is that every citizen shall do the thing that he can do in time of war better than he can do something else. Therefore, the man who can best serve in the ranks should serve in the ranks, the man who can make munitions should make munitions, the man who can raise potatoes should raise potatoes. Every citizen should do those things which he can do best.

Now, can the citizen who is 35 or 40 years old serve in the ranks as well as a man who is 25 years of age? Certainly not, if the experience of the world is worth anything. Wars have never been fought by men who are 30 years old, or even 25 years old, or any considerable number of whom are over 22 or 23 years old. There were only 46,000 men who served in the northern Army during the Civil War who were over 25 years old when they went into the service out of 2,600,000 men. The young man who goes into the service is better fitted for it. As a man's age increases his power of resistance is decreased. He can not stand as much at 40 as he can at 35; he can not stand as much at 35 as he can at 30. As the age minimizes the power of resistance increases. Therefore, men should be taken for military service who are mature physically, to be sure, but just as soon as they are mature, because you will get better results; you will have a smaller pension list; you will have less sickness; and will have a better army.

I should regret exceedingly to see the maximum age placed as high as 45 or 40 or 35 or even 30. In my judgment the ages imposed in the bill, from 19 to 25 years, were scientifically right. I appreciate the arguments that have been made against taking a boy who is not a citizen and forcing him into the military service, yet he will make a better soldier than the man over 25 years of age.

Moreover, just as soon as a man passes his twenty-first birthday ordinarily he commences to assume additional responsibilities in life. He acquires a family, his business obligations are broader and greater, and it is a greater embarrassment to him to take him from his home and put him into the military service than it is to take a younger man who is not fixed in his business requirements and who has not a family to look after.

There is every reason, Mr. President, in my judgment why the age limit as a minimum should be not higher than 21, and my judgment is that when you go beyond the age of 25 for a maximum limit you are making a mistake and a blunder. You are going to weaken your military establishment every year that you increase it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield? I just caught the Senator's remark that he does not believe in going above the age of 25 as a maximum.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Nor below the age of 21 as the minimum?

Mr. WEEKS. That is true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator think since the Senate, much to my regret, has raised the minimum from 19 to 21 we shall have to go from 25 to 28 or to 27?

Mr. WEEKS. I am not going to be captious or critical as to one or two years' difference. I do not care very much about that. I think we could get all the men we want without any trouble between the ages of 21 and 25, and I am perfectly willing to vote for the age of 26 or 27 or 28. I regret——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I regret very much the fact that the minimum age limit has, as I understand it, been increased from 19 to 21. It will, therefore, be necessary to raise the maximum age limit. The bill as reported by the committee limited the age between the zone of 19 and 25 years, and there was good reason for it. The plan of this military bill providing an army at this time and in this emergency at the age limit of the men to be drafted was placed at a time when they were physically better fit than at any other period during the range of a man's years.

In the hearings before the House committee the reasons were very well expressed and amply given by the Secretary of War. Interrogated by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Mr. Secretary Baker said:

Mr. Secretary, do you think if the bill as sent here by the War Department, fixing the ages of these million men to be raised by draft between 19 and 25 years, should be passed, it would be taken by the country to mean universal service according to a man's ability to render it?

Secretary BAKER. I think so.

Mr. GARRETT. Then what service would be the other millions of men above the age of 25 years be rendering to their country in a crisis, as compared with the service rendered by those called to the colors?

Secretary BAKER. Of course, you will have that distinction, unless you put a gun in every man's hand. There is no answer to that unless you have a whole nation of soldiers. Some process of selection has to be devised.

Mr. GARRETT. Do you not think the department has limited it extremely in fixing the ages between 19 and 25 years?

Secretary BAKER. No; I think that proceeds upon perfectly sound considerations.

Mr. GARRETT. In fixing the age between those years, are you basing it upon the question of ability to render service, or is it on the basis that these men are the men who can best be spared?

Secretary BAKER. On the two laws that all experience with every war in history shows to be correct. First, that that is the best military period in a man's life, the time when young men are best adapted to training and service. The second consideration, and one which is not less important, is that those ages dislocate the commercial, industrial, and agricultural establishments of the country upon which the success of the war depends least of all.

Then, further interrogated by Mr. TILSON:

Mr. Secretary, what steps have you taken to prevent the depletion of our workshops of men very much more needed there than they would be on the firing line; and to prevent that not only through conscription but through persons volunteering and at the same time permitting them to retain their self-respect?

Secretary BAKER. That question is of very great importance and falls more naturally in another connection, but just to dispose of it at this point I will say that by limiting the maximum age to 25 we have been advised by those who are familiar with industrial conditions we escape for the most part the skilled-worker class. Men are not deemed skilled workers and indispensable in industry until they are of greater maturity than that.

I admit, Mr. President, there are many men of the age of 40 years or 45 perfectly capable of serving their country. We could get all the men we need, but the army we want is a young, vigorous army at this time, and if necessary to further augment it by adding let us take the men of 35 to 40 years. But this plan was carefully thought out and adopted by the War College and by the War Department, and I think we should not impede or obstruct those plans by raising the age limit in the face of their study of the question and of the consideration they have given to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New Jersey has expired. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I think it was a very serious mistake to have raised the minimum age limit to 21 years, but that has been done. I wish the Senate could reconsider it and put the minimum age at 20. There are various economic reasons why this should be done. The higher you get in years the more you interrupt the industrial and commercial life of the country. A young man at 19 years of age is rarely ever married. At 20 he is apt to be unmarried. At 24 if he has got anything at all he gets married, and ordinarily he is just beginning to get settled in life at that age. When he is making $50 or $60 or $75 a month he gets married. So we are, by the action which has been taken, eliminating from the efficient force of the country the very men we ought to have in the ranks. It has been the policy of every country to use its young men at 18, and the testimony of military experts is that they make the best soldiers, that they are the easiest trained, and that they make the most efficient soldiers in the world.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator pardon an interruption to this extent, that if the age were put at 20 the young men would be given training at least for a year before they were fit for actual service and every one of them would then be of age.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Surely. They would not really go into the service until they are 21. Every man who has had experience in military affairs knows that you can not make a soldier under one year's training and count upon him as a part of an efficient and effective force.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I will ask if there is a motion pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If we are going to make any change at all I suggest that the amendment of the Senator from Maryland ought to be adopted. It provides for all the ages, as the Senator has fixed it, between 21, which has to be the minimum, and 45, requiring the President to divide these for military service into classes and then calling out the classes as he sees fit. That would enable him to confine a call to the ages of 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, just as the emergency might require. That would settle the whole question about the ages.

The only thing I think the Senate ought to consider and take up is the question of reducing the limit from 21 to 20, because these young men come in at 20 and they are 21 before they are trained as soldiers.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon a question. Why not reconsider the vote on the proposition and go back to the committee amendment? The committee worked it out scientifically and fixed on the ages from 19 to 25.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am frank to say that I think it ought to be 19 myself, but I realize the sentimental argument is in favor of the higher age—21. Putting it on sentimental grounds there is no question about it, but I think it is a mistake, and the age ought to be 19. For the purpose of trying to reach a compromise on it, if the Senate will consider it at all, I think no one will object very seriously to making it 20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to strike out "25" and insert "28." [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I call for a division.

On a division there were—ayes 30, noes 29.

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask the Secretary to state the amendment again. Several Senators did not understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] offered an amendment making the maximum age 25 years. It is now proposed to strike out "25" and to insert "28."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] and withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 42, nays 45, as follows:

So Mr. MCKELLAR's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to strike out "25" and to insert in lieu thereof "35."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHAFROTH and Mr. OVERMAN. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out "25," before the word "years," and insert in lieu thereof "35."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire, on which he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 60, as follows:

YEAS—29.

So Mr. GALLINGER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the minimum age was raised from 19 to 21. If that motion is carried, I will then move to make the minimum age 20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] raising the minimum age from 19 to 21 was agreed to. The question is on that motion.

Mr. REED. Just a word in relation to that motion. If a young man is called into the Army at 20 and goes into the training camp at that time, it is admitted that he will be 21 before he will be ordered to the front, at least that is the very great probability. Military authorities agree that men of that age are of the ideal age for training, for endurance, and for all those qualities which go to make up a good soldier.

When it comes to the method of raising an army, I do not believe that the opinion of the General Staff is as good as the opinion of Congress. When it comes to the question of the quality of men who make the best soldiers, I believe the opinion of military experts is entitled to great weight.

If the motion is reconsidered and the question is reopened, I intend to submit an amendment fixing the minimum age at 20 years; that is in the nature of a compromise. Perhaps it will enable us to come to an agreement.

That is all I desire to say.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I doubt if it will serve any useful purpose to combat this motion, because it is clear that Senators who have no confidence in the management of affairs by the War Department when that management happens to run counter to their own opinions are perfectly willing to follow its advice when such advice coincides with their views.

These young men, of course, are not of age. They are not voters. Many of them are to be taken before their schooling is completed, and under the guise of equal service and equal liability at this time of emergency. It is early enough to take these young men into the service when they have arrived at their majority, when they probably will have finished their life preparation and are ready for its work. We have denied an opportunity to men of 35 and 40 years of age, who are equally fit for service, to enter this temporary army. We are proposing to force the great burden on the boys of this country, the boys that have not reached the age of discretion, possibly, in reference to many things, to force them in under excitement, heightened by association with their fellows. These young men do not now realize just what is being done to them. They are still under the influence and control of their parents.

We are constantly referring to the Civil War and other wars that have been fought by the boys of the country. Such examples do not prove that the system is right. The race has deteriorated because of that fact. There are millions of men in this country who are fit for little else than war, but you are going to exempt them. Their future is not so bright as is that of these boys. The country does not need them so much. They are not to be called out in this emergency, but the very flower of the land is to be drafted into the service.

Mr. President, I object to it. I think the Senate did well in raising the minimum age to 21. It would have done better if it had raised the maximum to 45, in my judgment. But if now it is the opinion of the Senate that we are to call upon these young men, without political influence, these young men who are the hope of the future, and take a million of them out of those positions where they are needed for the good of their country, then we undo the good we have done. All of these minor boys will reach the age of 21, at which period they will be liable to service at some time during this war, provided it shall last two or more years, if the provisions of this bill should, by raising the minimum age, exclude them now. Let them reach their majority before you force upon them a service which could be as well rendered by older men. Let this service be as general as possible. The nearer we approach the inclusion of all physically fit men in the list of eligibles to conscription, the more closely we approach universal service. Let us keep the minimum age at 21 and hope that the House provision as to maximum age may finally be adopted.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, by almost a unanimous vote the Senate voted to raise the minimum age from 19 to 21. As the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has said, these young men who are to be drafted into the service at 19 years of age have not had an opportunity to finish their education.

I want to be pardoned for referring to myself for a moment, because, having occupied the position I have, it might be understood that I am pleading for my own people. I have one son who is 19 years of age, who is already in the service. I have another son who is 32; and I have on every occasion here this afternoon voted to raise the maximum age limit, so I am not pleading for myself. But the same inequality and injustice is being done in the case of this provision as in the entire bill. You are not willing to trust the American people. You are not willing to leave it to their patriotism to say whether or not they are going to participate in this war and defend their country. No; you must have a censor by a draft saying who shall and who shall not go.

It is unfair and it is unjust to take the flower of our youth before they have developed mentally, before they get an opportunity to finish their education; and it will be too late, even if they shall return from the battle fields, for them to finish their education after they shall return.

I hope that the Senate will not make this serious mistake, but that it will leave the minimum age limit where it has been left by the Senate by practically a unanimous vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems to me that we are losing sight of the expert testimony that has been given as to who makes the most efficient soldier. The question as to whether the boy has finished his education applies only to a very limited extent, because boys usually complete the high school at 16, 17, or 18 years of age, and only about 5 per cent of those who go to the high schools go to the colleges and take a course in the literary or professional departments.

That being the case, the question is, what are you disturbing most? As you get the age higher, the men who are in those ages have more obligations. They are skilled mechanics; they are persons engaged in professions; and to disturb them as you go older and take them into the service has a tendency to break up, to a very large extent, engagements that are made, to make them leave their families, and so on. The enormous cost that is involved in supporting those who are dependent upon them would increase the cost of this army millions and millions of dollars.

It is for these reasons, all together, that the experts have said that it is best to make the age limits from 18 to 25. Now, when that has been modified to 19 by the committee, and then it is proposed to be modified again to 20, and then we know that it takes one whole year to prepare a soldier for the field, it seems to me that the age of 20 is about right. It will disturb conditions less than any other age, give the most fighting powers that the soldiers can possess, and the limit of higher age would, it seems to me, involve the question as to the enormous cost of the army.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has just handed me a statement from Secretary Baker, given before the House committee. He says:

> I have no objection to such a scheduling as you have provided, except that I believe it would be better to make the minimum age 20 years rather than 21.
> Mr. CALDWELL. Because it will take a year to train them?
> Secretary BAKER. Because it will take a year to train them. I think it would be better to start with 20 years instead of 21 years.

With this experience, and then with the testimony that has existed in the world for years, in our own Civil War, where men were drafted from 18 years of age, it seems to me, together with the experience we have now in Europe, where the enlistments have been as low as 16 years of age, that 20 is a fair compromise upon this measure.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, our own Civil War presents something of an argument against this motion to reconsider. There have been, as we all know, in this country thousands of veterans of the Civil War who all through life suffered a tremendous disadvantage because the education of their youth was interrupted by military service. Shall we now commit unnecessarily the same mistake of taking these young men out of schools, ending their chance for an education, and sending them to war when we have an abundant supply of adults who have finished their education?

If there were a scarcity of adults for the obligations of military service, then it would be another matter. The European nations have not forced their youths into battle until they have exhausted their adult material. Why should we do it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator was through. However, I will say what I want to say as an interruption, if the Senator will permit me. I merely want to say this in answer to what the Senator has just said. That somewhere between 95 and 98 per cent of the youth of America are never at school after they are 18 years of age. Of course, it is very natural for Members of the Senate and Congress to speak about interrupting the education of youths above that age.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask the Senator not to interrupt me any further. If they are not at school, Mr. President, they ought to be; and in most cases if they are not at school they are earning their living, and that is generally the reason why they are not at school.

Mr. President, if there were any necessity for going into the families of our land and taking boys who are still under the control of their parents, I would say "amen"; but to do it when there is no such necessity is just unnecessarily to tear the heart strings of mothers and fathers who regard those boys as mere children.

So I trust that the Senate will stand by the position it took when it raised the age limit to 21 years, and stand by the position that has already been taken by the House of Representatives.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I merely want to repeat, in a better way than I could do it in an interruption of the Senator from Nebraska, what I said a moment ago.

It is very natural for Senators and Congressmen, who are well-to-do people—even if they were not well-to-do people before they came here, they are after they come here, in receipt of $7,500 a year income—to think of the boys of this country as being at school from 18 to 21 or 23 or 25 because they are off at the universities; but, as a matter of fact, 95 or more per cent of the American youth never see a university, never go to college, and finish their education with the high school, which is a tolerably good education.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; not right now.

Mr. President, I was indisposed to begin at the age of 19. If it would be helpful, I am in favor of putting it at 20 years of age, and I will tell you why, because it will take at least a year to train these boys to be fit soldiers under the conditions of modern warfare, and if they enter at 20 they will then enter the Army and begin to do their fighting at 21; and ninety-odd per cent—95 to 98 per cent—will be just at that age when they are between having quit the high school and having begun business of some sort.

Mr. President, there is another reason. The higher you raise the age limit the more you are going to be called upon, after a while, to provide for dependent families. It will cost this Government somewhere between half a billion and a billion dollars to provide for dependent families if you go into it indiscriminately in the way that is being proposed. Now, if you can get four unmarried men at the same price that you can get one married man when you are going to take care of his family, then you have increased your armies fourfold, and you have kept the expenses at the same figure.

Now, another thing, Mr. President. There never was a great war fought in the world that was not fought in a majority by those that Senators call boys, from 18 up. The Senator from Nebraska says the European powers have not called out their boys. Why, Germany, has called out her 16-year-old boys.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did not say the European nations had not called out the boys. I said they did not call out the boys until they had exhausted their adult material.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, that is the same thing. They have not exhausted their adult material—not a single one of them—and they have called out the boys. During the War between the States the Confederacy at the very jump fixed the minimum age at 16. Finally, robbing the cradle and the grave, they fixed it at 14 up to—I have forgotten—50-odd; 14 to 60, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] tells me, and I believe that is correct. Gen. Grant said afterwards that they "robbed the cradle and the grave" to defend their independence, unavailingly and unsuccessfully.

Now, Mr. President, I have some boys. All of us have some boys. There is no heroics in it. There is no emotionalism about it. When a boy goes out, there is no use in getting up with tears in your eyes and talking about it. If a boy is true to his ancestry, he is going anyhow. Do not urge him to go, any more than you would urge him to stay at home. If he has the right blood in him, he is going, and he can do very much more effective service when he is 20 years old than he can do when he is 35 or 31 or something else.

Suppose I went into the Army to-morrow as a private soldier, I would be a governmental liability instead of a governmental asset after the first day's "hiking," not because I could not fight when I got in but because I could not march. These boys can march, and they have the spirit, and they are willing to do it, and I do not want to chill their youthful patriotism by cutting them out of the opportunity to serve.

Now, one more word and I am through. The Government meanwhile will exercise its discretion, and in exercising its discretion it can excuse those that are unfit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, it has been my privilege to listen to a number of speeches on the very important question now before us, one delivered by the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], in his able discussion of the administration views regarding selective-draft military service, and the no less remarkable address of the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], favoring the minority report on the bill under consideration.

I have always been fundamentally opposed to the draft system in raising an army, and I am to-day. But there comes a time in our official life when we must take up our burden and hold it high above us, sacrificing our own personal views and convictions. I have reached that time to-day. This morning I received information from the War Department advising me that on April 12 a telegram was sent to all recruiting officers throughout the United States, defining it to be the policy of the War Department to discharge from the service on the termination of the present war emergency all men who have enlisted in the Regular Army since the declaration of war and those who enlist now or who will enlist under this bill. It also applies to the National Guard and the Marine Corps. This ruling, as you may call it, permits all young men, as I now understand, who can qualify to enter these branches of the military service now for the period of the war as volunteers, and gives them a chance to answer their country's call before conscription time.

This fact was unknown to me before, and has been the means of removing from my mind the one serious objection to the proposed bill, and I shall vote for the measure as recommended by the War Department, reserving, of course, the right to vote for some of the amendments to be offered, in the belief that it has given the matter with reference to the manner of selecting soldiers the most careful and serious consideration, and that the officials of the War Department are necessarily much better informed on the subject than I could possibly be. And while I can not say that I yield altogether willingly, I yield as graciously as possible under the circumstances.

Mr. President, in voting on this matter to-day I feel that we shall all approach our task of responsibility and duty with grave apprehensions, fully conscious of the inevitable consequences it will bring to the country. This legislation will be the most far-reaching of any I have ever known in my short official life, and my supreme hope is that it may be the last of its kind in the unwritten history of our country.

Permit me to say in justification of the position taken by a number of our most distinguished Senators who are opposed to conscription that during the discussion of this proposed legislation no Senator, so far as I know, has contended that an army could be raised any quicker by the process provided in this bill than could be raised under the volunteer enlistment plan. And no Senator has stood on this floor and contended that the conscripted soldier is any better, to say the least, than a volunteer. I do not believe such contentions, if made, could be sustained.

Mr. President, while I do not desire to say it in the way of criticism, I think the War Department should have given greater publicity to its order of April 12, to which I have already referred, because no doubt it would have changed the views of many people had it been generally known and the fact fully understood.

I also want to say again, in honor of the volunteer, that if I understand the situation correctly, as has been so clearly outlined in the speech of the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], most of the fighting that has been done in Europe up to this time has been carried on by volunteers, the drafted soldiers having been held in reserve, and that all of the splendid forces sent from Canada, who have distinguished themselves most signally on the battle fields of Europe, are volunteers to the last man.

And while I am on the subject let me further express the opinion that there is not a single Senator in this body who will publicly stand on the floor here and say that he does not believe his State would raise its quota of troops by the volunteer system. No, Mr. President; that will not be said. But the great fear of the War Department and the administration is, as I understand it, that we can not get a sufficient number of soldiers for prompt use at this critical time in the Government's history. So, with that fear hanging over us, I feel that I should vote for this bill, although I am firmly of the opinion that in my own State we could raise our quota of troops in 30 days after the issuance of a call for volunteers.

And further, Mr. President, let me say South Dakota is one of the great agricultural States of the Union. She will do her part in this war. We will raise sufficient live stock and grain to feed a million soldiers, besides our own population, with any reasonable luck this year, and few, if any, of her people will ever be found in the slacker column. Watch the South Dakota boys if they have to go to the front.

There is one thing that we should correct in this bill, and that is the provision in reference to the age limit. I shall vote for an amendment that has been offered increasing the age limit, hoping that it may prevail, for several reasons. For the past month the entire press of the country in its support of this particular provision has said that the desire is to catch the slacker. My views are that this is a sincere expression; but I want to call your attention to the fact that between the ages of 25 and 35 you will find three slackers where you will find one between the ages of 19 and 25, as proposed by this bill. If I had my way, Mr. President, I would not have any age limit; all would be soldiers in some capacity. That, to my mind, would be truly democratic, and as the army is to be raised by the selective-draft plan it would be fair that all should share equally in the responsibilities, and, if chosen and determined to be too old for active service, such persons might be very useful in other occupations if needed by the Government.

Another question which comes forcibly to my mind in connection with this, Mr. President, is the proposition that under the provisions of this bill in its present form the National Guard and the militia of the country will be practically destroyed. You will observe by reading that all soldiers between the ages of 19 and 25 who will belong to these organizations will cease to become members of this part of the service when they are conscripted under the proposed law.

Section 111 of the national-defense act provides:

> All persons so drafted shall from the date of their draft stand discharged from the militia.

This, as you will see, is sweeping, and would tend to terminate the services of all persons drafted under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. President, I have no personal motives in expressing myself as I have on this measure to-day. My own boys are dead who were old enough to be called. If they were living now, they would be old enough to go into the Army, and, I am sure, would volunteer for service. I have a brother who has three sons within the age limit, all of whom have officially offered their services as volunteers. My only son-in-law is a second lieutenant in the service now. This war has been brought close home to me, Mr. President. Not farther away than the distance across this Chamber from my residence in Yankton, S. Dak., live the parents of a boy who sacrificed his life for the cause of humanity, and who sleeps his last sleep to-day in our cemetery, a victim of this cruel war. Mr. Robert Warren, the young man I have in mind, was of splendid personage; gifted by nature with unusual attainments, both intellectual and physical. By his unusual ability in college he secured a Rhodes scholarship at Oxford, England, and went there in 1914 to complete his education in the law department. In the winter of 1915, responding to the call for volunteers issued by the American Ambulance Society of Paris, he enlisted and went to France. The work of this society should be known by every American. After his vacation he returned to his studies in Oxford.

During the vacation of 1916 he again enlisted in the service to relieve the suffering. He was arrested and lay in a German dungeon four days, charged with being a spy, but was released. He immediately returned to his duties on the battle field, putting his whole heart into the hospital-ambulance work. He was most impressed with the patience and courage of those he served, and finally gave his life for the cause. He insisted on making the longest and hardest drives. He refused to be relieved of duty, although permitted certain days for rest. Finally, because of a long, tedious night drive through the mountains of France during a heavy rain he contracted a severe cold, which resulted in his death last December. Among the effects found in his trunk upon its arrival home was found a beautiful gold medal, given him as a token of Belgium's gratitude for his work among her people, also a personal letter from Mr. Brand Whitlock, the American minister. A still more significant honor was bestowed upon this young man by the Republic of France—the medal of honor—which carries with it unusual distinctions. It is the highest military honor awarded to anyone not in the actual carnage of war. It is a recognition of extraordinary devotion to duty; and he alone of all the Americans in the French ambulance service had received it. If France bestows this high honor only upon those who are faithful unto death, it indicates her deep religious sense of life. Mr. President, I wish I had the power to-day to tell you of this young man—the big, brave, unselfish fellow; the admiration of all who knew him and the pride of his father and mother—but words would fail me if I tried, and he rests in peace now.

His mother, upon learning of his illness, started for France in order to be with him at his bedside. Reaching New York, she was obliged to wait for some days before sailing. She then braved the danger of the ocean and the submarine in order to be with her boy. Sad enough, however, he died the day after her departure from the United States, and she did not learn of her boy's death until her arrival in France. She returned as soon as possible, bringing his remains home, that he might rest near those whom he loved and those who loved him.

Mr. President, we know that this war will bring great sorrows to our people, and especially to the mothers of the land. It will take from our firesides many fathers, sons, brothers, and husbands who will never return again. And yet we must look upon it as a righteous war, if there ever was a righteous war in the history of the world. The life, liberty, and welfare of one hundred millions of people depend upon its results, and this Government is very dear to them all. If we do not succeed in this war our Government and our rights will be destroyed and taken from us and our people will be made the slaves of plutocracy and militarism. The German Government has violated every law of both God and man, and I can not believe there is a person but who realizes that they were determined to force this country into this war; after apparently studied insults for many months the German Admiralty finally insisted that we should take our flag from the seas. And if we had submitted to their autocratic demands, as promulgated through their last submarine order, they would have next insisted that we take our flag from the land. They prescribed a zone 1,000 miles wide and 1,500 miles long, through which three-fourths of the ocean commerce of the world was accustomed to pass, boldly informing our Government that for any vessel flying our flag or any other flag to enter such prescribed zone meant death. This took place, mind you, after repeated promises to our Government to respect the rights of neutral shipping, in accordance with international laws.

Again let me recall to your minds that some time before relations with Germany were broken the officers on German ships interned in this country had been ordered to destroy and make unserviceable the machinery within their vessels. High officials in Germany also admitted that they had attempted to induce Mexico and Japan to enter into an alliance to wage war against us. German spies located in the United States had plotted to destroy our property, to blow up the bridges and canals on the Canadian border, as has been conclusively shown; the lives of our women and children have been ruthlessly taken at sea; the German Government has destroyed many relief ships flying the Red Cross flag, whose missions were to carry the wounded from the field of battle and to feed and clothe the starving thousands in Belgium for whose condition the Imperial German Government alone is responsible.

In this connection let me read an extract from the report of the International Red Cross Committee, protesting against some of the recent actions of the German Government, issued by them, as follows:

> In torpedoing hospital ships combatants are not attacked but defenseless persons, wounded who have been mutilated and paralyzed by shell fire, women who have been devoting themselves to works of mercy and charity, men whose only weapons are such as to not take the enemy's life but help to preserve it and to alleviate their sufferings in some measure.

So many additional atrocious deeds of violence and crime have been committed that I wonder to-day, as I think of them, how a single person in the United States can longer feel any sympathy for that Government of dynasties and kings who would rid the world of all that men hold dear and all the rights of mankind as free people.

Mr. President, my own belief is that the Government of Germany has maintained an elaborate spy system in every civilized country of the world for many years; that their military efficiency has been brought about by their ability to gather information as to conditions and protective preparations in all countries, through her spies, in advance. Without doubt, many of these German spies are in our land to-day, and I am not basing this statement on a guess, but upon real information that has been furnished in many ways.

Mr. President, only the other day I received an anonymous letter criticizing me most bitterly for making a donation of a few dollars to the Belgian relief fund. This communication, as I have said, was unsigned, and was mailed in my State on a railway train. The writer advised me that my donation would not go far to feed the starving orphan children of Belgium, whose condition, he says, was brought about by shipments of munitions, supplies, and so forth, from America; nor would it help in satisfying the people whom I had betrayed, as he puts it, who elected me. He further adds that if I really wanted to assist these poor, unfortunate people, that I stop talking about the war; that the great majority of us who voted as we did in Congress are responsible for the deaths of millions. Mr. President, I do not care anything about this letter personally. I did not think there was as mean a man in all America; much less in my own State. This letter was typewritten in red letters upon the back of an application soliciting a subscription for Belgian relief work. I desire to publicly denounce this man as a moral coward, because any man who does not have the courage to sign his name to a letter of that kind is a coward. I am endeavoring to ascertain who the sender of this communication may be, because I consider him a dangerous man in his community, and I hope he may be apprehended. I want to "smoke him out," and may succeed in doing so when he sees this public statement.

Mr. President, I have received much honest criticism from my constituency with regard to my official acts in these war matters; and I accept the same with the greatest consideration and honor the man who has the courage of his convictions and who will write to his Representatives and express them under his signature. I naturally want to please my constituents and always solicit their advice and counsel, because I was sent here by them to represent them. But if I am not permitted to vote on a great moral question, as this question is to me, as my own conscience dictates that I should, I would no longer desire to occupy a seat in the great American Congress; and I shall accept without a murmur the conclusions of the people of my State in these matters, trying always as best I can to follow their wishes.

In conclusion let me say that in voting for this measure to-day I shall feel that I am casting my vote to help protect our land from the ruthless evils of militarism and help rid the world of a Government that, to my mind, has committed the greatest series of crimes ever committed by any Government of the civilized world.

This is not a war by any means against the German people, but it is a war to the end between a shoddy plutocracy and a real democracy. A war between those who wear the badge of distinction and authority only by birth to oppress on one hand and those who are the real foundation and backbone of their country on the other side.

And, as much as I value friendship, I would rather lose all the good friends I have than to take any other position upon this great moral question than the one I have taken during this Congress. While my mistakes in life have been many, my prayer to God is that I may never feel that a mistake has been made in my votes on these grave questions that confront our people to-day, the outcome of which may decide our future destiny as a nation of free people.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, when the unanimous-consent rule was adopted the implied obligation was that all amendments to be presented should have some consideration. We began our operations under that rule five hours ago and we have not yet disposed of the committee amendments. If I had supposed that the time between the commencement of the operation of this rule and the taking of the final vote was going to be so unequally divided, I should not have consented to it. A part of the agreement is that amendments which are pending here, offered outside of those by the committee, would be considered. I want at this time to give fair warning that unless some of the amendments in which I am interested receive the consideration of a vote I may not consider myself bound by the agreement.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I trust the vote by which this amendment was adopted will be reconsidered. If we are to have the compulsory system, if men are to be selected, I think they ought to be taken after their character has been formed, after the young man has improved his opportunity to finish his education or rather his college course. I think the maximum age limit should not have been greater than 30 years.

I had some experience in the little war we had with Spain in 1898, and I found that the men over 30 years of age could not stand the hardships of the campaign; that they did not recover from disease as rapidly as the younger men; and for that reason I think 21 to 30 the right age. The man of 21 has usually finished his college course; he is a mature man, physically; he is able to resist the bad influences that ordinarily surround a man in army life; he has grown to manhood with habits fixed; he can meet the duties of his place. The man of 30 is in the prime of physical manhood, and I submit that the emergency does not at this time demand the services of older men. I think if we are going to have a compulsory service, which God forbid, from 21 to 30 should be the ages taken.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I was very much struck by the observation of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. Of course, he means, high-minded man that he is, that he will be bound by the unanimous-consent agreement; I know that I did not misunderstand him in that regard; but this bill must return here from a conference later, as we are already in disagreement with the House, and there is going to be ample opportunity for Senators who desire to discuss the merits of the bill to do so when it comes back from conference.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, amendments can not then be offered.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no, Mr. President; I was talking about general debate.

Mr. THOMAS. Amendments which are most important to some of us have not yet been reached.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If any Senator wants to discuss the main question, he can be heard, and he can be heard without limit, when the conference report comes back from the two Houses. I do not understand why so much time is taken now in general debate. I have not taken any of it. If Senators desire to discuss the main question, they will have abundant opportunity before the two Houses have finally agreed upon the bill; and we ought within the time prescribed by the rule to make some progress, at least, in the disposition of necessary amendments which can not be debated, as the Senator from Colorado so well said, after 12 o'clock to-night.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Both sides of the proposition have been discussed, and I do hope the Senate will reconsider the vote and allow us to fix the lower age limit at 20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I move to fix the maximum age limit at 30 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado offers an amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. Strike out "25," before the word "years," and insert in lieu thereof "30."

Mr. McKELLAR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and having been taken, resulted—yeas 41, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—41.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Owen	Swanson
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Poindexter	Thompson

NOT VOTING—11.

Fall	Kendrick	Newlands	Pomerene
Goff	Lane	Overman	Tillman.
Hughes	Nelson	Phelan

So Mr. THOMAS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to amend by striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "twenty-nine."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves to amend by striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "twenty-nine." The question is on the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas 42, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—42.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Owen	Stone
Bankhead	Husting	Page	Swanson
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Poindexter	Thomas

NOT VOTING—11.

Broussard	Hughes	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Fall	Kendrick	Newlands	Tillman
Goff	Lane	Phelan

So Mr. TOWNSEND's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move to strike out "twenty-five" and to insert "twenty-seven."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to strike out "twenty-five" and to insert "twenty-seven."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon accepts the amendment.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Is the Senator from Missouri going to offer his amendment?

Mr. REED. Yes. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and which I think the chairman of the committee can accept.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to inquire of the Senator from Missouri whether the amendment which he proposes relates to the pending amendment?

Mr. REED. I thought the pending amendment had been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been; the Senate has not yet had an opportunity to vote on the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. If the chairman of the committee will permit me, I desire to suggest to him the propriety of making the same change as to the age, on page 5, section 2, as that which has been made by the amendment just agreed to. Otherwise there will be a disparity between the two sections.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It will be somewhat out of order, but I am perfectly willing to do that, for it must be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The Chair hears no objection. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment as amended. [Putting the question.] The amendment as amended is agreed to. The Secretary will report the next amendment, proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to tender an amendment, to be laid on the table for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and lie on the table.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope Senators will now let me get through with section 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 5, line 10, where it reads "between the ages of 19 and 25 years," it is proposed to amend so as to read "between the ages of 21 and 27 years."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The Chair hears no objection. The next amendment of the Senator from Oregon will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, after the word "registered," in line 6, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, further, That persons shall be subject to registration as herein provided who shall have attained their 21st birthday and who shall not have attained their 27th birthday on or before the day set for the registration; and all persons so registered shall be and remain subject to draft into the forces hereby authorized, unless exempted or excused therefrom as in this act provided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears none; and it is agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 13, after the words "District of Columbia," it is proposed to insert "and public officials and agents therein."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, that finishes the committee amendments, and I yield the floor.

Mr. REED. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 9, after the word "Territories," it is proposed to insert "duly ordained ministers of religion, students preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. I can conceive of no reason in the world why these men should be exempt from the service which is required of other people. From all over the country we have been receiving from the pulpit exhortations to enlist, to take part in this war, to go to war. Now, it is proposed here to exempt divinity students from this service. I do not believe they would ask for such exemption; they ought not, at least, to ask for it; and I for one would most seriously object to eliminating this class from the operation of this law.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I merely want to say that the most urgent letters which I have ever received demanding war have been from ministers; and I do not think they ought to be deprived of the privilege now of going if they want to go. I agree with the Senator from Michigan in what he has said.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if he would be willing to accept an amendment to his amendment so that the exemption would not be extended to divinity students?

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I understand the Senator's amendment, it exempts ministers of the Gospel and students in divinity schools.

Mr. REED. No; I can not accept the suggestion. I do not want to take the Senator's time if he desires to speak; but when others are through I will state my reasons for this amendment and why I can not accede to the Senator's request.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I think this is a very important and meritorious amendment, and that it should by all means be adopted. It has been offered by a member of the committee, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I know it was very earnestly considered and discussed by a number of the members of the committee, to whose attention it was brought, and I think it ought beyond a doubt to be adopted.

There are some ministers of the Gospel who object to being conscripted, drawn into war, and forced to shoulder arms. There are ministers who are willing, I am satisfied, in large numbers to volunteer to act as chaplains, and many of them will shoulder arms; but there are a few, I know, who have conscientious scruples against shouldering arms and fighting, and divinity students are, by reason and logic, in the same class There is no difference in fact or in principle.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MYERS. With much pleasure.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to ask the Senator from Montana if it is not true that those who have such scruples against war would be exempt in any event? Is not that correct?

Mr. MYERS. No; not unless the religious organization with which they are connected, as a part of its creed and doctrine, is opposed to warfare.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. GRONNA. Has the Senator from Montana received many requests from ministers asking to be exempted from going to war?

Mr. MYERS. I have received some requests from ecclesiastics, especially in behalf of divinity students, that this amendment be adopted, and I am satisfied the Senator from Missouri, who offered it, has received like requests or it would not have been offered.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not wish to take the Senator's time, but the letters I have received from ministers have shown that they are the most militant class of people we have in our country, and I myself see no reason why they should be exempted.

Mr. MYERS. I can not yield any further, because my time has nearly expired.

I have been informed that the divinity students of the country, whose number is not very large—there are not so many of them as there might be or ought to be—if drawn into war will not be able, many of them, to graduate from the theological seminaries in sufficient numbers to take the places of the ministers who have to retire from the ministry and of those ministers who die. The pulpits of the country should be kept filled. It is very essential that they should be. The war should not be allowed to close the churches. Many ministers will enter the Army as chaplains, others as fighters. This war may last several years. No man knows how long. If so, pulpits will be vacant, churches closed. An appeal has been made to some of us not to drag from their studies the few thousand theological students—all too few—many between 19 and 25 years of age. Let us grant it. We can afford to do that. They are needed where they are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Montana has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have offered an amendment to the same section, and it is designed to produce in some degree a similar result; that is, to broaden the exemption which is reported in the committee bill.

While I shall support the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, I want, in speaking to it, to emphasize what seems to me to be one of the gravest injustices of this exemption section. I refer to that part of it which is designed to exempt from the operations of the bill those who have conscientious scruples against war, and then confining the exemption to those who, having such scruples, are members of denominations of which that is one of their articles of faith.

Mr. President, I can see good reason for the exemption of divinity students—not ministers; I am perfectly willing to include them, and they ought to be included in the operation of this bill, especially those militant ministers of the gospel, who go upon the theory that Christ came into the world not to establish peace but with a sword.

I am unable to perceive, Mr. President, how and by what process of reasoning a man who is conscientiously opposed to war and not a member of a religious denomination must submit to the requirements of this measure, while his neighbor, possessed of such scruples and belonging to a religious denomination, is made exempt. If we are to exempt that class of people, fundamentally the line of division should not be drawn between those who, in addition to possessing the scruples, are members of churches and those who do not possess any affiliation with churches. Consequently I want, as soon as this amendment is disposed of, to offer the one to which I now refer, in the hope that that invidious discrimination will be stricken from this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I was going to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Before I do so, may I have the amendment stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 9, after the word "territories," it is proposed to insert:

Duly ordained ministers of religion, students preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will not offer any amendment to that. The amendment I offered has been considered. It applies only to a few people, in the long run, and I hope it will not be complicated by any amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am very much in favor of one portion of it, and not so much in favor of the other.

Mr. REED. Well, I will make a statement now, with the Senator's permission, on this amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall be very glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, everybody knows that ministers of the Gospel and priests are not going to be drafted and put on the fighting line. That never has been done by any country within my knowledge. At the same time, we all know that each regiment will have its chaplain, who will be a minister, priest, or rabbi, some ecclesiastic, who will take his place with the men in the camp and on the field. We also know that organizations of good women of churches will go about on their missions of mercy, will do their part; we know that there will not be a battle field on which the Sisters of Mercy will not be found, and where there will not also be found good women of other denominations doing the holy work of ministering to the wounded and caring for the corpses of the dead. The minister will be there; he will be militant enough to take his place as a minister on the battle field. The priest will be there; the danger will not keep him from the zone of fire.

All that is asked—and it has been asked—is that those who are about to become priests or ministers, who are attending regular theological seminaries, who are fitting themselves for ecclesiastical duties, who have already devoted themselves to the mission of peace and of charity and of religion, shall not be taken from their schools probably in the very finishing year. The exemption will only be of a very small number of men in the aggregate. It will only reach men who are duly entered at the regular theological schools as divinity students.

I hope that the exemption will be allowed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, has not the Senator any fears that there will be a great rush to these divinity schools upon the part of young men?

Mr. REED. Oh, no. The language of the amendment requires that they must be students preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools. Now, of course, it would be possible for some individual to take advantage of it, but I do not think that is a danger.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator could easily meet the objection—if it is an objection—of our friend from New Hampshire by interlining the words "at the passage."

Mr. REED. I will insert the words "students who at the time of the passage of this act."

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope the Senator will make it read "approval of this act."

Mr. REED. "Approval of this act," then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise simply to give my support to the amendment, and to say to the Senate that in my last visit to the city of Chicago, my home, I was visited by a delegation of ministers of different denominations, pointing out the justice of such an exemption and calling to my attention the fact that many of their youth will be tendering their sacrifice in this conflict, and that by allowing these young gentlemen to finish their course, when they have finished they will then still be subject to service—many of them, as the Senator from Missouri has wisely pointed out, as chaplains or in other ways. I also beg to fortify, if I can, the observations made here that the Senate may not overlook the fact that in nearly all of these religious organizations there will be women who will make sacrifices immeasurable and indescribable; and in consideration of that, if there were no other, we could afford to grant the exemptions sought in the amendment.

I sincerely trust the amendment may meet the approval of the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, just one word.

I am in entire accord with the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Illinois. I have had a great many communications from Pennsylvania requesting an amendment of this kind, and I had intended to offer such an amendment myself; but I recognize that it comes with propriety from a member of the majority in this Chamber.

I heartily hope that the amendment will be adopted, and that the Senate conferees will see that it remains in the bill when the conference takes up the consideration of the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I now ask that the amendment to which I referred be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 13, it is proposed to strike out the words "any person to serve" and to insert in place thereof the word "service"; also to strike out all after the words "who is," in line 14 of the same page, down to and including the word "organization," on line 19 of the same page, and to insert the words "conscientiously opposed to engaging in such service," so that the clause as amended will read:

And nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel service in any of the forces herein provided for by any person who is conscientiously opposed to engaging in such service.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think I have already consumed my five minutes on this amendment, and I therefore submit it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the amendment says, as I understand it, that every man who is conscientiously opposed to entering the military service shall be exempt. Is that correct?

Mr. THOMAS. It provides that nothing in the act shall be construed to require or compel him to serve. As the bill is now drawn that provision is limited to those with conscientious scruples who are members of religious organizations.

Mr. STONE. Well, if you confine it to religious organizations and it is a part of a religious creed like the Quakers, for example, I see no objection to that; but if you frame it so that any man who is conscientiously opposed to going into the military service will be exempt, the Lord only knows what that will lead to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I wish to add that the amendment which I propose is that which is in the English conscription law; and while I would vote to strike it out entirely, I must again insist that there is, to my mind, no justification for such an exemption which is confined within such narrow limits. It is not democratic.

Mr. STONE. I have great faith in the judgment of my friend from Colorado, and if he thinks it is all right I have nothing more to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I think we ought to have some information on this subject. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to tell us why this was not put on the bill in the committee. Will the Senator from Oregon kindly inform the Senate why the amendment that is now offered by the Senator from Colorado was not put on in the committee, so that we may vote intelligently?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will state that that particular question was not considered in the committee, further than that portion which is now embraced in the bill exempting certain organizations whose creed is opposed to war, like the Quakers, the Mennonites, and so forth. This particular feature of it was not considered, and yet I think it ought to be recognized. The English law recognizes it. The English law excludes the idea of irresponsible persons making this claim, because it provides for a method of appeal. There is a tribunal to try out the man's claim that he has conscientious scruples, and a right of appeal is given. I think if this idea is going to be embodied in the bill it would be better to go a little further and to provide some sort of a tribunal.

Mr. STONE. That is the point about which I wish to ask my friend from Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. STONE. The Senator spoke of tribunals in England, I suppose, to try out and determine the claim of a drafted man that he was conscientiously opposed to military service. We have no such tribunal here, however; and I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if a man is drafted under the provisions of this bill, and he says that he is conscientiously opposed to war, conscientiously opposed to going into battle and shooting at men, which means the killing of men, whether that mere statement of his is to operate to exclude him or to exempt him from service?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me a word, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has introduced an amendment providing a method of procedure to ascertain that fact corresponding substantially, as I understand, to the British practice.

Mr. STONE. But the procedure of the Senator from Wisconsin, whatever it may be, has not been agreed to by the Senate. Now, if it should not be——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It has not been offered. I have had no opportunity to offer it.

Mr. STONE. Well, it has not been offered. That is sufficient; and if it should not be agreed to by the Senate when offered, then we will have this provision in the bill which in effect says that any man who is called to the colors may say that he is conscientiously opposed to service in the military forces.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that he offer his amendment in connection with mine.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If it is in order, I will offer my amendment as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is in order. The Secretary will state the substitute.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I send it to the desk and ask to have it read. I think it is self-explanatory.

The SECRETARY. On page 13 of the bill, after line 16, it is proposed to add a new section, to be known as section 12, and to read as follows:

SEC. 12. At the time of registration as provided for under the terms of this act, or within 20 days thereafter, any person so registering may make application to the local tribunal hereinafter provided for, or application may be so made in his behalf, for the issuance of a certificate of exemption from the provisions of this act upon the following grounds:
